W.Va.Code 49-1-5(5) [1981] defines a custodian as "a person who has or shares actual physical possession or care and custody of a child, regardless of whether such person has been granted custody of the child by any contract, agreement or legal proceedings." Miss Bowens was entrusted, at least implicitly by both parents, with the custody of their children. As the custodian Miss Bowens had a right to participation in the subsequent abuse proceedings. W.Va.Code 49-6-1(b) [1977] states that in a child neglect or abuse case, "[t]he petition and notice of the hearing shall be served upon both parents and any other custodian, giving to such parents or custodians at least ten days notice, ..." [Emphasis added.]

In addition a custodian, like a parent, has a statutory right to be represented in any abuse or neglect proceeding and a "meaningful opportunity to be heard, including the opportunity to testify and to present and cross-examine witnesses." W.Va.Code 49-6-2(a) & (c) [1984]. None of these clearly delineated procedural rights was accorded to our petitioner.

Child neglect and abuse procedures that include the custodian of the children in all the proceedings are calculated to achieve a valuable social goal. Their motivating factor is the often stated standard of the "best interests of the child." As this Court stated in Syllabus Point 2 of Lipscomb v. Joplin, 131 W.Va. 302, 47 S.E.2d 221 (1948): "In a contest involving the custody of an infant the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided."

A custodian, freely chosen by the children's parents, may not be deprived of her custody rights by the Department of Human Services arbitrarily. The Department must have good cause before proceeding against the custodian and then afford her a reasonable opportunity to rebut charges that her custody is wanting. See Syllabus Point 1, State v. Scritchfield, W.Va., 280 S.E.2d 315 (1981). In this case, the court had before it allegations of child abuse by the natural parents who, however, no longer had custody of their children. For some unexplained reason, the court refused to allow the children's custodian to intervene in the proceedings and, instead, passed her by entirely. It may, indeed, ultimately appear that there is such a unity of interest between the appointed custodian and the abusing parents that custody is better placed in the Department. Nonetheless, custody determinations, to the maximum extent possible, should be custom crafted in each case with due attention to the welfare of the children.

The best interests of the child standard insists that the custodian be included in proceedings involving her wards. Indeed, if a party has legitimate physical custody of children, that party has the right to be served with process and to be heard in any proceedings dealing with those children. If the custodian is not served with process, she has the right to intervene in the proceedings.

The writ of prohibition prayed for is granted. The writ of habeas corpus, however, is denied because renewed dislocation of the children may be inimical to their best interests at this time and because the circuit court, with the intervention of Miss Bowen, can best decide the proper custody for the Adkins' children.

Case No. 16520 Writ Denied.

Footnote: 1 A complaint that Miss Bowens whipped the Adkins children "constantly" was similarly examined by a social worker who, however, reported that Miss Bowens resorted to corporal punishment to control the children's disruptive behavior. The social worker also noted that "the children were extremely attached to Ms. Bowen and she to them"

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "'Prohibition lies only to restrain inferior courts from proceeding in causes over which they have no jurisdiction, or, in which, having jurisdiction, they are exceeding their legitimate powers, and may not be used as a substitute for [a petition for appeal] or certiorari.' Syl. Pt. 1, Crawford v. Taylor, 138 W.Va. 207, 75 S.E.2d 370 (1953)." Syl. Pt. 3, State ex rel. Hoover v. Berger, 199 W.Va. 12, 483 S.E.2d 12 (1996).

2. "The general rule of statutory construction requires that a specific statute be given precedence over a general statute relating to the same subject matter where the two cannot be reconciled." Syllabus Point 1, UMWA by Trumka v. Kingdon, 174 W.Va. 330, 325 S.E.2d 120 (1984).

3. The West Virginia Grandparent Visitation Act, West Virginia Code §§ 48-2B-1 to -12 (1998) (Repl.Vol. 1999), by its terms, does not violate the substantive due process right of liberty extended to a parent in connection with his/her right to exercise care, custody, and control over his/her child[ren] without undue interference from the state.

Albright, Justice:

Petitioners Brandon L. and Carol Jo. L.,[1] the adoptive stepfather and the natural mother of Alexander David L., a minor child, seek a writ of prohibition to prevent enforcement of the September 22, 2000, order of the Circuit Court of Braxton County directing that an evidentiary proceeding be held before the family law master in connection with the petition filed by Respondents Linda K. S. and Richard S. (hereinafter referred to as "Respondents"), the paternal grandparents, through which they sought visitation with Alexander David. Petitioners contend that Respondents have no standing to seek visitation rights under the provisions of this state's grandparent visitation statutes (herein referred to as the "grandparent act" or the "act"), West Virginia Code §§ 48-2B-1 to -12 (1998) (Repl.Vol.1999),[2] and that the provisions of the act amount to an unconstitutional deprivation of their liberty interest with regard to issues of care, custody, and control of their child. Upon a thorough review of the issues raised herein, we find no constitutional infirmities with the grandparent act and conclude that Petitioners have not demonstrated the necessary requisites for the issuance of a writ of prohibition. Accordingly, we deny their request for extraordinary relief.

I. Factual and Procedural Background

[1]See In re Jonathan P., 182 W.Va. 302, 303 n. 1, 387 S.E.2d 537, 538 n.1 (1989) (discussing practice of this Court to identify parties in sensitive cases by initial only).

[2]The Legislature recodified the statutes involving domestic relations matters by enactment of Enrolled Committee Substitute for House Bill 2199, which was effective from its passage on March 22, 2001. The pertinent recodification of the grandparent visitation act, which is now found in West Virginia Code §§ 48-10-101 to -1201, did not alter the language of the statutory provisions under consideration.

The birth parents of Alexander David, Petitioner Carol Jo L. and David Allen C., were divorced by order entered on December 22, 1998. Carol Jo L. was awarded sole care, custody, and control of Alexander David while David Allen C. was awarded visitation rights.[3] The divorce order expressly provided that the visitation rights awarded to David Allen C. were to be exercised under the supervision of David Allen C.'s mother--Respondent Linda K. S.[4] Pursuant to the divorce order, Respondent Linda K. S.[5] supervised the visitation of David Allen C. with his son and continued the relationship she and her husband had developed and maintained with Alexander David since birth. Respondents represent, and Petitioners do not dispute, that the visitation permitted under the divorce order "turned out to be visitation by Linda and Richard S. . . . with very little, if any, participation by the child's natural father, David Allen C." This visitation arrangement between Alexander David and his paternal grandparents continued even after the marriage of Petitioners Carol Jo L. and Brandon L. on February 25, 2000. When, however, the adoption of Alexander David by his step-parent, Petitioner Brandon L., became effective on May 11, 2000,[6] Carol L. advised Respondent Linda K. S. by handwritten letter that [3]Visitation was granted to David Allen C. under "Schedule A," which involves alternate weekends, rotating holidays, and extended summer visitation for the non-custodial parent.

[5]While the divorce order states that Respondent Linda K. S. is the supervising adult, we assume that Respondent Richard S. was present during the visitations based on the fact that the visitations took place in Respondents' home.

[6]Petitioners undertook the necessary procedures to have Alexander David adopted by his stepfather, Brandon L. Carol Jo L. executed a parental consent for adoption on March 1, 2000, and David Allen C. executed his parental consent for adoption on March 2, 2000. By order entered on May 11, 2000, the Circuit Court of Barbour County granted the adoption of Alexander David by his stepfather.

"all of your grandparents rights and visitation are cancelled, null and void."[7] (emphasis in original)

Respondents, who were completely unaware of the adoption proceedings until after the adoption was granted, filed an action in the circuit court on May 23, 2000, through which they sought visitation rights with Alexander David. Pursuant to a telephone conference held on June 12, 2000, the family law master considered Respondents' request for temporary visitation along with Petitioners' motion to dismiss, which was predicated on their argument that Respondents lacked standing under the grandparent act. Concluding that Respondents had no standing to pursue visitation rights, the family law master recommended dismissal of Respondents' petition. Respondents sought review of this recommended disposition before the circuit court and by order entered on September 22, 2000, the circuit court rejected the family law master's recommendation and recommitted the matter to the family law master for "a full hearing to determine whether the requested grandparent visitation would be in the best interests of the infant child and would not substantially interfere with the parent-child relationship, in accordance with the factors delineated in West Virginia Code § 48-2B-5 (1999)." Petitioners seek a writ of prohibition to prevent this matter from proceeding to the evidentiary hearing directed by the lower court.

[7]The letter continues to state that Davey (now Alexander David) "has a new name, a new dad, and new grandparents" and that "[a]t Daves [sic] request, you will never see Davey again." (emphasis in original) The biological father, David Allen C., is purportedly opposed to contact between his son and Respondents because he "doesn't want [Alexander David] to turn out like . . . [he did]."

II. Standard of Review

Based on their contention that Respondents have no standing to seek visitation rights under the provisions of this state's grandparent act, Petitioners argue that the lower court had no jurisdiction to hear this matter. As we held in syllabus point three of State ex rel. Hoover v. Berger, 199 W.Va. 12, 483 S.E.2d 12 (1996), "'Prohibition lies only to restrain inferior courts from proceeding in causes over which they have no jurisdiction, or, in which, having jurisdiction, they are exceeding their legitimate powers, and may not be used as a substitute for [a petition for appeal] or certiorari.' Syl. Pt. 1, Crawford v. Taylor, 138 W.Va. 207, 75 S.E.2d 370 (1953)." As an alternate basis for the writ, Petitioners assert that the grandparent act is unconstitutional, both on its face and as applied to this case, citing their right to substantive due process. See State ex rel. Wilmoth v. Gustke, 179 W.Va. 771, n. 1, 373 S.E.2d 484, n. 1 (1988) (stating that "[p]rohibition may be used as a means to test the constitutionality of a statute"). We proceed to determine whether the lower court was acting within its jurisdictional grant when it entered the order from which this proceeding arises and whether the grandparent act is unconstitutional, either on its face or in application to this matter.

III. Discussion

A. Standing

After acknowledging that the grandparent act, by its own express declaration, is the exclusive statutory scheme for resolving issues of grandparent visitation, Petitioners conclude that only grandparents who have secured visitation rights prior to an adoption have standing under our statutory scheme. See W.Va. Code § 48-2B-1 (stating that "[i]t is the express intent of the Legislature that the provisions for grandparent visitation that are set forth in this article are exclusive"). As support for their contention that Respondents lack standing, Petitioners argue that West Virginia Code § 48-2B-9 governs the issue of whether Respondents can pursue visitation rights with their grandchild. That provision, which bears the heading "Effect of remarriage or adoption on visitation for grandparents," reads as follows:

> (a) The remarriage of the custodial parent of a child does not affect the authority of a circuit court to grant reasonable visitation to any grandparent.
> (b) If a child who is subject to a visitation order under this article is later adopted, the order for grandparent visitation is automatically vacated when the order for adoption is entered, unless the adopting parent is a stepparent, grandparent or other relative of the child.

W.Va. Code § 48-2B-9.

In viewing the provisions of section 9 of the grandparent act as determinative with regard to the issue of standing, Petitioners are clearly misguided. Standing to proceed under the act is addressed in section 3. That section states: "A grandparent of a child residing in this state may, by motion or petition, make application to the circuit court of the county in which that child resides for an order granting visitation with his or her grandchild." W.Va. Code § 48-2B-3. Under the statutory scheme of the act, there are no limitations on when a petition may be filed by a grandparent for the purpose of requesting visitation rights with a grandchild. By its terms then, section three of the act does not proscribe consideration of petitions seeking visitation to only pre-adoption situations.[8]

[8]In section III. B. of this opinion, however, we discuss how, under the statutory scheme of the act, visitation is not likely to be granted where it is first sought post-adoption except in those rare cases where a relationship has been both established and maintained between the grandparent(s) and child[ren] before (continued...)

In concluding that Respondents had standing, the circuit court relied upon the provisions of section 4(b):

> The Court specifically finds that West Virginia Code § 48-2B-4(b) (1999) is the applicable statute which does provide the Petitioners with standing to petition for grandparent visitation. West Virginia Code § 48-2B-4(b) places no limitations on when or whether a grandparent(s) may petition the Court for visitation. In addition, although West Virginia Code § 48-2B-9(b) (1999) does not specifically address the situation, as in this matter, where no grandparent visitation order has been entered prior to an adoption of the infant child by a stepparent, the code section does not preclude a grandparent(s) from petitioning the Court for visitation.

While section 4(b) is not the provision that provides standing to Respondents, that section is nonetheless applicable because it governs the procedures to be employed in instances, like the case before us, where the visitation petition is not included as a part of another proceeding.

Section 4(b) of the act provides that:

> The provisions of this subsection apply when no proceeding for divorce, custody, legal separation, annulment or establishment of paternity is pending. A grandparent may petition the circuit court for an order granting visitation with his or her grandchild, regardless of whether the parents of the child are married. If the grandparent filed a motion for visitation in a previous proceeding for divorce, custody, legal separation, annulment or establishment of paternity, and a decree or final order has issued in that earlier action, the grandparent may petition for visitation if the circumstances have materially changed since the entry of the earlier order or decree.

In matters covered by section 4(b)--cases where no divorce, custody, legal separation, annulment or establishment of paternity proceeding is pending--the following procedures apply:

the adoption was finalized.

> (c) When a petition under subsection (b) of this section is filed, the matter shall be styled "In re grandparent visitation of [petitioner's(s') name(s)]."
> (d) The court, on its own motion or upon the motion of a party or grandparent, may appoint a guardian ad litem for the child to assist the court in determining the best interests of the child regarding grandparent visitation.

W.Va. Code § 48-2B-4(c), (d).

Section 4(b) of the grandparents act along with subsections (c) and (d), address the procedural particulars involved in those instances when the petition seeking visitation is instituted separate from any ongoing domestic relations proceeding. A simple comparison of section 4(a),[9] which applies when there are pending domestic relations proceedings, with section 4(b) demonstrates that the Legislature clearly contemplated that grandparents could seek visitation in instances where no other domestic relations type proceeding is pending. Cf. W.Va. Code § 48-2B-4(a), (b). Through the provisions of section 4(c) and (d), the Legislature went a step further and set forth how the pleadings are to be styled and authorized

[9]Subsection (a) provides that:

> The provisions of this subsection apply to all proceedings for divorce, custody, legal separation, annulment or establishment of paternity. After the commencement of the proceeding, a grandparent seeking visitation with his or her grandchild may, by motion, apply to the circuit court for an order granting visitation. A grandparent moving for an order of visitation will not be afforded party status, but may be called as a witness by the court, and will be subject to cross-examination by the parties.

W.Va. Code § 48-2B-4(a).

the appointment of a guardian ad litem[10] in cases such as the present one where the proceeding initiated under the grandparent act is separate from any other pending matter. See W.Va. Code § 48-2B-4 (c), (d).

Choosing to ignore the clear language of section 3, Petitioners rely exclusively on section 9(b) of the act in arguing that Respondents have no standing under the act. Petitioners suggest that, because this section does not reference instances where visitation rights have not been granted pre-adoption, no standing exists for any grandparent to seek visitation rights following an adoption if such rights were not previously established. This argument fails because section 9 expressly deals with the effect of remarriage or adoption on established visitation rights. In suggesting that the absence of language in section 9(b) addressing situations similar to Respondents defeats their right to seek visitation, Petitioners ignore the clear imperatives of sections 3 and 4(b), (c), and (d). See W.Va. Code §§ 48-2B-3, 4(b), (c), (d). There is no mention of non-established visitation rights in section 9 as that section is concerned only with established visitation rights. See W.Va. Code § 48-2B-9. The standing of a party to seek visitation rights, where no such rights have previously been established, is addressed in section 3. See W.Va. Code § 48-2B-3.

While the language of section 9(b) does not address the issue of Respondents' standing, it demonstrates that the Legislature draws a distinction concerning issues of visitation depending on the type of adoption involved. Section 9(b) makes clear that the Legislature both contemplated and approved the continuation of visitation rights following an adoption in those instances where the adoption occurs within the immediate family, as opposed to outside the family.[11] In providing that visitation rights which are established pre-adoption are not to be affected by an adoption that occurs when the adopting parent is a stepparent, grandparent, or other relative of the child, the Legislature was both recognizing the difference between adoptions that occur within and without the immediate family and expressing a preference of continuing established relationships between children and their grandparents in the former instance. Understandably, adoptions that take place outside the immediate family do not permit, nor perhaps should they, the continuation of visitation rights that were granted pre-adoption. See W.Va. Code § 48-2B-9(b). In contrast, however, adoptions that take place within the family do not automatically result in the complete extinguishment of established visitational relationships between adoptive children and their grandparents under the act. See id.

Respondents argue that the absence of language in the act which addresses their specific circumstances, rather than being an indication of legislative intent to deny them standing, is just the opposite.

[11]Respondents suggest in their brief that the language of section 9(b) "does, at the very least, imply that grandparents should not be denied visitation with their grandchild where the adopting parent is a step-parent." In our opinion, the implication that can be drawn from section 9(b) is not that visitation should never be denied in such instances, but that visitation rights that have not previously been established, rather than being summarily extinguished, should be considered upon proper petitioning. Any determination regarding the granting of such rights must be made within the statutory requirements set forth in section five. See W.Va. Code § 48-2B-5 (stating that visitation can only be granted where it is jointly determined to be in the best interest of the child and not to substantially interfere with the parent-child relationship and delineating thirteen factors to aid such determinations).

As analogous support for this contention, Respondents discuss this Court's decision in Elmer Jimmy S. v. Kenneth B., 199 W.Va. 263, 483 S.E.2d 846 (1997), in which we held that visitation could be granted following the termination of the parental rights of the child of the petitioning grandparents where the prior grandparent act, West Virginia Code 48-2B-1 to -9 (1992), was silent with regard to what effect termination of parental rights had on grandparent visitation. The reasoning employed in Kenneth B. was essentially that, while the Legislature could have provided for the cessation of grandparent visitation rights upon a termination of parental rights for abuse or neglect, the absence of law expressly disallowing visitation upon such a termination of rights suggested that the Legislature did not intend to prohibit visitation in all such instances. 199 W.Va. at 267, 483 S.E.2d at 850. While Kenneth B. does stand for the proposition that the absence of legislation denying visitation may, in some instances, be construed as an indirect indication of legislative approval for visitation, we find it unnecessary to rely upon Kenneth B. as support for our conclusion that standing exists in this case. Based on our determination that section 3 is the singular provision that governs whether a grandparent has standing under the act, we do not have to rely upon the nonexistence of language in the act which expressly governs visitation rights sought in the first instance following an adoption. See also Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57, 60, 62 (2000) (noting that Washington statutory language which read "[a]ny person may petition the court for visitation rights at any time" gave grandparents standing to seek visitation "irrespective of whether a custody action was pending").

In a final attempt to defeat Respondents' standing to pursue visitation rights with their grandchild, Petitioners go outside the act to a statutory provision contained in the adoption statutes. The specific statute upon which Petitioners rely is West Virginia Code § 48-4-11 (1984) (Repl.Vol.1999), which provides, in pertinent part, that:

> (a) Upon the entry of such order of adoption, any person previously entitled to parental rights, any parent or parents by any previous legal adoption, and the lineal or collateral kindred of any such person, parent or parents, except any such person or parent who is the husband or wife of the petitioner for adoption, shall be divested of all legal rights, including the right of inheritance from or through the adopted child under the statutes of descent and distribution of this State, and shall be divested of all obligations in respect to the said adopted child, and the said adopted child shall be free from all legal obligations, including obedience and maintenance, in respect to any such person, parent or parents. From and after the entry of such order of adoption, the adopted child shall be, to all intents and for all purposes, the legitimate issue of the person or persons so adopting him or her and shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges and subject to all the obligations of a natural child of such adopting parent or parents.

W.Va. Code § 48-4-11 (emphasis supplied).

Despite the express language of section one of the act, which declares in unmistakably clear terms, that the subject grandparent act, which was enacted in 1998,[12] is the "exclusive" legislation with regard to the issue of visitation, Petitioners nonetheless maintain that the adoption statutes are controlling on the issue of grandparent visitation. W.Va. Code § 48-2B-1 (emphasis supplied); see also Kenneth B., 199 W.Va. at 266, 483 S.E.2d at 849 (emphasizing identical language contained in the 1992 grandparents act stating that the act was "exclusive" with regard to visitation before resolving whether termination of parental rights had affect on correspondent grandparent's right to visitation). The adoption statute at issue was first enacted in 1882 and was last amended in 1984. Because the subject matter of grandparent visitation is one of relatively recent vintage, 1980 in this state,[13] there can be little question that the enactment in 1882 of West Virginia Code § 48-4-11, which is directed at the divestment of rights to a child upon the entry of an adoption order, was not written with concern for the correlative divestment of a grandparent's rights to visitation. Of further significance is the fact that the last amendments to West Virginia Code § 48-4-11 occurred in 1984. Since that time, the Legislature has twice enacted legislation dealing with the issue of grandparent visitation and has included, in both of those enactments, identical language indicating that those statutory enactments are the "exclusive" law on the subject matter. See W.Va. Code § 48-2B-1 (1992); W.Va. Code 48-2B-1 (1998).

Even if we were to conclude that the act and West Virginia Code § 48-4-11 were in conflict, which we do not, the rules of statutory construction would nonetheless require that we resolve the issue based on the specific language set forth in the grandparent act, rather than under the general statutory language that appears within the adoption statutes. As we recognized in syllabus point one of UMWA by Trumka v. Kingdon, 174 W.Va. 330, 325 S.E.2d 120 (1984), "[t]he general rule of statutory construction requires that a specific statute be given precedence over a general statute relating to the same subject matter where the two cannot be reconciled." See also, Cropp v. State Workmen's

Compensation Comm'r, 160 W.Va. 621, 626, 236 S.E.2d 480, 484 (1977) (stating that "[i]t is an accepted rule of statutory construction that where a particular section of a statute relates specifically to a particular matter, that section prevails over another section referring to such matter only incidentally"); Syl. Pt. 2, State ex rel. Myers v. Wood, 154 W.Va. 431, 175 S.E.2d 637 (1970) ("A specific section of a statute controls over a general section of the statute."). Because the grandparent act is specific legislation drafted and adopted for the express purpose of addressing the issue of visitation, its provisions must necessarily be viewed as controlling when a question arises regarding the application of another code provision with regard to the issue of grandparent visitation.

In a case decided before the adoption of the current grandparent act, In re Nearhoof, 178 W.Va. 359, 359 S.E.2d 587 (1987), we addressed the precise issue that Petitioners raise in this case: whether West Virginia Code § 48-4-11 and the grandparent act then in existence[14] were in conflict based on the identical language relied upon by Petitioners to argue that Respondents' legal rights were extinguished coterminous with the adoption. At issue in Nearhoof was whether the adoption of a grandchild by his stepmother resulted in the termination of visitation rights that were petitioned for and obtained by the maternal parents of the child's deceased mother pre-adoption. 178 W.Va. at 360-61, 359 S.E.2d at 588-89. While the grandparent visitation statute then in effect provided for visitation where the child of the petitioning grandparents was deceased, it was not clear what effect the adoption of a child had on a grandparent's right to continue an established grant of visitation rights. See W.Va. Code § 48-2B-1 (1980). After examining the decisions of three other states on this very issue, we concluded that rather than being in conflict, the adoption and grandparent statutes had the same underlying objective: "[T]o provide substitute parental relationships for children who have been deprived of the benefits of a healthy relationship with one or both natural parents." 178 W.Va. at 363, 359 S.E.2d at 591. Rather than viewing the language of West Virginia Code § 48-4-11 as prohibitive of grandparent visitation, we determined that "the legislature intended to vest in the trial court exclusive discretionary authority to grant grandparents' visitation rights pursuant to W.Va. Code, 48-2B-1 . . . ." 178 W.Va. at 363, 359 S.E.2d at 591. As further support for our decision in Nearhoof, we observed that "had the legislature intended the adoption statute to limit the statute providing for grandparents' visitation, the statutes could have reflected that intention." Id. at 364, 359 S.E.2d at 592. In concluding, we stated that: "[T]he availability of the grandparent visitation mechanism is not limited to the nonadoptive custodial setting. We do not believe that the legislature intended to permit the statutorily granted right of grandparent visitation to be frustrated by the otherwise beneficient [sic] provisions of the adoption statute." Id.

We find significant the fact that, despite the passage of fourteen years since the Nearhoof decision, the Legislature has yet to enact legislation expressly denying grandparent visitation following adoptions. Rather than enacting such prohibitory legislation, the Legislature has expressed a clear preference, through the proviso language included in section 9(b), for continuing established visitation rights where an adoption involves a "stepparent, grandparents, or other relative." W.Va. Code § 48-2B-9(b). This enactment illustrates the Legislature's recognition "that under certain limited circumstances, grandparents should have continuing contacts with their grandchild's development." Nearhoof, 178 W.Va. at 364, 359 S.E.2d at 592. The reasons for such continuing contact are many, as we recognized in Nearhoof:

> It is biological fact that grandparents are bound to their grandchildren by the unbreakable links of heredity. It is common human experience that the concern and interest grandparents take in the welfare of their grandchildren far exceeds anything explicable in purely biological terms. A very special relationship often arises and continues between grandparents and grandchildren. The tensions and conflicts which commonly mar relations between parents and children are often absent between those very same parents and their grandchildren. Visits with a grandparent are often a precious part of a child's experience and there are benefits which devolve upon the grandchild from the relationship with his grandparents which he cannot derive from any other relationship. Neither the Legislature nor this Court is blind to human truths which grandparents and grandchildren have always known.

178 W.Va. at 364, 359 S.E.2d at 592 (quoting Mimkon v. Ford, 332 A.2d 199, 204-05 (N.J. 1975)). Having found no statutory impediment to the issue of standing, we proceed to determine whether a constitutional defect prevents implementation of the grandparent act.

B. Constitutionality of Grandparents Act

Petitioners assert that the grandparent act is unconstitutional, on its face and in application, based on the recent ruling of the United States Supreme Court in Troxel. 530 U.S. 57. Under consideration in Troxel was the following broadly worded two-sentence statute: "Any person may petition the court for visitation rights at any time including, but not limited to, custody proceedings. The court may order visitation rights for any person when visitation may serve the best interest of the child whether or not there has been any change of circumstances." Wash. Rev. Code § 26.10.160(3) (1994). While agreeing with the Washington Supreme Court's conclusion that the grandparent visitation provision unconstitutionally infringed on a parent's right to rear his/her children, the United States Supreme Court repeatedly articulated that its finding of unconstitutionality resulted from the manner in which the Washington statute was applied and was not a ruling that the Washington statute, or all such statutes providing for non-parental visitation, are unconstitutional per se. 530 U.S. at 73.

After discussing the underlying basis of the liberty interest[15] that is implicated with a parent's rights concerning the care, custody, and control of her children, the Court proceeded to consider what had ensued in the Troxel case. In response to the paternal grandparents' request that they be granted visitation rights with their two granddaughters,[16] the trial court, based mostly on his own positive experiences as a [15]The source of this liberty interest is the Fourteenth Amendment's proscription on depriving "any person of life, liberty, or property." Troxel, 530 U.S. at 65; see also Santosky v. Kramer, 455 U.S. 745, 753 (1982) (discussing "[t]he fundamental liberty interest of natural parents in the care, custody, and management of their child"). This Court has recognized the existence of a liberty interest with regard to various issues concerning the parent/child relationship. See State ex rel. Jeanette H. v. Pancake, 207 W.Va. 154, 161, 529 S.E.2d 865, 872 (2000) (stating that "it is . . . well established that a parent has a constitutionally protected liberty interest in retaining custody of his or her child and is, therefore, entitled to certain due process protections when the State seeks to terminate the parent/child relationship"); Overfield v. Collins, 199 W.Va. 27, 34, 483 S.E.2d 27, 34 (1996) (recognizing that natural parent "acquires a liberty interest in maintaining a substantial parental relationship with her children vis-à-vis third parties"); State ex rel. Roy Allen S. v. Stone, 196 W.Va. 624, 631-33, 474 S.E.2d 554, 561-63 (1996) (recognizing that liberty, within meaning of Due Process Clause, embraces rights of parenthood and holding that father had liberty interest in maintaining established parent-child relationship, regardless of whether relationship was within traditional and official parameters); Syl. Pt. 1, In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973) (holding that "[i]n the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions").

[16]The mother of the children wanted to limit the grandparents to one short visit per month and child,[17] determined that it would be in the best interests of the children to have expanded contact with their grandparents and ordered that the grandparents could have one weekend of visitation per month, one week in the summer, and time on both of the petitioning grandparents' birthdays. 530 U.S. at 71.

In attacking the trial court's ruling in Troxel, the Supreme Court heavily criticized the lower court's alteration of the burden of proof:

> The problem here is not that the Washington Superior Court intervened, but that when it did so, it gave no special weight at all to Granville's [mother's] determination of her daughters' best interests. More importantly, it appears that the Superior Court applied exactly the opposite presumption. . . . In effect, the judge placed on Granville, the fit custodial parent, the burden of disproving that visitation would be in the best interest of her daughters.

530 U.S. at 69. Rather than requiring the grandparents to prove that visitation would be in the best interests of the children, the trial court reversed this burden and imposed it on the children's mother, the non-petitioning party.

special holidays. In their petition, the grandparents sought to obtain visitation rights comprised of two weekends per month and two full weeks in the summer.

[17]The trial court opined that:

> "I look back on some personal experiences . . . .We always spen[t] as kids a week with one set of grandparents and another set of grandparents, [and] it happened to work out in our family that [it] turned out to be an enjoyable experience. Maybe that can, in this family, if that is how it works out."

530 U.S. at 72.

Also critical to the ruling in Troxel was the failure of the Washington Supreme Court to give the statute at issue a more narrow interpretation. The high Court found disfavor with the fact that the Washington statute "contains no requirement that a court accord the parent's decision any presumption of validity or any weight whatsoever." 530 U.S. at 67. The Supreme Court also disliked the fact that the Washington statute, unlike the West Virginia act, was so broadly written that it applied to any third party and was not limited to grandparents or other parties who had a specific relationship with the child[ren] in issue. Id. Given the absence of any limiting factors within the statute or any interpretational limitations imposed by the Washington Supreme Court, the Court in Troxel was concerned with the inevitability of a judge imposing his own "best interest" standard and totally disregarding the stated preferences of the parent where there had been no showing of unfitness with regard to that parent. Id.

Despite all these shortcomings--a broadly written statute that provided for no consideration of the parent's preferences and which permitted the trial court to apply whatever factors the trial court deemed appropriate in determining the pivotal issue of best interests--the United States Supreme Court did not conclude that the Washington statute was unconstitutional per se, but only as applied to the facts of that particular case. Explaining its decision, the Court stated:

> Because we rest our decision on the sweeping breadth of § 26.10.160(3) and the application of that broad, unlimited power in this case, we do not consider the primary constitutional question passed on by the Washington Supreme Court--whether the Due Process Clause requires all nonparental visitation statutes to include a showing of harm or potential harm to the child as a condition precedent to granting visitation. We do not, and need not, define today the precise scope of the parental due process right in the visitation context. In this respect, we agree with Justice Kennedy that the constitutionality of any standard for awarding > visitation turns on the specific manner in which that standard is applied and that the constitutional protections in this area are best 'elaborated with care.' Because much state-court adjudication in this context occurs on a case-by-case basis, we would be hesitant to hold that specific non-parental visitation statutes violate the Due Process Clause as a per se matter.

530 U.S. at 73 (emphasis supplied).

After discussing the deficiencies of the Washington statute with regard to its "fail[ure] to provide any protection for Granville's [mother's] fundamental constitutional right to make decisions concerning the rearing of her own daughters," the United States Supreme Court identified, with seeming approval, the statutes of seven other states and noted specific language contained in those statutes that stood in contrast to the Washington statute. See Troxel, 530 U.S. at 70, citing, inter alia, Me. Rev. Stat. Ann. 19A § 1803(3) (1998) (providing that court may award grandparent visitation if in best interest of child and "would not significantly interfere with any parent-child relationship or with the parent's rightful authority over the child"); Minn. Stat. § 257.022(2)(a)(2) (1998) (providing that court may award grandparent visitation if in best interest of child and "such visitation would not interfere with the parent-child relationship"); Neb. Rev. Stat. § 43-1802(2) (1998) (requiring that court must find "by clear and convincing evidence" that grandparent visitation "will not adversely interfere with the parent-child relationship").

The West Virginia statutory scheme stands in stark contrast to the simplistic and broadly-worded two-sentence Washington statute scrutinized in Troxel. As an initial matter, our statute does not permit just "any person" to file a petition under the act. See W.Va. Code § 48-2B-3 (providing that only grandparents can seek visitation under W.Va. act). In addition to setting forth the axiomatic standard of best interests by which any visitation decisions are to be made under the act, section five of our act requires a correspondent affirmative determination that such visitation "would not substantially interfere with the parent-child relationship." W.Va. Code § 48-2B-5(a). As an aid to making this joint determination of best interests and lack of substantial interference with the parent-child relationship, the Legislature has delineated twelve specific and one general factor for the trial court's consideration of this weighty issue. Those factors are:

> (1) The age of the child;
> (2) The relationship between the child and the grandparent;
> (3) The relationship between each of the child's parents or the person with whom the child is residing and the grandparent;
> (4) The time which has elapsed since the child last had contact with the grandparent;
> (5) The effect that such visitation will have on the relationship between the child and the child's parents or the person with whom the child is residing;
> (6) If the parents are divorced or separated, the custody and visitation arrangement which exists between the parents with regard to the child;
> (7) The time available to the child and his or her parents, giving consideration to such matters as each parent's employment schedule, the child's schedule for home, school and community activities, and the child's and parents' holiday and vacation schedule;
> (8) The good faith of the grandparent in filing the motion or petition;
> (9) Any history of physical, emotional or sexual abuse or neglect being performed, procured, assisted or condoned by the grandparent;
> (10) Whether the child has, in the past, resided with the grandparent for a significant period or periods of time, with or without the child's parent or parents; or > (11) Whether the grandparent has, in the past, been a significant caretaker for the child, regardless of whether the child resided inside or outside of the grandparent's residence.
> (12) The preference of the parents with regard to the requested visitation; and

(13) Any other factor relevant to the best interests of the child.

W.Va. Code § 48-2B-5(b) (1) - (13) (emphasis supplied). A final significant difference between our statute and the Washington statute is the inclusion of a burden of proof standard requiring grandparent(s) seeking visitation to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the requested visitation "is in the best interest of the child." W.Va. Code § 48-2B-7(a), (c).

In light of these extensive and significant improvements over the Washington statute, we find Petitioners' statement that "[e]ach of the deficiencies the Supreme Court identified in the Washington statute is present in W.Va. Code § 48-2B-1, et seq." to be without merit. Placing unwarranted importance on the numerical placement of parental preference as the twelfth factor for the trial court's consideration, Petitioners first suggest that this placement denotes a lessening of the factor's constitutional significance. In addition, Petitioners argue that the location of parental preference towards the bottom of the list somehow indicates that this particular factor is a co-equal factor to be weighted equally with the other twelve factors. Unlike Petitioners, we find nothing in the legislative delineation of these factors in section 5 of the act that suggests either that the factors are to be given equal weight or that a parent's preference on the issue of visitation is not to be accorded any enhanced consideration. In reviewing the Washington statute in Troxel, the United States Supreme Court suggested that if the Washington Supreme Court had interpreted the statute at issue in a narrower fashion the high Court's ruling of unconstitutionality might have been avoided. 530 U.S. at 67. While the instant petition for a writ of prohibition does not present the opportunity for us to determine the amount of weight that should attach to the factor of parental preference,[18] we note that in light of the Troxel decision it is clear that "the court must accord at least some special weight to the parent's own determination" provided that the parent has not been shown to be unfit. 530 U.S. at 70.

After comparing the provisions of our grandparent act with the flaws identified by the Court in Troxel, we conclude that the act, by its terms, does not violate the substantive due process right of liberty extended to a parent in connection with his/her right to exercise care, custody, and control of his/her child[ren] without undue interference from the state. See Troxel, 530 U.S. at 65-66. Our statutory scheme addresses almost every concern addressed by the Court in Troxel and many of those concerns are alleviated outright by the overarching standard that requires all visitation decisions to be reached by applying a two-prong standard of best interests and lack of substantial interference with the parent-child relationship. See W.Va. Code § 48-2B-5(a). Moreover, we are convinced that the Legislature both anticipated and provided for the proper consideration of the parent's liberty interest within the parameters of the Troxel ruling. This is demonstrated both by the listing of parental preference as a factor that directly bears on the issue of visitation and, perhaps even more importantly, by the legislatively-imposed requirement that any grant of visitation must be preceded by an express affirmative finding that the visitation "w[ill] not substantially interfere with the parent-child relationship." Id. Thus, because our act expressly requires consideration of parental preference and because no grant of visitation can be accomplished without an initial determination that such visitation will not detrimentally affect the parent-child relationship, the constitutional deficiencies presented by the Washington statute at issue in Troxel are not present here. Accordingly, we reject Petitioners' suggestion that the act is constitutionally deficient on its face given the inclusion of parental preference within a list of other factors for the trial court's consideration on the issue of visitation. And, given the procedural phase of this matter, we have no basis from which to make any finding that the act is unconstitutional in application since the statutory provisions under discussion have yet to be applied to reach any determination as to the ultimate issue of visitation.

[18]Petitioners criticize the circuit court for not affording the requisite level of deference to their preference on the issue of visitation. It is premature, however, for Petitioners to argue that the lower court has ignored their preference on the issue as no evidentiary proceeding has taken place which would require the lower court's consideration of the factors set out in section five of the act. See W.Va. Code 48-2B-5.

Although we find no impediment to Respondents' standing and thus to enforcement of the lower court's order directing that the matter proceed to an evidentiary hearing, we wish to make clear that our decision on standing has no bearing on the more difficult issues yet to be resolved: whether an award of visitation is in the best interests of the child and will not substantially interfere with the parent-child relationship. See W.Va. Code § 48-2B-5. While the Legislature has clearly opened the courthouse doors in granting circuit courts jurisdiction to consider petitions for grandparent visitation, the Legislature has also enumerated a considerable set of factors that bear on this weighty issue of visitation. See id. One of those factors, which is deserving of discussion today, and which has been used by this Court in resolving issues of contact between children and relatives in various domestic settings, is whether there has been an established relationship between the child and his/her relative prior to the subject litigation.[19] See W.Va.

Code § 48-2B-5(b)(2). Obviously, a grandparent who has an established relationship with his/her grandchild will be in a better position when the trial court is asked to rule upon the issue of visitation, than one who has just appeared out of the blue, or with little history of contact, and is now seeking to gain visitation rights.[20] As the Supreme Court recognized in Troxel, the motivating factor for the creation of grandparent visitation statutes was a legislative recognition of the societal need "to ensure the welfare of the children therein by protecting the relationships those children form with . . . third parties" such as grandparents. 530 U.S. at 64. And underpinning all of these statutes is "a recognition, which varies from State to State, that children should have the opportunity to benefit from relationships with statutorily specified persons--for example, their grandparents." 530 U.S. at 64; see also Kessel v. Leavitt, 204 W.Va. 95, 197, 511 S.E.2d 720, 822 (1998) (stating that "[i]n recent years, the recognized rights of grandparents have continued to expand through both statutory definition and judicial interpretation"), cert. denied, 525 U.S. 1142 (1999). Despite this legislative recognition of the important role that grandparents

S.E.2d 548, 554 (1996) (directing circuit court on remand that no matter who becomes child's primary custodian, "he has the right to a continued relationship with both his grandmother and his mother"); Syl. Pt. 2, in part, Roy Allen S., 196 W.Va. 624, 474 S.E.2d 554 (1996) (holding that "although an unwed father's biological link to his child does not, in and of itself, guarantee him a constitutional stake in his relationship with that child, such a link combined with a substantial parent-child relationship will do so"); Kenneth L. W. v. Tamyra S. W., 185 W.Va. 675, 680, 408 S.E.2d 625, 630 (1991) (recognizing importance of stability and continuity in child's life in child custody setting and stating that "[t]his continuity is especially important if a grandparent or other relative has been the caregiver"); Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W.Va. 448, 452-53, 388 S.E.2d 322, 325-26 (1989) (discussing need to provide for transition period in change of custody cases as well as the rights of visitation with a stepparent or half-sibling and stating that "[t]aking away continued contact with . . . important figures in . . . [a child's life] would be detrimental to her stability and well-being").

can play in the lives of children, a grandparent who seeks to avail him or herself of this statutorily-granted mechanism for seeking visitation must be able to demonstrate that the visitation being sought will be in the best interest of the child[ren] and will not substantially interfere with the parent-child relationship. See W.Va. Code § 48-2B-5(a). This will be very difficult to do in cases where adoptions have preceded the petitions seeking visitation unless the petitioning grandparent[s] can demonstrate to the trial court's satisfaction, within the guidelines and standards established by the Legislature, that such visitation is likely to be a positive factor in the child's life and will not unduly disrupt the child's relationship with his/her parent(s). And, as we emphasized previously, in the absence of an established relationship between the grandparent[s] and the child[ren], it will be most difficult to meet the statutory standards imposed under the act.[21]

We perceive that the statutory scheme for grandparent visitation--which provides for two ultimate determinations by the trial court, related both to the best interests of the child[ren] involved and to the protection of the parent-child relationship from any significant interference--constitutes a workable means by which the legitimate interests of the child[ren] in maintaining a viable relationship with their

[21]This is why we have considered and rejected the argument advanced by the dissent that our ruling in this case will have a chilling effect on adoptions. Adoptions that take place outside the immediate family are clearly beyond the scope of this opinion as the Legislature has made clear that visitation should not be continued in such instances. See W.Va. Code § 48-2B-9(b). And in those cases where adoptions occur within the immediate family and no visitation order was obtained pre-adoption, the issue of granting grandparent visitation is controlled by a host of factors that will still only result in awards of visitation in those rare instances where grandparents can demonstrate that such visitation is in the child's best interest and will not interfere with the parent-child relationship. We simply do not foresee either the end of adoptions or a consequential rash of ensuing litigation from grandparents seeking visitation rights as a result of this opinion.

grandparent[s] and the liberty interests of parents relative to the care, custody, and control of their children can be effectively examined, protected, and promoted. Under the statutory scheme adopted by the Legislature, which provides for a hearing on the issue of whether reasonable visitation rights should be granted, there is no question that Respondents are entitled to present their evidence and be heard. We wish to emphasize that our ruling today has done nothing to change the availability of the court system to grandparents seeking visitation rights. Consistent with our obligation to uphold a legislative enactment as constitutional when at all possible, we have merely recognized the broad grant of standing[22] extended to grandparents by the Legislature under the act. See Syl. Pt. 1, State ex rel. Appalachian Power Co. v. Gainer, 149 W.Va. 740, 143 S.E.2d 351 (1965) (stating that "[e]very reasonable construction must be resorted to by the courts in order to sustain constitutionality, and any reasonable doubt must be resolved in favor of the constitutionality of the legislative enactment in question"). Thus, rather than making new law, we have merely interpreted the act's existing provisions in light of the pronouncements made by the United States Supreme Court in Troxel. And, as discussed in full above, we have found West Virginia's act to be well within the constitutional concerns addressed in Troxel, given the act's specific identification of parental preference as a factor which directly impacts on the issue of visititation. We note particularly that the grandparent visitation permitted by the Legislature here cannot be ordered by the circuit court without an affirmative finding that such visitation will not cause a substantial interference in the parent-child relationship, as well as an affirmative finding that such visitation meets the traditional test of serving the best interests of the child. In short, if the circumstances fail either prong of that legislatively-defined test, then the plea for grandparent visitation fails. See W.Va. Code § 48-2B-5(a).

While it would certainly be preferable for the adults involved in these visitation issues to reach an agreed and written accommodation, with or without the formal approval of a court order, we recognize that this will not always be the case. In those, hopefully few, cases where the matter cannot be resolved without a court deciding one or more of the issues, it appears to this Court that the statute under consideration provides a comprehensive and fair means by which the best interests of the child[ren] and the relationships with their respective parent[s] or grandparent[s] can be protected from harm resulting either from the inconsiderate or excessive demands of grandparents or the obstinate or unreasonable and insignificant objections of parents, any of which may, on occasion, be driven more by emotion than pursuit of the proper interests of the children and their parents. Because we recognize the likely sensitivity and difficulty of such circumstances, we urge the lower courts to be particularly attentive to the need for careful and complete findings of fact and conclusions of law when ruling on actions brought under this act. See W.Va. Code § 48-2B-8(a) (requiring written findings of fact and conclusions of law).

Finding no basis for issuing the requested writ of prohibition, we hereby deny Petitioners' request for extraordinary relief.

Writ denied.

Davis, J., dissenting:

Before the deliverance of the majority's decision herein, an order of adoption was considered to be a complete divestiture of an adoptee's former familial and legal ties and the creation of a unique adoptive family unit with correspondingly new legal relationships among those family members. The Opinion in the case sub judice, though, not only unsettles the once certain world of adoption, causing adoptees and adopters alike to constantly question the security of their court-established rights, it also contravenes the preeminent law of this State which dictates the applicability of new pronouncements of law. For these reasons, I respectfully dissent.

A. Finality

The first source of contention I have with the majority's opinion is its resolute disregard of the heretofore understood force and effect of adoption orders: finality. "Finality is of the utmost importance in an adoption." State ex rel. Smith v. Abbot, 187 W. Va. 261, 266, 418 S.E.2d 575, 580 (1992). In this respect, it has been stated that > of his natural mother or father. Custody of children and child support are matters that remain within the breast of the court and are subject to change and modification so long as a child is a minor. This is not true of adoptions. Once an order of adoption becomes final, the natural parent is divested of all legal rights and obligations with respect to the child, and the child is free from all legal obligations of obedience and maintenance in respect to them. The child, to all intents and purposes, becomes the child of the person adopting him or her to the same extent as if the child had been born to the adopting parent in lawful wedlock.

> [t]he most drastic and far-reaching action that can be taken by a court of equity is to enter a final order of adoption. Such an order severing the ties between a parent and a child is as final, and often as devastating, as though the child had been delivered at birth to a stranger instead of into the arms

14A Michie's Jurisprudence Parent and Child § 27, at 285 (2001) (emphasis added) (footnote omitted). These sentiments are echoed by the adoption law of this State which proclaims that > [u]pon the entry of [an] order of adoption, any person previously entitled to parental rights, any parent or parents by any previous legal adoption, and the lineal or collateral kindred of any such person, parent or parents, except any such person or parent who is the husband or wife of the petitioner for adoption, shall be divested of all legal rights, including the right of inheritance from or through the adopted child under the statutes of descent and distribution of this State, and shall be divested of all obligations in respect to the said adopted child, and the said adopted child shall be free from all legal obligations, including obedience and maintenance, in respect to such person, parent or parents. From and after the entry of such order of adoption, the adopted child shall be, to all intents and for all purposes, the legitimate issue of the person or persons so adopting him or her and shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges and subject to all the obligations of a natural child of such adopting parent or parents.

W. Va. Code § 48-4-11(a) (1984) (Repl. Vol. 1999). Accord W. Va. Code § 48-4-9(d) (1997) (Repl. Vol. 1999). Likewise, the culmination of an adoption proceeding, which is evidenced by the order of adoption, is held to be inviolate, except in certain enumerated, and quite limited, circumstances:

> (a) An order or decree of adoption is a final order for purposes of appeal to the supreme court of appeals on the date when the order is entered. An order or decree of adoption for any other purpose is final upon the expiration of the time for filing an appeal when no appeal is filed or when an appeal is not timely filed, or upon the date of the denial or dismissal of any appeal which has been timely filed.

(b) An order or decree of adoption may not be vacated, on any ground, if a petition to vacate the judgment is filed more than six months after the date the order is final.

(c) If a challenge is brought within the six-month period by an individual who did not receive proper notice of the proceedings pursuant to the provisions of this chapter, the court shall deny the challenge, unless the individual proves by clear and convincing evidence that the decree or order is not in the best interest of the child.

(d) A decree or order entered under this chapter may not be vacated or set aside upon application of a person who waived notice, or who was properly served with notice pursuant to this chapter and failed to respond or appear, file an answer or file a claim of paternity within the time allowed.

(e) A decree or order entered under this chapter may not be vacated or set aside upon application of a person alleging there is a failure to comply with an agreement for visitation or communication with the adopted child: Provided, That the court may hear a petition to enforce the agreement, in which case the court shall determine whether enforcement of the agreement would serve the best interests of the child. The court may, in its sole discretion, consider the position of a child of the age and maturity to express such position to the court.

(f) The supreme court of appeals shall consider and issue rulings on any petition for appeal from an order or decree of adoption and petitions for appeal from any other order entered pursuant to the provisions of this article as expeditiously as possible. The circuit court shall consider and issue rulings on any petition filed to vacate an order or decree of adoption and any other pleadings or petitions filed in connection with any adoption proceeding as expeditiously as possible.

(g) When any minor has been adopted, he or she may, within one year after becoming of age, sign, seal and acknowledge before proper authority, in the county in which the order of adoption was made, a dissent from such adoption, and file such instrument of dissent in the office of the clerk of the circuit court which granted said adoption. The clerk of the county commission of such county and the circuit clerk shall record and > index the same. The adoption shall be vacated upon the filing of such instrument of dissent.

W. Va. Code § 48-4-12 (1997) (Repl. Vol. 1999).

As is evidenced by the above-quoted authorities, once the proceedings surrounding an adoption have been concluded, the ultimate import of the court's final order of adoption is just that---to serve as a final and complete resolution of the adoptee's former and forthcoming familial and legal relationships, thereby providing him/her with the comfort and knowledge of future certainty. Despite this legislatively intended result, however, the majority of this Court has, in just one Opinion, completely obviated the security attending the conclusion of adoption proceedings by allowing grandparents, who had no prior order of visitation,[1] to petition the court for such an order at any time, even after the entry of a final

[1]This fact is significant as both the grandparent visitation statutes and the adoption laws suggest that a grandparent who has previously been granted visitation with his/her grandchild has at least nominal rights to continue such a relationship following the grandchild's adoption. See W. Va. Code § 48-2B-9 (1998) (Repl. Vol. 1999) (noting, in subsection (a), that "[t]he remarriage of the custodial parent of a child does not affect the authority of a circuit court to grant reasonable visitation to any grandparent," but further admonishing, in subsection (b), that "[i]f a child who is subject to a visitation order under this article is later adopted, the order for grandparent visitation is automatically vacated when the order for adoption is entered, unless the adopting parent is a stepparent, grandparent or other relative of the child"); W. Va. Code § 48-4-8(a)(3) (1997) (Repl. Vol. 1999) (requiring notice of adoption be given to "[a]ny person other than the petitioner . . . who has visitation rights with the child under an existing court order issued by a court in this or another state"); W. Va. Code § 48-4-12(e) (1997) (Repl. Vol. 1999) (observing that "[a] decree or order [of adoption] may not be vacated or set aside upon application of a person alleging there is a failure to comply with an agreement for visitation or communication with the adopted child," but allowing "[t]hat the court may hear a petition to enforce the agreement, in which case the court shall determine whether enforcement of the agreement would serve the best interests of the child"). But compare W. Va. Code § 48-2B-3 (1998) (Repl. Vol. 1999) ("A grandparent of a child residing in this state may, by motion or petition, make application to the circuit court of the county in which that child resides for an order granting visitation with his or her grandchild.") with W. Va. Code § 48-2B-7(c) adoption order.

By reaching the decision announced herein, the majority has permitted grandparents, in general, to petition courts for visitation with their former grandchildren after their familial relationship has been terminated as a result of the grandchild's adoption. See W. Va. Code § 48-4-11(a) (explaining change in familial relationships upon entry of final adoption order). As the adoption will have likewise divested these former grandparents of their kinship with their former grandchild, however, they simply would have no standing under the governing statutes to pursue such a claim---a simple observation which the Court's Opinion deftly ignores. See id. See also W. Va. Code § 48-2B-2(2) (1998) (Repl. Vol. 1999) (defining "[g]randparent" as "a biological grandparent, a person married or previously married to a biological grandparent, or a person who has previously been granted custody of the parent of a minor child with whom visitation is sought", but omitting a former grandparent from such definition). I find this result to be particularly absurd considering the majority's lengthy discussion of the respondent grandparents' standing in the case sub judice, see supra Section III.A, and their ultimate finding of such standing in spite of the respondents' son's relinquishment of his parental rights and their grandchild's subsequent adoption.

(1998) (Repl. Vol. 1999) (suggesting that petition for grandparent visitation will not be granted in certain circumstances where "there is a presumption that visitation privileges need not be extended to the grandparent if the parent through whom the grandparent is related to the grandchild . . . exercises visitation privileges with the child that would allow participation in the visitation by the grandparent if the parent so chose").

Moreover, my colleagues suggest, at the end of Section III.A of the majority Opinion, supra, that the Legislature could have amended the adoption statutes to address the present scenario and that their failure to do so necessitates reliance solely on the grandparent visitation statutes. See W. Va. Code § 48-2B-1 (1998) (Repl. Vol. 1999) (providing that "[i]t is the express intent of the Legislature that the provisions for grandparent visitation that are set forth in this article are exclusive"). Neither do I agree with this conclusion. Rather, I am of the opinion that the long-standing rule of statutory construction resolves this quandary: inclusio unius est exclusio alterius. This doctrine, which means that "'"one is the exclusion of the others[,]" . . . informs courts to exclude from operation those items not included in the list of elements that are given effect expressly by statutory language.'" Keatley v. Mercer County Bd. of Educ., 200 W. Va. 487, 491 n.6, 490 S.E.2d 306, 310 n.6 (1997) (quoting State ex rel. Roy Allen S. v. Stone, 196 W. Va. 624, 630 n.11, 474 S.E.2d 554, 560 n.11 (1996)). Accord State v. Lewis, 195 W. Va. 282, 288 n.12, 465 S.E.2d 384, 390 n.12 (1995).

Because the adoption statutes at issue herein do, in fact, address the issue of grandparent visitation in adoption proceedings,[2] it seems to me that the Legislature's refusal to speak further on this topic indicates its decision to foreclose any further intervention in adoption proceedings by grandparents or other individuals who seek to assert a purported right to visitation with the adoptee. Given that the respondents' claim does not come within the rubric of intervenors contemplated by the adoption statutes, I would submit that they lack standing to pursue visitation with Alexander David and that the final order of adoption should be allowed to remain undisturbed by further proceedings that are not sanctioned by the governing statutory law.

B. Prospective Application

The second issue on which I part company with my brethren herein is the proposed application of the instant Opinion. While my colleagues adhere to the belief that this decision should be given retroactive effect, the applicable law supports only the prospective application of the Court's holding. Typically, the prospective/retroactive dilemma is resolved through the contemplation of several factors

> In determining whether to extend full retroactivity, the following factors are to be considered: First, the nature of the substantive issue overruled must be determined. If the issue involves a traditionally settled area of law, such as contracts or property as distinguished from torts, and the new rule was not clearly foreshadowed, then retroactivity is less justified. Second, where the overruled decision deals with procedural law rather than substantive, retroactivity ordinarily will be more readily accorded. Third, common law decisions, when overruled, may result in the overruling decision being given retroactive effect, since the substantive issue usually has a narrower impact and is likely to involve fewer parties. Fourth, where, on the other hand, substantial public issues are involved, arising from statutory or constitutional interpretations that represent a clear departure from prior precedent, prospective application will ordinarily be favored. Fifth, the more radically the new decision departs from previous substantive law, the greater the need for limiting retroactivity. Finally, this Court will also look to the precedent of other courts which have determined the retroactive/prospective question in the same area of the law in their overruling decisions.

Syl. pt. 5, Bradley v. Appalachian Power Co., 163 W. Va. 332, 256 S.E.2d 879 (1979) (emphasis added). Among these enumerated criteria, I am most concerned with the fourth and fifth factors which address the difficulties attending the majority's decision in this case insofar as it represents a dramatic departure from the existing statutory law regulating adoptions and grandparental visitation rights.

In the proceedings underlying the instant appeal, it appears that Alexander David's biological parents, Carol Jo L. and David Allen C., complied with the statutory requirements for obtaining consent to and giving notice of Brandon L.'s prospective adoption of his stepson. See W. Va. Code § 48-4-3 (1997) (Repl. Vol. 1999) (delineating persons from whom consent to adopt is required); W. Va. Code § 48-4-8 (1997) (Repl. Vol. 1999) (listing individuals entitled to notice of adoption proceedings). Nowhere in these statutes, however, is there a requirement that persons in the position of the respondent grandparents, who did not have any court-established rights to visitation with their grandson, must give their consent to such an adoption or be notified of the proceedings therein. Thus, it appears that the parties to Alexander David's adoption proceedings complied with the law then in existence and, as a result thereof, should have been able to enjoy the protections provided thereby upon their conclusion. See, e.g., W. Va. Code § 48-4-11(a) (describing finality of adoption proceedings). The majority's decision in the case sub judice, though, usurps any reliance Carol Jo L., David Allen C., or Brandon L., not to mention Alexander David, could reasonably have placed upon the final resolution of Alexander David's adoption by creating, in the child's grandparents, rights not heretofore contained in the applicable statutory law.

By allowing retroactive application of the instant decision, the majority has effectively amended the statutory law governing both adoption and grandparents' visitation rights to include a class of grandparents never contemplated by either of these promulgations. Primarily, the consent and notice provisions of the adoption laws of this State are designed to shield parents and children alike from difficulties that may arise when persons who have protected interests have not been made parties to such proceedings. Perhaps no case in this Court's recent history illustrates this point more poignantly than Kessel v. Leavitt, 204 W. Va. 95, 511 S.E.2d 720 (1998), cert. denied, 525 U.S. 1142, 119 S. Ct. 1035, 143 L. Ed. 2d 43 (1999), wherein a biological mother's failure to notify her child's biological father of their son's adoption resulted in protracted litigation in this Court on claims of tortious interference and fraud nearly seven years after the child's birth and when the child's adoptive fate had long been sealed. As further insurance against late-asserted claims, the Legislature has additionally included within the list of those persons entitled to notice of adoption proceedings "[a]ny person . . . who has visitation rights with the child under an existing court order issued by a court in this or another state." W. Va. Code § 48-4-8(a)(3). Similarly, in the off chance that such persons either have not been properly notified or that the visitation order has not been effective in securing visitation with the adoptee post-adoption, these individuals are allowed a rare opportunity to seek relief from the court in an otherwise finalized matter. See W. Va. Code § 48-4-12(e). When, however, the virtual floodgates are opened to allow grandparents, such as the respondents herein, to request visitation rights following the conclusion of adoption proceedings where they had no pre-existing right thereto, the scope of persons with protected interests contemplated by this State's adoption laws has been compromised and a novel application of the law has been created. Both of these results dictate giving the majority's Opinion prospective effect.

Moreover, the Court's decision herein drastically changes the scope of persons entitled to pursue visitation in accordance with the grandparents' visitation statutes. As I discussed in Section A., supra, the entry of a final order of adoption effectively changes the legal and familial relationships of the parties thereto by divesting the pre-adoption lineages and obligations and replacing them with ties indicative of the post-adoption state of affairs. Among the divestitures that take place in the course of an adoption are those of "the lineal or collateral kindred of any" person who was previously entitled to parental rights. W. Va. Code § 48-4-11(a). Thus, as a result of Brandon L.'s adoption of Alexander David, David Allen C.'s parental rights to his son were relinquished and those rights of his parents, the respondent grandparents, if any such rights existed, were likewise extinguished. The effect of the majority's holding, however, has been to miraculously restore the respondents's former kinship status as the child's grandparents upon the Court's decision to grant them standing to pursue their claims for visitation with their former grandson. Accordingly, then, the majority's Opinion will have the effect of expanding the Legislature's definition of a "grandparent" to include those persons who formerly enjoyed that status despite the subsequent adoption of their grandchild and their divestiture of such familial status by the statutes governing that adoption. Cf. W. Va. Code § 48-2B-2(2). Since this alteration in the grandparent visitation statutes also represents a dramatic departure from the previously established law in this field, the majority's pronouncement thereof should be applied prospectively only.

Accordingly, for the foregoing reasons, I respectfully dissent. I am authorized to state that Justice Maynard joins me in this dissenting opinion.

SYLLABUS

"When this Court reviews challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, a two-prong deferential standard of review is applied. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard." Syllabus Point 1, McCormick v. Allstate Insurance Company, 197 W. Va. 415, 475 S.E.2d 507 (1996).

Per Curiam:

This is an appeal by the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources from an order of the Circuit Court of McDowell County dismissing a child abuse and neglect action and directing that Brandon Lee B., the infant named in the petition, be returned to his mother. On appeal, the Department of Health and Human Resources argues that the evidence in the case is clear and convincing that Brandon Lee B.'s mother has neglected him, and is unfit to have custody of him, and that under the circumstances, the circuit court erred in dismissing the Department's petition.

FACTS

On October 22, 1999, the relator, Brandon Lee B., was born three months premature. At the time of birth, he weighed one pound, two ounces, and subsequent to his birth, he spent several months in intensive care at Women and Children's Hospital in Charleston, West Virginia.

Brandon Lee B.'s mother, Carrie Q. B., is from Fort Wayne, Indiana. Apparently, while living in a juvenile group home, she established a relationship with Brandon Lee B.'s putative father, Ahmed A., an Iraqi immigrant, and as soon as she turned 18, she moved into Ahmed A.'s home.

While in the home of Ahmed A., Carrie Lee B. became involved in a series of acts of physical violence, which included a domestic assault on Ahmed A. One of the instances resulted in Carrie Lee B. being charged with felony battery upon a police officer.

At length, Ahmed A. drove Carrie Q. B., who was then pregnant with Brandon Lee B., to McDowell County, West Virginia, where she hoped to live with her biological parents. Shortly after meeting her biological parents, Carrie Q. B. met Cecil Lee B., a McDowell County man who was a total stranger. The next day, she married him. The marriage was not successful, and Carrie Q. B. sought refuge at an abuse shelter near Welch, West Virginia.

It became apparent that Carrie Q. B. was going to give birth to Brandon Lee B. prematurely, and she was transferred to Women and Children's Hospital at Charleston, West Virginia, where Brandon Lee B. was born on October 22, 1999. After Brandon Lee B.'s birth, Carrie Q. B. returned to McDowell County, and Brandon Lee B. remained in intensive care at Women and Children's Hospital.

The evidence in the present case shows that for six weeks after Carrie Q. B. returned to McDowell County, a social worker unsuccessfully begged her to return to Charleston to bond with Brandon Lee B. and to authorize various medical procedures for him.

At length, Carry Q. B. agreed to return to Charleston, and arrangements were made for her to live at the Ronald McDonald House in Charleston and be with the child. However, the day before she was to report to Charleston, she called an emergency communications center to report that warrants were pending against her in Indiana and arranged for her own arrest. She subsequently appeared in the Circuit Court of McDowell County and waived her right to contest extradition and returned to Indiana in custody.

After Carrie Q. B. failed to report to Charleston, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources filed a child neglect and abandonment petition. After receiving the petition, the circuit court made a preliminary finding of neglect and abandonment and awarded temporary legal and physical custody of Brandon Lee B. to the Department of Health and Human Resources on December 29, 1999. The court continued the proceedings for three months because Carrie Q. B. remained in jail. Subsequently, in March 2000, Carrie Q. B. entered guilty pleas to a felony charge of battery upon a police officer and the misdemeanor offense of domestic assault in Indiana, and she was placed on probation.

After Carrie Q. B. was placed on probation, her adoptive parents returned her to West Virginia, and on March 29, 2000, she visited Brandon Lee B. and his foster parents for an hour and a half. It appears that that visit was initiated by Carrie Q. B.'s parents. Carrie Q. B. did not again visit with Brandon Lee B. until she attended the adjudicatory hearing in the present proceeding on October 12, 2000.

On April 13, 2000, the Department of Health and Human Resources amended the child abuse and neglect petition and alleged that Carrie Q. B. was unfit to parent Brandon Lee B. safely, given his special needs. An adjudicatory hearing was set on the petition for June 28, 2000. Carrie Q. B. failed to appear at that hearing, and her attorney advised the court that he had received no communication from her for a lengthy period of time and that she had provided him with no new address or telephone number. As a consequence, the adjudicatory hearing was continued to October 12, 2000.

On October 12, 2000, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources presented evidence relating to the fitness of Carrie Q. B. to have custody of Brandon Lee B. Among other things, the evidence showed that Carrie Q. B. had a history of mental illness, of fetal alcohol syndrome, of oppositional defiant disorder, of post-traumatic stress disorder, of dissociative disorder, of bulimia, of dysthymia and of a borderline personality disorder. Carrie Q. B.'s adoptive mother testified that Carrie Q. B. was unpredictable and that she engaged in risky and reckless behavior including running away from home, numerous suicide attempts and violent relationships with men. Carrie Q. B.'s adoptive mother also testified that she believed that Carrie Q. B. could not be trusted to take care of herself, and that she was certainly not fit to care for a child with Brandon Lee B.'s special needs.

Child Protective Services workers testified that Brandon Lee B. had engaged in a life or death struggle while in intensive care at Women and Children's Hospital and that while he was engaged in that struggle, they had attempted without success to generate some interest in him from Carrie Q. B. Additionally, one of the workers testified that during her hour and a half visit with Brandon Lee B. on March 29, 2000, Carrie Q. B. had to be told how to hold Brandon Lee B., and further had to be told not to try to force him to accept pacifier when he did not want it. The social worker explained that Carrie Q. B. did not request another visit after the March 29, 2000, visit and in the next few months the worker could not maintain contact with her despite substantial efforts on his part.

Additional evidence adduced during the hearing included a negative home study of Brandon Lee B.'s birth father's home and evidence that the father could not attend the hearing because the father needed surgery to close a knife wound.

At the conclusion of the hearing, the circuit court ordered the record held open for an additional 15 days to allow any party to supplement the record with additional evidence.

During the 15-day period, the Department of Health and Human Resources filed medical reports which indicated that Brandon Lee B. had a crucial need for committed caretakers who could follow prescribed physical therapy and a special feeding regime. Records were also filed describing Carrie Q. B.'s mental limitations and emotional problems.

At the end of the 15-day period, the circuit court ordered that the child abuse and neglect petition be dismissed. In the order dismissing the case, the court recognized that the evidence relating to Carrie Q. B.'s ability to parent Brandon Lee B. was generally negative. The court stated: "To be blunt, the Mother, even when she is making her best efforts, is only minimally able to adequately take care of her own self, much less a small 'special needs' baby." The court, however, went on to say that W. Va. Code 49-6-2(c) required that a finding of neglect or abuse be based "upon conditions existing at the time of the filing of the Petition." In analyzing the evidence, the court, in effect, found that much of the evidence relating to Carrie Q. B.'s inability to care for Brandon Lee B. involved incidents and conditions which arose after the filing of the Department of Health and Human Resources' petition. In view of this, the court reached the conclusion that the Department of Health and Human Resources had not met the burden established by W. Va. Code 49-6-2(c).

In the present proceeding, the Department of Health and Human Resources contends that the circuit court erred in holding that it had not met its burden and erred in not granting its petition in this case.

II.
STANDARD OF REVIEW

In In Re: Beth Ann B., 204 W. Va. 424, 513 S.E.2d 472 (1998), this Court indicated that in a child abuse and neglect case the Court employs the two-pronged standard of review set forth in Syllabus Point 1 of McCormick v. Allstate Insurance Company, 197 W. Va. 415, 475 S.E.2d 507 (1996):

> When this Court reviews challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, a two-prong deferential standard of review is applied. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard.

III.
DISCUSSION

Although W. Va. Code 49-6-2(c) requires the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources in a child abuse or neglect case to prove conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition, this Court has indicated that a petition may be amended at any time before the final adjudicatory hearing. State v. Julie G., 201 W. Va. 764, 500 S.E.2d 877 (1997). Specifically, in Syllabus Point 4 of State v. Julie G., id., the Court stated:

> Under Rule 19 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, amendments to an abuse/neglect petition may be allowed at any time before the final adjudicatory hearing begins. When modification of an abuse/neglect petition is sought, the circuit court should grant such petition absent a showing that the adverse party will not be permitted sufficient time to respond to the amendment, consistent with the intent underlying Rule 19 to permit liberal amendment of abuse/neglect petitions.

In State v. Julie G., id., the Court noted that the circuit court believed that it was required to disregard facts that supported the initial concerns of the Protective Services worker because such facts were not discovered until after the filing of the petition. The Court indicated that this belief was erroneous and that the allegations in the petition should have been evaluated in light of the evidence of the mother's performance after the filing of the petition, but during the pre-adjudication period.

Unlike the situation in State v. Julie G., id., the court in the present case actually amended the petition to include in the scope of concern the conduct of Brandon Lee B.'s mother, Carrie Q. B., after the filing of the original petition.

Although State v. Julie G. indicates that a child abuse or neglect case must be decided upon conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition, or, by implication, in a case such as the present case, the amended petition, the clear import of State v. Julie G. is that facts developed after the filing of the petition, or amended petition, may be considered in evaluating the conditions which existed at the time of the filing of the petition or amended petition.

The clear thrust of the petition and amended petition in the present case is that Carrie Q. B. is unfit to be the mother of Brandon Lee B., especially in light of his need for medical and special nutritional care. The evidence adduced during the case shows that the health and possibly the very life of Brandon Lee B. depend upon his receiving appropriate and consistent medical and nutritional care. Although he apparently was receiving such care at the time of the filing of the petition, the care was being provided by the Department of Health and Human Resources rather than Carrie Q. B. The evidence subsequently developed, in this Court's view, clearly and convincingly shows that Carrie Q. B. at the time of the filing of the petition lacked, and still lacks, the stability, maturity, judgment and discipline necessary to provide the consistent care which Brandon Lee B. requires. Rather clearly, Carrie Q. B. has been unable to establish a stable home situation even for herself. At very best, she has demonstrated only a sporadic interest in Brandon Lee B., and she has demonstrated little initiative in establishing a relationship with Brandon Lee B. A fair reading of the record shows that she has been sporadic, at best, in maintaining any kind of contact with the parties involved in the life of Brandon Lee B.

Additionally, the record shows that Carrie Q. B. has a history of mental and emotional problems, that she has had minor problems with the criminal system, and that she needs assistance with her own life.

In State v. Krystal T., 185 W. Va. 391, 407 S.E.2d 395 (1991), this Court indicated that parents who do not adequately provide for a child's needs and are not sufficiently motivated or organized to provide for such needs on an ongoing basis should have their parental rights terminated.

This Court believes that the evidence does rather clearly show that Brandon Lee B.'s mother, Carrie Q. B., is not sufficiently motivated or organized to provide for Brandon Lee B.'s needs and that the evidence is sufficient to support a termination of her parental rights.

After examining the decision of the circuit court in this matter, this Court believes that the circuit court also essentially reached this conclusion. However, the Court believes that the circuit court erred in concluding that it could only consider the conduct of Carrie Q. B. at the time of the filing of the petition or prior thereto in determining the fitness of Carrie Q. B. to have custody of Brandon Lee B.

For the reasons stated, the judgment of the circuit court is reversed, and this case is remanded to the Circuit Court of McDowell County with directions that the circuit court terminate the parental rights of Carrie Q. B. to Brandon Lee B.

Reversed and remanded.

Albright, Justice, concurring in part and dissenting in part:

I concur with the majority's determination that the decision of the lower court in this matter should be reversed. The Department of Health and Human Resources presented evidence in the adjudicatory phase sufficient to warrant a finding of neglect. The determination of the appropriate next step, however, is the focus of my disagreement with the majority opinion.

While the extreme circumstances of this case may indeed warrant termination of parental rights, that determination must be made in conformity with the procedures outlined in the West Virginia Code, the West Virginia Rule of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, and the numerous opinions authored by this Court. As an appellate tribunal, this Court does not have authority to issue such a determination where the lower court has not proceeded to the dispositional hearing phase.[1] The timely, effective, and detailed procedures enumerated by statute, rule, and judicial opinion must be observed. As this Court so distinctly stated in syllabus point two of In re Beth Ann B., 204 W.Va. 424, 513 S.E.2d 472 (1998), "In a child abuse and/or neglect proceeding, even where the parties have stipulated to the predicate facts necessary for a termination of parental rights, a circuit court must hold a disposition hearing, in which the specific inquiries enumerated in Rules 33 and 35 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings are made, prior to terminating an individual's parental rights."

This Court explicitly stated in syllabus point two of In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973), that this is an issue of constitutional dimension: "West Virginia Code, Chapter 49, Article 6, Section 2, as amended, and the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions prohibit a court or other arm of the State from terminating the parental rights of a natural parent having legal custody of his child, without notice and the opportunity for a meaningful hearing."

This Court has characterized a dispositional hearing as a "mandatory prerequisite" to the termination of parental rights. Beth Ann B., 204 W.Va. at 428, 513 S.E.2d at 476. In our recent decision in State ex rel. Chastity D. v. Hill, 207 W.Va. 358, 532 S.E.2d 358 (2000), we held that "even where there are written relinquishments of parental rights, the circuit court is required to conduct a disposition hearing, pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5 (1999) and Rules 33 and 35 of the West

These rules and statutory guidelines are essential, and this Court has consistently treated them as mandatory. In syllabus point five of In re Edward B., ___ W.Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___, 2001 WL 1402147 (No. 28732, Nov. 8, 2001), this Court recently explained as follows:

> Where it appears from the record that the process established by the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and related statutes for the disposition of cases involving children adjudicated to be abused or neglected has been substantially disregarded or frustrated, the resulting order of disposition will be vacated and the case remanded for compliance with that process and entry of an appropriate dispositional order.

Neither the lower court system nor the Department of Health and Human Resources should interpret the majority decision as an excuse to disregard the guidance provided by this Court or the requirements enumerated by statute and rule with regard to dispositional hearings. Egregious facts adduced on the issue of disposition may indeed justify termination of parental rights. However, it is not a determination to be made here at this time. This Court should require adherence to the procedural and substantive protections provided by the Constitution, our statutes, court rules and cases. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent from the portion of the majority opinion which directs the lower court to terminate parental rights. To comply with the mandates of statute, rule, and this Court, the lower court must hold a dispositional hearing prior to termination.

I am authorized to state that Justice Starcher joins in this concurring and dissenting opinion.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "In reviewing the findings of fact and conclusions of law of a circuit court supporting a civil contempt order, we apply a three-pronged standard of review. We review the contempt order under an abuse of discretion standard; the underlying factual findings are reviewed under a clearly erroneous standard; and questions of law and statutory interpretations are subject to a de novo review." Syl. Pt. 1, Carter v. Carter, 196 W.Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996).

2. "[W]hether a contempt is civil or criminal depends upon the purpose to be served by imposing a sanction for the contempt and such purpose also determines the type of sanction which is appropriate." Syl. Pt. 1, in part, State ex rel. Robinson v. Michael, 166 W.Va. 660, 276 S.E.2d 812 (1981).

3. "Where the purpose to be served by imposing a sanction for contempt is to compel compliance with a court order by the contemner so as to benefit the party bringing the contempt action by enforcing, protecting, or assuring the right of that party under the order, the contempt is civil." Per Curiam:

The West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter referred to as "DHHR" or the "Department") appeals from the January 26, 2005, order[1] entered by the Circuit Court of Berkeley County holding it in contempt due to its failure to provide sufficient staff resources to enable the Child Protective Services unit of the Martinsburg, West Virginia, DHHR office to fulfill its mandatory responsibilities. The entry of the circuit court's order was stayed for sixty days to permit DHHR to purge itself of the contempt ruling. Upon our review of the record in this matter, DHHR has implemented the necessary measures to purge itself of the contempt ruling.

I. Factual and Procedural Background

The contempt order that is the subject of this action arose out of an abuse and neglect proceeding that evidenced specific staffing problems that the Child Protective Services unit was experiencing in the Eastern Panhandle counties of this state. The abuse and neglect proceeding was initiated following the positive testing of infant Brandon Lee H.S.[2] for traces of cocaine, marijuana, and amphetamines upon his premature birth on October 22, 2004. As a result of this testing, an immediate referral was made to Child Protective Services. The circuit court awarded DHHR emergency temporary custody of Brandon on October 26, 2004, and Brandon was placed in foster care upon his discharge from the hospital.[3]

[1]While there is a second contempt order that was entered on February 7, 2005, DHHR notes that "[b]oth orders basically make the same findings of fact and conclusions of law, and order the Department to undertake various actions concerning the operations of its Child Protective . . . unit in the Eastern Panhandle District comprised of Berkeley, Jefferson and Morgan Counties." Consequently, we will refer collectively to both orders as the "contempt order."

A preliminary hearing was scheduled for November 5, 2004, to address whether there was probable cause for continuing the award of emergency custody to DHHR. When both of Brandon's parents waived their rights to this preliminary hearing, the circuit court confirmed the actions of DHHR in acquiring legal custody of Brandon. Through its order entered on November 5, 2004, the trial court ordered that Brandon's parents be subjected to random drug screens and directed that visitation with Brandon be arranged at the discretion of DHHR. In this same order, the circuit court included the following language:

> In reviewing this case, the Court finds that D.H.H.R. located in the Eastern Panhandle of West Virginia is dangerously understaffed, with as many as 12 unfilled staff > positions. The Court finds that this may be putting infants in the Eastern Panhandle at risk. Further, the Court finds that this interferes with the proper oversight that D.H.H.R. should be giving to this case, including proper visitation and considerations of placement.

The trial court set this matter for adjudication on December 6, 2004.[4]

On November 30, 2004, the Child Protective Services supervisor learned that Brandon's case had not yet been assigned within the Department.[5] Brandon's father and the guardian ad litem appointed to represent Brandon's interests filed a petition for contempt in which they alleged that the Department failed to properly staff this case and complained of the resulting delay in scheduling visitation, as well as in initiating drug-related services. Brandon's father raised an additional complaint concerning the Department's failure to conduct a home visit to determine if placement with him would be appropriate.[6] [4]While the order indicated that the hearing was to occur on December 6, 2003, the designation of the year was clearly a typographical error.

[5]This error resulted based on alleged miscommunication within the unit when the investigative worker originally assigned to the case left the Department's employ on the same date as the preliminary hearing. While Department policy apparently required that the vacated position should have resulted in the staffing of the case by either a long-term or an ongoing Child Protective Services worker, this assignment did not occur and was not discovered until November 30, 2004.

[6]The Department notes that there is no directive contained in the November 5, 2004, order, providing for such a home visit. In addition, the Department maintains that a home visit could not have been performed due to the fact that the father was adamant that his parents, with whom he resided, were not to be informed about the fact that Brandon tested positive for having drugs in his system at birth.

On December 15, 2004, the hearing on the contempt petition began.[7] With respect to the underlying allegations of contempt pertaining to the failure of the Martinsburg Child Protective Services unit to staff Brandon's case, the trial court found that these failures were "not the result of any 'willful, intentional, or contumacious act' on the part" of the local DHHR employees. However, based upon testimony offered by several DHHR workers regarding the status of conditions at the Martinsburg Child Protective Services office, the circuit court ruled that > the Secretary of the Bureau for Children and Families and the Commissioner and Deputy Interim Commissioner of the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources are in contempt of their obligation under West Virginia law to provide sufficient resources so that the Martinsburg CPS Unit of D.H.H.R. can fulfill its obligations in the present case, as well as to assure the "safety and guidance" of other children in its custody and in the Eastern Panhandle of West Virginia.

The trial court expressly concluded that the ongoing failure to provide sufficient staffing was "willful, intentional, and contumacious" in light of the fact that "the Secretary has known of the problem at the CPS unit at D.H.H.R. in Martinsburg since 2000, and more particularly since the beginning of 2004, but has taken no action to remedy the situation."

In fashioning the conduct required by the Department to purge the contempt finding, the trial court identified specific directives all aimed at solving the staffing crisis at the Martinsburg Child Protective Services office. The dictates required by the circuit court included the immediate hiring of workers to fill the numerous office vacancies and various measures designed to expedite the training of new hires, as well as certain salary incentives, including the use of geographic pay differentials designed to forestall the heavy attrition rate purportedly due to workers leaving to work in contiguous states. The trial court provided for a sixty-day stay of its order to provide the Department with sufficient time to implement the necessary measures to purge itself of the contempt finding. Arguing that it timely effectuated the actions required of it to be purged from the contempt order, DHHR seeks relief from this Court.

II. Standard of Review

The standard pursuant to which we review civil contempt orders was identified in syllabus point one of Carter v. Carter, 196 W.Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996):

> In reviewing the findings of fact and conclusions of law of a circuit court supporting a civil contempt order, we apply a three-pronged standard of review. We review the contempt order under an abuse of discretion standard; the underlying factual findings are reviewed under a clearly erroneous standard; and questions of law and statutory interpretations are subject to a de novo review.

Accordingly, we proceed to determine whether error was committed by the trial court in entering the contempt order that is the subject of this proceeding or in refusing to purge the Department of the contempt order.

III. Discussion

In challenging the entry of the contempt order that is the subject of this appeal, DHHR maintains that it had corrected the inaction relative to Brandon's case concerning both visitation and services and had complied, to the extent possible, with the trial court's directives concerning staff-related issues by the time of the hearing on the contempt petition. As a result, DHHR maintains the trial court erred in refusing to enter an order finding that the Department purged itself of the contempt rulings set forth in the January 26, 2005, order.[8] In addition, the Department contends that certain procedural infirmities exist with regard to the contempt ruling due to the lack of service of process that was effectuated on the agency directors who were held in contempt individually.

We begin our analysis of this matter with a review of civil contempt. In State ex rel. Robinson v. Michael, 166 W.Va. 660, 276 S.E.2d 812 (1981), we explored the distinction between civil and criminal contempt, and found that "whether a contempt is civil or criminal depends upon the purpose to be served by imposing a sanction for the contempt and such purpose also determines the type of sanction which is appropriate." Id. at 660, 276 S.E.2d at 813, syl. pt. 1, in part. We further instructed that > action by enforcing, protecting, or assuring the right of that party under the order, the contempt is civil.

> [w]here the purpose to be served by imposing a sanction for contempt is to compel compliance with a court order by the contemner so as to benefit the party bringing the contempt

Id. at 660, 276 S.E.2d at 813, syl. pt. 2.

The Department argues that the court order necessary to serve as the predicate for a civil contempt ruling is the November 5, 2004, order. Maintaining that the terms of that order solely control the issue of whether it has purged itself of non-compliant conduct, the Department argues that the November 5, 2004, order contained only two specific directives with regard to Brandon's case. Those directives were:

> (1) "It is further Ordered that the Respondents shall cooperate with ASI[9] evaluations and with random drug screens, all to be paid for by D.H.H.R."; and
> (2) "It is further Ordered that the Respondents' visitation with the Infant, and placement of the Infant, is [sic] in the discretion of the D.H.H.R."

Emphasizing that the petition for contempt and the rule to show cause rely entirely on the November 5, 2004, order as the basis for the alleged contempt, the Department maintains that at the time of the hearing on the petition for contempt, it had resolved, to the extent of its capabilities, each of the actions related to Brandon's case that were complained of in the petition.[10] [9]The Abuse Severity Index involves an evaluation performed to determine the level, if any, of an individual's addiction.

[10]Those four items were that: (1) DHHR had failed to staff this CPS case to the ongoing CPS unit; (2) DHHR had failed to exercise discretion regarding visitation and/or failed to arrange visitation with the parents; (3) DHHR had failed to exercise discretion with (continued...)

DHHR contends that the trial court's contempt order exceeded the permissible scope of the November 5, 2004, order by mandating extensive staffing directives that are unrelated to Brandon's case. The Department objects to the trial court's use of the contempt order to compel conduct on its behalf with regard to staffing issues that have no application to the Brandon case and are beyond the authority of the judicial branch of government to address.

While the Department is correct in stating that the November 5, 2004, order only contained two specific directives with regard to the action required in connection with Brandon's case, the order does contain language finding that the current staff shortage of twelve unfilled positions directly impacts on "the proper oversight that D.H.H.R. should be giving to this case, including proper visitation and considerations of placement."[11] Given the trial court's recognition in the November 5, 2004, ruling of how the staff shortage was contributing to the attention that the Department could necessarily give all cases, not just Brandon's case, we do not find the inclusion of staffing directives in the contempt order to regard to possible placement of the child with the father; and (4) DHHR had failed to contact the parents regarding implementation of services, visitation, and placement.

[11]The guardian ad litem notes that language similar to that which the trial court inserted in the November 5, 2004, order regarding the DHHR staffing crisis in the Eastern Panhandle was included in orders entered by Judge Sanders in other abuse and neglect cases in the Fall of 2004. She opined that these "statement[s] reflected the Circuit Court's deepening concern about the deteriorating staff situation at DHHR in Martinsburg."

be beyond the scope of the predicate order. Clearly, the staffing concerns were not being raised for the first time in the contempt order and, as a constitutional officer charged with upholding the numerous statutory enactments that govern the protection of this state's children from abuse and neglect,[12] the trial court had the authority, subject to the limitations required in this opinion, to compel the Department to act to remedy the serious effects of the significant staff shortage at issue, specifically, in this case and, generally, in other abuse and neglect proceedings before that court.

Numerous statutes evidence the paramount importance that we attach to protecting and safeguarding this state's children from abusive and neglectful environs. In chapter forty-nine of the West Virginia Code, a body of statutory law devoted exclusively to child welfare, it is recognized that "[t]he purpose of this chapter is to provide a coordinated system of child welfare and juvenile justice for the children of this state that has goals to: (1) Assure each child care, safety and guidance[.]" W.Va. Code § 49-1-1(a)(1) (1999) (Repl. Vol. 2004). Included in this chapter of the Code is an article expressly devoted to handling reports of children suspected of abuse or neglect. See W.Va. Code § 49-6A-1 to -10 (1977) (Repl. Vol. 2004). That the state is serious about its creation of "a comprehensive system of child welfare" such that "no child subjected to abuse or neglect shall be left without assistance" is abundantly clear from our laws in this area. W.Va. Code

§§ 49-6D-2(a), (b)(2) (1984) (Repl. Vol. 2004). Inherent in the enactment of the multiple provisions addressing the protection of this state's children is recognition "of the State's responsibility to assist the family in a manner consonant with the purposes of this article [6D – Child Protective Services Act]" which includes as one of its stated purposes the goal of "secur[ing] to a child removed from the family a degree of custody, care and control consistent with the child's best interests." W.Va. Code §§ 49-6D-2(a), -2(b)(6) . Included in the statement of intent for article 6D of chapter 49 is the express recognition that the "legislature enact[ed] this article to provide for the protection of the children of this State from abuse and neglect and to provide direction to responsible state officers." W.Va. Code § 49-6D-2(a)(emphasis supplied).

Given the critical nature of the issues presented by abuse and neglect proceedings, as well as the clear legislative recognition of the duties incumbent on the state and its officers to act in the best interests of the child "while recognizing . . . the fundamental rights of parenthood," we cannot fault the trial court for addressing the issue of unfilled Child Protective Services positions in the contempt order. W.Va. Code § 49-6D-2(a). That the unfilled positions played a part in the delayed assignment of Brandon's case to a Child Protective Services worker cannot be doubted. Thus, in directing that the vacant positions be immediately filled, the trial court was acting in furtherance of the legislatively recognized need to "provide direction to responsible state officers" in the interest of securing the full and proper implementation of specific abuse and neglect statutes. W.Va. Code § 49-6D-2(a). Accordingly, we do not find the inclusion of directives that pertain generally to the issue of hiring additional personnel to fill the vacant positions within DHHR to render the contempt order unenforceable. That is not to say, however, that all of the hiring-related directives are enforceable.

While we agree in principle with the circuit court's directives aimed at hiring and expediting the training process so that the new Child Protective Services workers could be actively handling cases as quickly as possible,[13] we cannot uphold the specific mandate that requires the implementation of geographic pay differentials for DHHR employees located in the Eastern Panhandle of this State. As support for such pay differentials, the trial court and the guardian ad litem both look to legislation that allows the "transfer [of] funds between all general revenue accounts under the [DHHR] secretary's authority." W.Va. Code § 49-6-1a (1994) (Repl. Vol. 2004). In addition, they rely upon a Division of Personnel regulation that authorizes the State Personnel Board to "approve the establishment of pay differentials to address circumstances such as class-wide recruitment and retention problems, [and] regionally specific geographic pay disparities. . . ." W.Va. R. Personnel 143 § 1-

5.4(f)4 (2003).[14] Appellees maintain that these provisions, combined with the legislative mandate to "provide to the local child protective service such assistance [upon request]. . . as will enable it to fulfill its responsibilities," require the use of geographic pay differentials. W.Va. Code § 49-6A-9(e).

The Department correctly recognizes that the directives in the contempt order which compel DHHR to establish and implement geographic pay differentials for the Child Protective Services unit in the Eastern Panhandle District run afoul of the Separation of Powers doctrine. See W.Va. Const. art. V, § 1. We recognized in syllabus point one of State ex rel. Barker v. Manchin, 167 W.Va. 155, 279 S.E.2d 622 (1981), that article V, section one of the West Virginia Constitution is part of the fundamental law of the state and must be strictly construed and closely followed. The separation of powers doctrine requires that the specific functions of the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of government are to be kept distinct. See State ex rel. State Bldg. Comm'n v. Bailey, 151 W.Va. 79, 87, 150 S.E.2d 449, 454 (1966).

[14]These regulatory provisions were adopted pursuant to West Virginia Code § 29-6-10(2) (1999) (Repl. Vol. 2004). Any such pay plan that incorporates geographic pay differentials "shall become effective only after it has been approved by the governor after submission to him by the [State Personnel] board." Id.

Although this Court has recognized that the realities of modern governance sometimes require an overlapping of functions between the three branches,[15] the implementation of geographic pay differentials does not fall into that permissible ambit of branch overlap that would allow the judicial branch to invade the executive branch's jurisdiction over the salaries of its employees.[16] As the Department observes, while it certainly may submit a request to the Division of Personnel, whether a geographic pay differential should be implemented is a decision that lies within the discretion of the Personnel Board. By statute, an agency first recommends a pay differential to the Personnel Board, and if the Personnel Board agrees with the recommendation, the issue must then be referred to the Governor for final approval before a pay differential may be implemented. See W.Va. R. 143 Personnel § 1-5.4(f)4; W.Va. Code § 29-6-10(2) (1999) (Repl. Vol. 2004). In concluding that a geographic pay differential is mandatory, both the guardian ad litem and the trial court overlook the critical element of discretion that is involved. Circumventing both the separation of powers issue and the discretionary nature of such a decision, the circuit court and guardian ad litem suggest that the issue of pay differentials is compelled based on the inclusion of mandatory statutory language directing that all state "departments, boards, bureaus and other agencies" are to provide assistance to the local child protective service, upon request, to "enable it [DHHR] to fulfill its responsibilities." W.Va. Code § 49-6A-9(e).

[15]See, e.g., Appalachian Power Co. v. Public Serv. Comm'n, 170 W.Va. 757, 759, 296 S.E.2d 887, 889 (1982) (recognizing that "in order to make government workable and economical, it must lend itself to practical considerations" that may include "some overlapping of judicial and administrative duties" (quoting Chapman v. Huntington W.Va. Housing Auth., 121 W.Va. 319, 336, 3 S.E.2d 502, 510 (1939)); Crain v. Bordenkircher, 180 W.Va. 246, 376 S.E.2d 140 (1988) (holding by judicial branch directing executive branch to construct new correctional facility because of unconstitutional penitentiary conditions).

[16]The guardian ad litem suggests that this Court recognized in Hewitt v. State DHHR, 212 W.Va. 698, 575 S.E.2d 308 (2002) (Hewitt I), that a state court has the power to order state officials to fulfill mandatory duties including the expenditure of executive agency funds. Hewitt I acknowledged that due to the "necessary interworkings of the judicial branch and the executive branch in instances of cases involving children who require the services of this state," that the judicial branch may properly be involved in setting expert fees that may be charged in such cases. 212 W.Va. at 703 n.9, 575 S.E.2d at 313 n.9. That limited observation, which pertains solely to expert fee setting, cannot be extrapolated to support the guardian ad litem's contention that the judicial branch has the power to encroach upon the salary setting jurisdiction of the executive branch based on its statutory duty to protect children. Hewitt I simply does not support such a wholesale incursion on the executive branch's domain.

In syllogistic fashion, the trial court and the guardian ad litem attempt to convince us that pay differentials are mandatory based on statutory language that (a) compels DHHR to assure the "care, safety and guidance" of children in its custody; and (b) charges all agencies, bureaus, and boards to assist DHHR with the fulfillment of its responsibilities. See W.Va. Code §§ 49-1-1(a)(1), 49-6A-9(e). This argument – that the geographic pay deferential is mandatory – is simply indefensible. While the Division of Personnel has the discretionary authority, by regulation, to act upon an agency's request for a geographic pay deferential, there is no statutory language that requires the implementation of such salary enhancements. Moreover, as the Department explains, the issue of geographic pay differentials is one that necessarily must be made solely by the executive branch. This is because such a decision must take into consideration a host of other factors that necessarily include issues such as how a differential affects pay grades, classifications, and budgetary constraints, as well as the potential for grievance filing by employees outside the geographic area selected to receive a pay differential.

While we do not wish to downplay the unacceptable situation that the trial court found itself presented with in regularly presiding over abuse and neglect cases during a period when DHHR staff vacancies reached crisis proportions, the extreme nature of those facts do not justify an invasion of the executive branch's province to set the salaries of its employees. Notwithstanding the legislative recognition of a need to increase the number of child protective services workers and investigators and the granting of authority to the DHHR Secretary to "transfer funds between all general revenue accounts under the secretary's authority," these acts do not constitute a legislative invitation to encroach upon the separation of powers between the three governmental branches that is constitutionally mandated. W.Va. Code § 49-6-1a. Quite simply, the trial court was without power to require the use of geographic pay differentials in its desire, albeit laudatory, to immediately fill those vacant Child Protective Services positions. See State ex rel. Canterbury v. County Court, 151 W.Va. 1013, 1019, 158 S.E.2d 151, 156 (1967) (recognizing that separation of powers provision precludes courts from exercising administrative duties relating to executive branch in refusing to use judicial power of mandamus to control fiscal affairs of county court); cf. State ex rel. Lambert v. Cortellessi, 182 W.Va. 142, 148, 386 S.E.2d 640, 646 (1989) (issuing writ of mandamus directing county commission to give due consideration to duties and responsibilities of employees of county clerk's offices to provide "reasonable and proper" funds for performance of statutory duties of office).

In contrast to those cases where this Court has exercised judicial power when the budgets of county officers were arbitrarily reduced and the performance of statutory duties thereby affected, this case does not present a situation where the wrongful denial of funds to constitutional officers required judicial intervention to mandate adequate funding for the fulfillment of specific job duties. See Cortellessi, 182 W.Va. at 148 n.6, 386 S.E.2d at 646 n.6 (directing that respective county commissions could not "act arbitrarily by providing clearly inadequate funds for the performance of the statutory duties of the county officers"); State ex rel. Ginsberg v. Naum, 173 W.Va. 510, 318 S.E.2d 454 (1984) (holding that county commission has fiscal responsibility to provide prosecuting attorney with sufficient staff for duties of office). While we are convinced that the trial judge, in inserting staff-related directives in the contempt order, was acting solely out of concern for the best interests of the children placed in the state's custody pursuant to our abuse and neglect laws, and that his actions were certainly driven by the lack of action taken by the previous administration's DHHR officers,[17] we simply lack the authority to address the employment terms of the Department's staff – issues that are unquestionably administrative in nature.[18] Those functions are solely in the realm of the executive branch of government.

With regard to the issue raised by the Department concerning the lack of service of process effected on the individual agency officials[19] who were named in the contempt order, we find this argument less than compelling. The crux of the contempt order was to resolve the immediate issues of visitation and drug testing in the Brandon case and to remedy the unfilled Child Protective Services positions. In not providing the individually

[17]We wish to acknowledge the huge improvements that the Department has made under the leadership of the current DHHR Secretary, Martha H. Walker, who upon taking office, immediately proposed sweeping changes to improve the employment conditions of Child Protective Service workers throughout the state. We suspect that the actions taken by Secretary Walker were impelled, at least in part, by the continuing interest and careful monitoring of the DHHR staff vacancies by Judge Sanders.

[18]While the trial court framed the contempt order in terms of "whether the CPS unit at the D.H.H.R. office serving the Eastern Panhandle of West Virginia has sufficient resources to fulfill its obligations," the issue of adequate funds was never raised by DHHR. In fact, the guardian ad litem notes that plenty of funds were available for staff hiring purposes due to the unfilled positions. We are certainly cognizant of the fact that the starting salary figure for the Child Protective Services worker may have contributed to the staff vacancies; however, the funds available for such salaries had not been arbitrarily reduced by the Department. Absent arbitrary conduct by the executive branch that placed job performance in jeopardy, this Court has no power to compel action with regard to fiscal issues under the Department's control. See Canterbury, 151 W.Va. at 1019, 158 S.E.2d at 156.

[19]The Secretary of the Bureau for Children and Families, which is part of DHHR; and the Commissioner and Deputy Commissioner for DHHR, were named individually by the trial court in the contempt order.

named agency heads with separate service of process of the contempt proceedings, DHHR suggests that due process standards of notice and an opportunity to be heard were violated. See generally, In Re Yoho, 171 W.Va. 625, 629-30, 301 S.E.2d 581, 586 (1983).

Critically, as the guardian ad litem notes, these officials were never subject to any sanctions in connection with the contempt finding. Moreover, there is no question that they were aware of the staff shortage situation at the Martinsburg office. The circuit court merely named these individuals in recognition of the fact that an organization such as DHHR can only act through its officials. We presume that the circuit court's naming of these individuals in the contempt order was intended solely for the purpose of resolving the staff shortage in an expedited fashion. Rather than seeking to impose any form of individualized sanctions against these agency officials, the trial court was attempting to get the necessary players – those with hiring powers – on board immediately.

While the better practice is always to adhere to procedural requirements which necessarily include due process protections, in this case the lack of any sanctions against the agency heads combined with the fact that the agency itself was clearly a party to this proceeding who received full notice and an opportunity to be heard, suggest that the lack of individual service does not render the contempt order fatally defective.[20] Because these individuals were named in their professional capacities, they did not incur any expenses for legal representation. In short, we can find no prejudice to have been sustained as a result of the inclusion of the individual DHHR officers in the contempt order.

We are similarly unpersuaded by the Department's argument that the trial court violated the notice provisions included in West Virginia Code § 55-17-1 (2002). That chapter was enacted to codify the procedures to be used "in certain civil actions filed against state government agencies and their officials." W.Va. Code § 55-17-1(b). Consequently, chapter 55 is inapplicable to the case sub judice as the contempt proceeding arose out of an abuse and neglect matter – a proceeding initiated by a government agency. Given the service of process requirements on the individual agency heads is not a fatal defect given the specific factual and legal parameters of this case, we do not suggest that due process requirements can be disregarded when individuals outside the jurisdiction of the trial court are determined to be necessary parties to the proceedings. The protections guaranteed to all citizens by the due process provisions of the state constitution are fundamental to our system of jurisprudence and are vital to securing the implementation of proceedings in a manner that fully comports with principles of fundamental fairness. While those due process protections were not observed with regard to the individual agency heads found by the lower court to be in contempt, we cannot find a consequent violation of the precepts of fundamental fairness to have resulted in this case. The practically immediate purging of any contempt – resulting from the prompt action of those agency heads to address the concerns of the lower court (other than geographical salary differentials) – has led inexorably to our decision today finding a purging of any contempt and, in practical effect, mooting the due process issues. In another case, however, the failure to effect personal service on necessary parties may cause a similar action to be rendered fatally defective for noncompliance with constitutionally significant procedural requirements.

inapposite nature of that chapter of the Code to the matter before us, we do not further address this issue.

Based on the foregoing, we determine that DHHR has fully complied with the portions of the contempt ruling issued by the Circuit Court of Berkeley County that are properly within its power and authority to act. Accordingly, we remand this matter to the circuit court for entry of an order finding that the Department has purged itself of the contempt rulings contained in the January 26 and February 7, 2005, orders and dismissing this contempt action from the docket of the trial court.

Remanded.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. """W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], requires the State Department of Welfare [now the Department of Human Services], in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove 'conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition . . . by clear and convincing proof.' The statute, however, does not specify any particular manner or mode of testimony or evidence by which the State Department of Welfare is obligated to meet this burden." Per Curiam:
Brenda C. appeals from an order of the Circuit Court of Cabell County terminating her parental rights to her two infant children, Christopher C. and Brandie Nicole C. After reviewing whether Appellant's parental rights were properly terminated, we reverse and remand.

Appellant gave birth to Brandie Nicole C. on May 31, 1994. Shortly after Brandie's birth, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") filed a petition on June 3, 1994, alleging that both Brandie and Christopher were "neglected and/or abused children." Through the petition, the DHHR requested both temporary and permanent custody of the children; termination of parental rights; and the right to provide medical and foster care to the children. As support for its petition, the DHHR averred that as a result of Brenda C.'s addiction to drugs, Brandie was born addicted and was suffering withdrawal symptoms. The children's father was also alleged to be drug addicted. Simultaneous with its filing of the petition, the DHHR sought emergency custody of the children pursuant to oral, ex parte motion. The circuit court granted the DHHR emergency custody and scheduled further hearing on the case for June 6, 1994.

Appellant appeared at the temporary custody hearing on June 6, 1994, without counsel. The DHHR represented to the court that Christopher was at risk based on the fact that he was three years old, was not toilet trained, and refused to eat to avoid having to soil himself. Following this hearing, the court awarded temporary custody of both children to the DHHR; approved temporary placement of the children; appointed counsel for the respondents; granted additional temporary relief; and scheduled an adjudicatory hearing for June 16, 1994.

Appellant was represented by counsel at the June 16, 1994, hearing. During this hearing, the assistant prosecuting attorney appearing on behalf of the DHHR, represented to the court:

Prior to coming on the record, we have agreed through counsel to certain findings of fact, including the fact that there is eminent danger to the well-being--physical well-being of the children, that there is no reasonable alternative available to the removal of the children, and continuation in the home is not in their best interest. Because the child, Brandie, was born opiate addicted, and Mrs. C. . . .--I believe both Mr. and Mrs. C. . . . have admitted to substance abuse problems, and based upon those findings, we have agreed that the children will remain in the temporary legal custody of the Department because there is no less drastic alternative to their removal.

After making these statements, the assistant prosecutor advised the court that "we need an adjudicatory hearing set." Appellant's attorney did not object to the above representations nor did he find fault with the request for an adjudicatory hearing. The hearing transcript contains no indication that any sworn testimony was taken or even that a proffer of evidence was made--only counsel's statements.

During the course of this hearing, the circuit court asked Appellant and her husband: "Mr. and Mrs. C. . . ., do you understand everything that was said here today?" After they both indicated their assent, the court inquired further, "And you-all are in agreement with this?" Again, Appellant and her husband stated "yes." The court then said, "I'll accept the agreed order and find that it is in everyone's best interest." No findings of fact or conclusions of law were made orally on the record at that time. The court did continue the matter to August 11, 1994, to permit the presentation of a "service plan" and to allow the parents to get substance abuse assistance. The assistant prosecutor requested that an adjudicatory hearing be set.

By order dated July 11, 1994, the circuit court stated its findings with regard to the June 16, 1994, hearing:

> Whereupon the parties represented to the Court that they had, subject to the Court's approval, entered into an agreement with regard to the conditions as they existed at the time of the filing of this petition and asked the Court to approve that agreement, which motion the Court, after due consideration of the representations of counsel, as well as the record and verified petition herein, did sustain.

Based upon the stipulation of the parties the Court does hereby FIND as follows;

> 1. That the infant children were abused and/or neglected at the time of the filing of the petition in this matter.
> 2. That the infant child, Brandie Nicole C. . . . was born opiate addicted due to her mother's addiction to drugs.
> 3. That the mother and father in this matter have admitted to substance abuse.

This order was signed by the assistant prosecuting attorney, but not by Appellant, her husband, or their respective counsel. The order reflects that the matter is continued to August 11, 1994, but fails to mention the scheduling of an adjudicatory hearing.

At the August 11, 1994, hearing the court granted a thirty-day improvement period to Appellant to permit enrollment in a residential drug treatment program and continued the matter to September 9, 1994, as reflected by a nunc pro tunc order entered on May 3, 1995. As a result of the September 9, 1994, hearing, the court continued temporary legal custody with the DHHR of the minor children; granted Appellant continued physical custody of Christopher for a four-month improvement period; and continued the matter to December 15, 1994, for a dispositional hearing.

The issue of termination or other disposition was apparently never addressed at the December 15, 1994, hearing. Instead, the court continued legal custody with the DHHR, but granted Appellant physical custody of Brandie and enlarged the previously granted four-month improvement period to twelve months. The case was continued to April 20, 1995, and a lengthy letter that Appellant apparently wrote to the trial judge was filed as a part of the record.

Appellant's original counsel was relieved by order of the court and new counsel appointed on March 7, 1995. From letters submitted by Appellant to the court, the record indicates that Appellant was in the Ohio Reformatory for Women at Marysville, Ohio, at this time with an expected release date of October 9, 1995. At the April 20, 1995, hearing Appellant was unable to attend due to her incarceration, but was represented by counsel. The court continued custody of the children with the DHHR at this hearing.

Prior to the final hearing scheduled for May 2, 1995, Appellant's counsel filed a motion to continue the hearing. See footnote 1 The court denied the motion at the May 2, 1995, hearing. Appellant's counsel raised as additional grounds for his motion seeking a continuance that he wished to conduct cross-examination on certain matters. Notwithstanding this objection, the court proceeded with the hearing and terminated Appellant's parental rights.

The transcript of the May 2, 1995, hearing indicates the following comment by the circuit court:

> My understanding from her letters is that she will be possibly getting out into a halfway house of some kind or some kind of a halfway measure, but that that would also be in the state of Ohio, and certainly she could not regain custody of her children even under > that most propitious of situations in her mind, which again, I'm not certainly guaranteed. So, I do believe that this has gone on for a year-and-a-half. And she did make some admissions at the original adjudication of abuse and neglect which allowed us to adjudicate the situation. And I don't know that the time standards and the best interests of these children would allow me to continue this any further. She is responsible for her own situation and incarceration and her own future situation. In light of the fact that she has admitted the elements that allowed the Court to adjudicate in the first place, I do believe that I should go ahead, for the best interests of the children, with a termination hearing today.

The prosecuting attorney then proceeded to vouch the record to include the fact that "there was an initial adjudication of drug abuse and addiction by both parents" at the June 16, 1994, hearing.

By order dated May 3, 1995, the court terminated Appellant's parental rights, noting within its order, that she "has previously admitted in Court that she neglected and/or abused her infant children due to her habitual drug habits and a judicial determination of neglect and/or abuse was rendered in June of 1994.

As her single assignment of error, Appellant complains that the circuit court terminated her parental rights without ever holding a hearing on the merits wherein evidence was presented. She questions whether the "agreed order" entered after the June 16, 1994, hearing, where no testimony was adduced, is sufficient "to eventually terminate" parental rights. Appellant asserts that she was entitled to an evidentiary hearing before her parental rights were terminated, that clear and convincing evidence must be presented both for an adjudication of abuse and neglect and for a termination of parental rights. Additionally, Appellant states that the court could not rely on her letters to it since they were not introduced into evidence. In response, Appellees state that the documentary evidence and Appellant's own admissions provide adequate evidence to support the court's findings. See footnote 2

Parental rights can only be terminated pursuant to compliance with specific statutory procedures. Appellant argues that the circuit court failed to comply with the provisions of West Virginia Code 49-6-2(c) (1995). That provision states that:

> In any proceeding under this article, the party or parties having custodial or other parental rights or responsibilities to the child shall be afforded a meaningful opportunity to be heard, including the opportunity to testify and to present and cross-examine witnesses. The petition shall not be taken as confessed. A transcript or > recording shall be made of all proceedings unless waived by all parties to the proceeding. The rules of evidence shall apply. Where relevant, the court shall consider the efforts of the state department to remedy the alleged circumstances. At the conclusion of the hearing the court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected, which shall be incorporated into the order of the court. The findings must be based upon conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition and proven by clear and convincing proof.

Appellant's specific complaint regarding lack of compliance with West Virginia Code 49-6-2(c) focuses on the circuit court's complete reliance on the agreement represented by the assistant prosecuting attorney at the June 16, 1994, hearing in lieu of requiring the DHHR to put on any evidence to prove the allegations of its petition.

We stated in syllabus point three of In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995):

> """W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], requires the State Department of Welfare [now the Department of Human Services], in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove 'conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition . . . by clear and convincing proof.' The statute, however, does not specify any particular manner or mode of testimony or evidence by which the State Department of Welfare is obligated to meet this burden." Syllabus Point 1, In Interest of S.C., 168 W. Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981).' Syllabus Point 1, West Virginia Department of Human Services v. Peggy F., 184 W. Va. 60, 399 S.E.2d 460 (1990)." Syllabus Point 1, In re Beth, 192 W. Va. 656, 453 S.E.2d 639 (1994).

In this case, both the assistant prosecutor and the circuit court appear to have assumed that the agreement referenced by the assistant prosecutor at the June 16, 1994, sufficed to constitute the clear and convincing proof of the petition's averments required by West Virginia Code 49-6-2(c). We agree with Appellant that the DHHR failed to meet its statutory burden of proof.

While West Virginia Code 49-6-2(c) "does not specify any particular manner or mode of testimony or evidence by which the State Department of Welfare [DHHR] is obligated to meet this burden[,]" what occurred in this case clearly falls short of statutory intent. In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. at 448, 460 S.E.2d at 694. The circuit court was not presented with a signed stipulation reflecting the representations, which the assistant prosecutor made to the court, that could then properly be entered into evidence. If the stipulation had not been reduced to writing, the parties could have testified regarding their understanding of and assent to the terms of the agreement. Although the circuit court did engage in limited questioning of Appellant and her husband regarding their understanding and agreement concerning the assistant prosecutor's statements to the court, this did not constitute evidence. Significantly, neither Appellant, her husband, or their respective counsel signed the order dated July 11, 1994, which references and incorporates the agreement of the parties concerning the veracity of the petition's averments, including the finding that "the infant children were abused and/or neglected at the time of the filing of the petition."

As we explained in syllabus point one of State v. T.C., 172 W. Va. 47, 303 S.E.2d 685 (1983),

> In a child abuse and neglect hearing, before a court can begin to make any of the dispositional alternatives under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5, it must hold a hearing under W. Va. Code, 49-6-2, and determine "whether such child is abused or neglected." Such a finding is a prerequisite to further continuation of the case.

Id. at 48, 303 S.E2d at 686. In this case, the circuit court appears to have circumvented its duty of holding a hearing for the purposes of making a determination of abuse or neglect under West Virginia Code 49-6-2(c), or, in the alternative, of overseeing the formalization of the stipulation and its entry into evidence. The assistant prosecutor's request for an "adjudicatory hearing" after she informed the court regarding the agreement indicates that even she recognized the need for an evidentiary proceeding.

We do not suggest that a stipulation cannot be used to meet the requirements of West Virginia Code 49-6-2(c). Clearly, a stipulation is a valid means of establishing the parties' assent to the averments contained within an abuse or neglect petition. See T.C., 172 W. Va. at 52, 303 S.E.2d at 690 n.5 (noting use of stipulation to make showing of abuse and neglect); see also In re D.R., 673 A.2d 1259, 1270 (D.C. Ct. App. 1996) (finding that "[i]n a stipulation dated June 19, 1994, the mother admitted to both prenatal and postnatal drug abuse that impaired her ability to provide for her child"); In re Shollenberger, No. 1995CA00135, 1996 WL 363538, slip op. at 1 (Ohio Ct. App. May 20, 1996) (stating that "[o]n December 18, 1990, upon a stipulation by the parties, the children were adjudicated as being neglected"). We further note that the proposed West Virginia Rules of Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, which are currently under public comment until August 15, 1996, include an express rule that addresses the use of stipulations within abuse and neglect proceedings. Proposed rule 26 states that:

> Stipulated Adjudication and Uncontested Petitions. (a) Required Information. Any stipulated or uncontested adjudication shall include the following information:
> (1) Agreed upon facts supporting court involvement regarding the respondent's (s') problems, conduct, or condition;
>
> (2) A statement of facts asserted by the petitioner, but not admitted, which relate to respondent's (s') problems, conduct, or condition; and
> (3) A statement of respondent's (s') problems or deficiencies to be addressed at the final disposition.
> (b) Voluntariness of Consent. Before accepting a stipulated or uncontested adjudication, the court shall determine that the parties understand the content and consequences of the admission or stipulation and that they voluntarily consent.

While these rules have not been formally adopted, they clearly lend validity to the use of stipulations in connection with abuse and neglect proceedings.

While a stipulation may have been reached in this case, it was never sufficiently formalized. Not only was the agreement never reduced to writing or signed by the parties, the stipulation itself was never introduced into evidence. The agreement is not part of the record other than by the representations of the assistant prosecuting attorney and the lack of any response by Appellant or her counsel regarding its terms. Accordingly, we are compelled to conclude that the DHHR failed to meet its burden of demonstrating by clear and convincing proof the veracity of the statements in its petition. Because no evidence was ever introduced in this case, the circuit court's sole reliance on this loosely assembled stipulation was erroneous. The statute clearly contemplates the introduction of evidence to substantiate the averments of the petition, although such evidence may take the from of a properly prepared and tendered stipulation. See W. Va. Code 49-6-2(c).

Because the threshold issue of abuse and neglect was inadequately addressed, we reverse and remand for further proceedings. On remand, we direct the circuit court to determine whether in fact a stipulation was made. If such a stipulation was made and can be properly introduced into evidence, the court should proceed to make a determination of whether abuse or neglect existed at the time of the petition and subsequently, to make further disposition of this matter. See W. Va. Code 49-6-2(c). Under this Court's decision in State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, ___ W. Va. __, __ S.E.2d __ (No. 23212, April 8, 1996), we further instruct the circuit court that it may be entitled to proceed without granting a further preadjudicatory improvement period. We note, however, that it would be in the court's discretion to consider granting a post-adjudicatory improvement period upon proper motion. See footnote 3 Under any circumstance, the court should act with great dispatch to bring resolution to Brandie's and Christopher's lives.

For the foregoing reasons, the decision of the Circuit Court of Cabell County is hereby reversed and remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

Footnote: 1 As grounds for the requested continuance, counsel represented that he had not been able to meet with his client; that a meeting required a drive of "five plus hours;" that the prison did not regard him as Appellant's counsel of record; that Appellant was scheduled to be released in June of 1995; and that the State would not be prejudiced by a continuance.

Footnote: 2 Appellees contend additionally that Appellant was not prejudiced by her absence from the termination hearing on two grounds: (1) she occasioned her own absence; and (2) she was represented by counsel. Further, Appellees argue that the circuit court retains the authority to modify its dispositional orders as circumstances change. Because we dispose of this case on other grounds, we do not address these contentions.

Footnote: 3 A new statute is now in effect which addresses the granting of improvement periods in cases of child neglect or abuse. See W. Va. Code 49-6-12 (1996).

Albright and Cleckley, Justices, concurring:

Although we concur with the decision to reverse and remand this cause for further proceedings, we believe that the majority has failed to address issues raised by the appellant's assignment of error and by a complete review of the record which was compelled by her contentions. The points we address are not mere hurdles, thoughtlessly thrust in the way of a benevolent state committed to the protection of its citizens. We address here principles and rules that give meaning in the difficult area of child abuse and neglect to the commitment of our people to live under a government of laws. One of the highest aspirations of our people, fully expressed in the laws of our State, is to protect children from abuse and neglect. We discuss here the methods by which, under law, our courts acquire and exercise jurisdiction to promote that aspiration, promptly and effectively, with justice for all. In fact, those methods are relatively plain and simple, well grounded in our jurisprudence and expressive of the fundamentals of due process of law. We submit that attention to those principles and rules, reviewed here, will materially assist the courts and their officers in fulfilling the inherent duty of courts to protect the interests of children.

Petition. The petition which initiated the abuse and neglect proceeding before us is seriously defective as a charging instrument. The minimum requirements for a petition charging abuse and neglect are set out in W.Va. Code 49-6-1(a). See footnote 1 While it apparently seems self-evident to the majority that an allegation that a parent is addicted to drugs and that a child has been born addicted satisfies all requirements to plead a case that that parent's child is abused or neglected, we do not perceive the issue as being that simple.

The petition before us fails to allege how the specific conduct of the parents constituting abuse or neglect, in the words of the statute, "comes within the statutory definition of abuse and neglect with references thereto". The definitions of "Abused child" and "Neglected child" referred to are set out in W.Va. Code 49-1-3(a) and (g). See footnote 2

We believe that the petition should allege (1) the specific conduct constituting abuse or neglect, (2) the particular statutory definition or definitions relied upon, set forth verbatim, with Code references, and (3) how the specific conduct comes within those definitions.

The petition also fails to allege what supportive services, if any, were offered to the family by the Department of Health and Human Resources. West Virginia Code 49-6-1(c) requires that the State provide supportive services in an effort to remedy the circumstances detrimental to the child or children involved in the proceeding, and W.Va. Code 49-6-1(a), set out in footnote 1, requires that the petition allege what services, if any, have been provided. We recognize that in some extreme situations the Department of Health and Human Resources may be able only to take emergency custody and file the petition. However, reading the two statutory provisions together, we believe that some allegation regarding supportive services is not only advisable, but required.

Lastly, the petition before us names the children but does not allege their whereabouts or that they are residents of, or are found in, the county and State. Likewise, while the parents are named in the caption and mentioned by name and relationship to the children in the allegations of specific conduct, the petition fails to allege their whereabouts or place of residence. While we would not, at this stage, require amendment of the petition to further address these matters, we believe that, as an aid to the trial court in obtaining effective service on and jurisdiction over all necessary parties, petitions in child abuse or neglect case should contain separate allegations, setting out the names, ages or birth dates, and residence or whereabouts of each child, and setting out the names and residence or whereabouts of each respondent, with a clear statement of any relationship to the children.

Notice. We regret that the majority did not address the fact that the record before us does not contain copies of any notice served on the respondents nor any return of service showing, prima facia, that respondents were ever served with copies of the petition and the notice required by law in lieu of summons or other process. West Virginia Code 49-6-1(b) See footnote 3 sets out the requirements for the contents of the notice to be served with a copy of the petition, in lieu of a summons or other process. We see compliance with the requirements that parents be given a notice stating the time and place for hearing the cause, the right to counsel, and that the abuse and neglect proceedings "can result in the permanent termination of the parental rights", as essential to the timely and effective protection of the interests of the children whose welfare is at issue. The absence of a clear record of the service of such a notice on the parents should be addressed in this cause, not only to give binding effect to otherwise sound decrees of the trial court altering the parents' rights, but also to give assurance that the steps taken to protect the children involved are operative.

Non-waiver of defects. We have additional reason for concern about full compliance with the statutory mandates regarding the petition and notice. The record does not disclose that either of the counsel appointed for the appellant in the course of this proceeding raised objection to the form of the petition or notice. While we have pointed out apparent defects in the petition, we cannot say that there are any defects in the notice or in the service of the petition and notice, since, as noted, there is no copy of the notice and return of service in the record. Moreover, because the appellant has personally appeared in this cause with counsel, one might ordinarily assume that defenses arising out of any defect in the notice or any defect in or absence of any return of service had been waived if no objections were timely made. See Manypenny v. Graham, 149 W.Va. 56, 138 S.E.2d 724 (1964).

However, we believe that is not a safe assumption in light of the provision of W.Va. Code 49-6-1(b), that: "Failure to object to defects in the petition and notice shall not be construed as a waiver." We regret that the majority failed to address the impact of that provision of law; we earnestly hope that the trial court will. Unfortunately, those who may be harmed the most by any uncorrected and material defects in the petition or notice are the children who are the subject of this proceeding.

We believe that both prosecutors and defense counsel should be attentive to the petition and notice issues discussed here. The failure to examine a petition or notice for defects or to verify proper service and return of service -- sometimes with respect to a forgotten party -- can operate to deprive a client of sound representation or even to deprive the judgment of the court of its intended force and effect, as against one party or all parties. While such requirements as we have been addressing may appear burdensome at first blush, we respectfully suggest that careful attention to matters of this nature will serve petitioners and respondents and their counsel well. The pleader is likely in the process to ascertain any deficiencies in proof or practice, and the defender is likely to do the same, to the end that the result of the case, whatever it may be, will be prompt, satisfactory, and binding. To those who must prepare petitions, notices, returns of service, publication orders and the like, to comply with such technical or substantive requirements, we suggest that pre-printed or computerized forms can be readily utilized to permit the pleader to swiftly and thoughtfully demonstrate and assure compliance with such requirements.

Adjudication of abuse and neglect. We agree completely with the conclusion of the majority that "the DHHR failed to meet its statutory burden of proof" in this case with respect to proof of abuse and neglect by clear and convincing evidence. However, we believe the reasons assigned by the majority for its decision, while correct, are incomplete.

In dealing with what can constitute proof in a child abuse or neglect proceeding, the Legislature has specifically stated that "[t]he petition shall not be taken as confessed . . . ." W.Va. Code 49-6-2(c). Under the law, a matter is said to be confessed when its resolution results from the voluntary agreement of the parties rather than upon proof otherwise legally adduced. See Morehead v. DeFord, 6 W.Va. 316 (1879); and Third National Bank v. Devine Grocery Company, 97 Tenn. 603, 37 S.W. 390 (1896). It readily appears that the prohibition against taking the petition as confessed contemplates that default judgments will not be taken. We believe that the prohibition has a larger office than simply prohibiting default judgments. We note that the abuse and neglect statute does not provide that a custodial or parental respondent file an answer. See footnote 4 Thus, the present statutory scheme does not contemplate that the issues to be tried in such cases will be narrowed by admissions in a pleading. Rather, we believe that the statutory proscription against taking the petition as confessed requires that the allegations be proved by competent evidence adduced before the trial court, independent of any responsive pleadings.

We find support for this view in our case law. In Calhoun County Bank v. Ellison, 133 W.Va. 9, 54 S.E.2d 182 (1949), this Court considered the effect of admissions made by a committee, Rebecca Ellison, on behalf of her ward, a person considered to be under a disability by reason of mental illness, in pleadings responsive to a claim asserted by Edna Lochard, an adverse party. This Court likened proceedings against an insane persons to those against an infant and, noting that a decree cannot safely be obtained against an infant "upon the mere fact of taking the bill pro confesso, or upon an answer in form by the guardian ad litem", applied that rule to the committee's ward: Speaking for this Court, Judge Haymond said:

> But even if the denials of the answer of the committee are not sufficient, or if the answer contains admissions detrimental or prejudicial to any right or interest of her ward, William M. Ellison, the allegations in the pleadings filed by the defendant, Edna Lockard, can not be taken for confessed against William M. Ellison or his committee, and the admissions of the committee detrimental to any right or interest of William M. Ellison can not have any binding effect on him. . . . "No one may waive or admit away any substantial rights of, or consent to anything which may be prejudicial to, an insane litigant, and this rule embraces a general committee or guardian." . . .
> This Court has said that . . . it is reversible error to decree against an infant upon a bill of complaint which is taken for confessed; and that averments in a bill of complaint which relate to the rights of an infant must be proved in the same manner as if they had been made against an adult and had been denied by answer.
> 133 W.Va. at 28-29; 54 S.E.2d at 193 (citations omitted) (emphasis added).

We are strongly persuaded by this reasoning. Above all else, child abuse and neglect proceedings relate to the rights of an infant. While we are mindful of the rights of parents to contest accusations of abuse and neglect which may result in the termination of their parental rights, we look first to the reality that a child abuse and neglect case is, in its essence, a proceeding which seeks to alter the rights of the child or children involved (a) in their relationship with their parents and (b) in their relationship with the State. We are of the opinion that, for all the reasons underlying the decision in Calhoun County Bank v. Ellision, the statutory provisions that prohibit the taking of a child abuse and neglect petition as confessed, mean that allegations in the petition must be proved in the same manner as if they had been denied by answer. For this reason, as well as those assigned by the majority, we believe that the allegations of the petition must be proved by competent evidence, properly adduced before the trial court.

In the context of a hearing to adjudicate whether a child is abused or neglected, we would emphasize, where the majority is silent, that the competent evidence required must constitute clear and convincing proof of specific conduct and how that conduct falls within the statutory definitions of abuse and neglect relied upon by the State, from all of which the trial court may then make the ultimate finding that the child or children are indeed "abused" or "neglected" children, as defined by law. As the majority correctly noted, the law of this State requires that when an abuse or neglect petition has been filed, the burden is on the State to prove abuse or neglect by clear and convincing evidence. Specifically, in In Interest of S.C., 168 W.Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981), the Court stated that the burden of proof is upon the Department of Health and Human Resources and does not shift to the parent, guardian, or custodian of the child, even where an improvement period is granted. Further, the Court notes that "[t]he standard of proof required to support a court order limiting or terminating parental rights to the custody of minor children is clear, cogent and convincing proof." Syllabus point 6, In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973). See also Matter of Adoption of Schoffstall, 179 W.Va. 350, 368 S.E.2d 720 (1988); State v. Carl B., 171 W.Va. 774, 301 S.E.2d 864 (1983).

Admissions or Stipulations. In stating our conclusions, we do not mean to suggest that proper admissions or stipulations of facts by custodial or parental respondents cannot be considered by the trial court in an abuse and neglect proceeding or that such admissions or stipulations might not contribute to or support a finding of abuse and neglect. We agree with the majority comments regarding the so-called stipulation in this case: The circuit court was not presented with a signed stipulation that could be entered into evidence; the court did not and could not ascertain the parties' "understanding of and assent to the terms"; and, the assistant prosecutor's statement and the court's questioning of the parents "did not constitute evidence." We regret that the majority did not then address in positive terms the proper form, office, and limitations of stipulations or admissions in child abuse and neglect proceedings.

First, we note that W.Va. Code 49-6-2(c) expressly provides to parents a meaningful opportunity to be heard, the right to testify, and the right to present and cross-examine witnesses. In their headlong rush to approve stipulations generally and encourage the rehabilitation of the so-called stipulation in this case, the majority has given no attention to the interplay of these rights with the prohibition against taking allegations as confessed and the use of stipulations. We note again that confessed judgments or judgments by agreement are not, in our view, contemplated with respect to the ultimate issue of abuse or neglect; that is a matter for adjudication. Nevertheless, we would place on respondents desiring to assert the rights arising under W.Va. Code 49-6-2(c) an affirmative duty to advise the trial court of their desire to do so. In our view, it should be clearly understood by counsel for the parties that stipulations effectively waive the rights addressed by W.Va. Code 49-6-2(c), as to the subject matter of the stipulations. We commend the majority for suggesting, however gently, that testimony should be adduced from the parties offering stipulations "regarding their understanding of and assent to the terms of the agreement." We would state additional requirements.

First, counsel to parents should be satisfied that their clients understand that, as to the subject matter of the stipultations, the rights addressed by W.Va. Code 49-6-2(c) are effectively waived. Second, we respectfully suggest that stipulations by parents are not a substitute for the judgment of the court on the ultimate issue of abuse or neglect. Instead, such stipulations may serve as an admission of specific conduct alleged in the petition, upon which the trial court might rely, along with any other evidence needed, to reach the ultimate conclusion of fact and the conclusion of law that the child or children are indeed abused or neglected. Third, we believe the stipulations admitted into evidence should be definite and accurately recorded. Fourth, we suggest that the trial court should be satisfied that the stipulations offered regarding specific conduct constituting or contributing to abuse and neglect should meet those tests for reliability contemplated by the West Virginia Rules of Evidence.

In considering these issues, we also note that the sworn testimony of one or more of the parties in such an action, elicited on either direct or cross-examination could clearly support one or more of the allegations. We find no prohibition in law against compelling the respondents to testify in an abuse and neglect case, save, of course, those privileges against self-incrimination guaranteed by the United States and West Virginia Constitutions and such other privileges, if any, as may arise from other sources.

In summary, to find child abuse or neglect, we would require that the trial court should have before it evidence, properly received and considered, sufficient to meet the standard of clear and convincing proof enunciated by this Court and our Legislature, and sufficient to prove the required allegations of an otherwise sound petition charging abuse and neglect. Where that evidence arises from sources other than sworn testimony, from extra-judicial statements, stipulations, or documentary evidence, the trial court should be satisfied that the evidence admitted meets the requirements for reliability provided by the West Virginia Rules of Evidence. Finally, stipulations received into evidence should not simply be an agreement to or admission of ultimate facts to be adjudicated, such as abuse, neglect, or other ultimate issues; instead, stipulations of fact should aid in providing a basis upon which the ultimate issues may be adjudicated by the court.

Finality of orders. We regret that the majority failed to address the finality of orders in light of the legislative directions that failure to object to defects in the petition or notice shall not be construed as a waiver and that the petition shall not be taken as confessed. In keeping with our concern for prompt disposition of these cases and conscious of the profound concern for the welfare of abused or neglected children evidenced by the extensive attention given that subject in the laws of this State, we cannot conclude that the Legislature, by providing these explicit protections in the course of an abuse or neglect proceeding, intended to deny finality to judgments rendered in such cases after they had been fully litigated. Therefore, while we would willingly give full effect to those legislative directions during the proceedings, as we have indicated in this opinion, we are of the opinion that, except as to constitutional issues that may not be waived, defects in the petition or notice and allegations taken as confessed in a child abuse or neglect case should not deprive orders of finality once such finality otherwise attaches by operation of law and should not be the basis for any collateral attack upon such orders once final. We regret that the majority has not so concluded.

Termination of parental rights. As the majority notes, the statutory scheme for addressing the needs of abused and neglected children contemplates that after adjudication of abuse or neglect, a separate, dispositional process will be undertaken to ferret out the best solution for the children. If the State seeks the termination of parental rights to carry out that plan, then the statute contemplates that certain facts be proven as a prerequisite to the termination of such rights. Those ultimate facts are detailed in W.Va. Code 49-6-5(a)(6) and W.Va. Code 49-6-5(b). At dispositional hearings, the parties are again entitled to a meaningful opportunity to be heard and the right to testify and present and cross-examine witnesses, provided by W.Va. Code 49-6-2(c). Moreover, a trial court undertaking to terminate parental rights must make detailed findings from the evidence before it. We note further that the use of stipulations in the dispositional phase of the case should, in our view, be subject to like qualifications and limitations as those we suggest for adjudicatory hearings: Any stipulations should be certain and accurately recorded and, in so far as they constitute the admission of facts, duly admitted into evidence. The same concern for reliability and understanding suggested by the majority should attach, as, in our view, should those we have suggested. Lastly, we suggest that the ultimate issues in a dispositional hearing, like those in an adjudicatory hearing, ought to be decided by the court, not simply agreed to by the adult parties present. In our view, the same underlying policy reasons attach to both hearings: The rights and relationships of children with their parents, on the one hand, and with the State, on the other, ought be adjudicated in such proceedings and not be simply the subject of a contract between the State and the parents.

Lastly, we note that in the case before us, the trial court conducted a hearing for the termination of appellant's parental rights in which it found, as fact, the following:

> Ms. C . . . has been incarcerated in the Ohio Reformatory for Women since the fall of 1994 and has an expected release date of > October, 1995 with a possibility of release to a work center in Ohio in June of 1995.

We regret that the majority has failed to address the impact of that finding upon the proceeding.

In State ex rel. Acton v. Flowers, Id., the Court specifically stated, in syllabus point 2:

> A natural parent of an infant child does not forfeit his or her parental right to the custody of the child merely by reason of having been convicted of one or more charges of criminal offenses.

We respectfully suggest that the failure of the majority to forthrightly address the thorny issues presented by the appellant's incarceration during the pendency of the cause before us requires that the trial court now resolve those issues as, in its sound discretion, it may be advised.

Consideration of court records. In this appeal, the appellant questioned whether the trial court could properly consider as evidence in the termination hearing the letters apparently written by the appellant to the court, which the judge, acting through the court clerk, filed in the case record of this proceeding after furnishing copies to the various parties' counsel. The majority has failed to deal with this issue.

We believe that Rule 5(e) of the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure, one of the few rules of civil procedure applicable to juvenile abuse and neglect cases, abrogates historic requirements for admitting material to the record by order or bills of exception, and permits papers to be added to the record by the action of a party simply filing them with the clerk of the court for inclusion in the record. See M. Lugar and L. Silverstein, West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure, Commentary on Rule 5, p. 60 (1960).

We would conclude that in this case, when the trial judge filed the letters, they became part of the file and became "public records" within the meaning of Rule 1005 of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence. See footnote 5 We would also conclude that they then became a part of the record in this case. In our view, a trial court, through judicial notice, is entitled to rely on such papers as a part of the record of the case and as public records. W.Va.R.Evid. 201. We would find no error in the court treating those letters as proffered evidence with respect to rulings rendered after their filing.

Although such letters may be considered proffered evidence for judicial notice, we note that, in conjunction with actually taking judicial notice of the letters, the parties to the proceeding are entitled to an opportunity to be heard as to the propriety of taking judicial notice of the proffered evidence and on its tenor. On this point, Rule 201(e) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence provides:

> Opportunity to be heard. -- A party is entitled upon timely request to an opportunity to be heard as to the propriety of taking judicial notice and the tenor of the matter noticed. In the absence of prior notification, the request may be made after judicial notice has been taken.

In our view, it is the duty of the party wishing to be heard on the issues relevant under Rule 201(e) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence to make a timely request for such a hearing. At any such Rule 201(e) hearing, it may be anticipated that the parties may wish to be heard on the other provisions of the law relating to the taking of judicial notice. See footnote 6 As a practical matter, a party should be alert to the possibility that matters filed in the court record might be relied upon by the court at any stage in the proceedings. Fairness suggests that a party desiring to be heard make such request as soon as practicable, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, not be taken by surprise by action taken on the basis of such material unexpectedly or so soon after its filing that there is little or no time to prepare for it.

We also note that, in addition to the letters in the file in the present case, there is also a lengthy report prepared by a welfare worker. We recognize that in juvenile abuse and neglect proceedings, it is common, if not indispensable, for the trial court to receive numerous reports and documents and file the same in the court file, as a matter of course. In our view, the principles relating to the taking of judicial notice, just discussed, should apply to such reports. See footnote 7 We believe that it is incumbent upon counsel to make clear to the court any desire by the parties to inquire under Rule 201(e). Likewise, it may be helpful and save time for the court to require each party give early advice to the court and to the other parties of any such papers of which they desire the court to take judicial notice, and for the court itself to give such notice for documents to be considered, sua sponte. We would leave all of that to the discretion of the trial court, seeking only to encourage, as we have said, the fair, prompt, and satisfactory resolution of these difficult abuse and neglect cases.

CONCLUSION

We believe that in failing to address the matters we have discussed, the majority has ignored substantial issues raised by the record of the present case. This proceeding may effectively terminate infant children's access to most elements of their natural parents' contact, attention, and love. Even though, in many of these sad cases, the prospect for such contact, attention, and love may be or may appear to be minimal, we believe that the courts should consider and adjudicate such cases with due regard to the provisions of law. While we believe that the incidence of child abuse and neglect is all too frequent in our society, the interests of justice require that the courts act in this sensitive and sad area on sound proof, in accord with the requirements of law. This concurring opinion is intended to aid in the efficient and speedy administration of that law. In our view, the procedures followed by the circuit court failed to meet those standards and the majority has failed to address many of the essentials necessary to getting the cause before us promptly and properly resolved.

Footnote: 1 West Virginia Code 49-6-1(a) states:
If the state department or a reputable person believes that a child is neglected or abused, the department or the person may present a petition setting forth the facts to the circuit court in the county in which the child resides, or to the judge of such court in vacation. The petition shall be verified by the oath of some credible person having knowledge of the facts. The petition shall allege specific conduct including time and place, how such conduct comes within the statutory definition of neglect or abuse with references thereto, any supportive services provided by the state department to remedy the alleged circumstances and the relief sought. Upon filing of the petition, the court shall set a time and place for a hearing and shall appoint counsel for the child. When there is an order for temporary custody pursuant to section three [49-6-3] of this article, such hearing shall be held within thirty days of such order, unless a continuance for a reasonable time is granted to a date certain, for good cause shown.

Footnote: 2 W.Va. Code 49-1-3(a) and (g), read as follows:
(a) "Abused child" means a child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by:
(1) A parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home; or
(2) Sexual abuse or sexual exploitation; or
(3) The sale or attempted sale of a child by a parent, guardian or custodian in violation of section sixteen [48-4-16], article four, chapter forty-eight of this code.

(g) (1) "Neglected child" means a child:
(A) Whose physical or mental health is harmed or threatened by a present refusal, failure or inability of the child's parent, guardian or custodian to supply the child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care or education, when such refusal, failure or inability is not due primarily to a lack of financial means on the part of the parent, guardian or custodian; or

(B) Who is presently without necessary food, clothing, shelter, medical care, education or supervision because of the disappearance or absence of the child's parent or custodian;
(2) "Neglected child" does not mean a child whose education is conducted within the provision of section one [18-8-1], article eight, chapter eighteen of this code.

Footnote: 3 West Virginia Code 49-6-1(b) provides:
The petition and notice of the hearing shall be served upon both parents and any other custodian, giving to such parents or custodian at least ten days' notice, and notice shall be given to the state department. In cases wherein personal service within West Virginia cannot be obtained after due diligence upon any parent or other custodian, a copy of the petition and notice of the hearing shall be mailed to such person by certified mail, addressee only, return receipt requested, to the last known address of such person. If said person signs the certificate, service shall be complete and said certificate shall be filed as proof of said service with the clerk of the circuit court. If service cannot be obtained by personal service or by certified mail, notice shall be by publication as a Class II legal advertisement in compliance with the provisions of article three [59-3-1 et seq.], chapter fifty-nine of this code. A notice of hearing shall specify the time and place of the hearing, the right to counsel of the child and parents or other custodians at every stage of the proceedings and the fact that such proceedings can result in the permanent termination of the parental rights. Failure to object to defects in the petition and notice shall not be construed as a waiver.

Footnote: 4 This Court has approved for public comment the "Draft of Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings", which provide for answers to be filed by respondents and other changes in procedure in these cases. This concurring opinion suggests that the proper office of an answer, if authorized by the rules ultimately adopted, may be more limited than the draft rules suggest. However, we address the absence of a current statutory provision for an answer only as an aid to our analysis of the statutory proscription against taking the petition as confessed.

Footnote: 5 Rule 1005 of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence provides:
The contents of an official record, or of a document authorized to be recorded or filed and actually recorded or filed, including data compilations in any form, if otherwise admissible, may be proved by copy, certified as correct in accordance with Rule 902 or testified to be correct by a witness who has compared it with the original. If a copy which complies with the foregoing cannot be obtained by the exercise of reasonable diligence, then other evidence of the contents may be given.

Footnote: 6 The letters in the present case have been purportedly written by the appellant, but it is conceivable that they were written by some party other than the appellant. Obviously, one of the purposes of Rule 201(e) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence is to afford an effective opportunity to raise and explore this type of issue and similar issues.
Without attempting to be exhaustive, the Court notes that there might also be questions of relevancy and competency, and certainly the questions of context and meaning of words in such materials might appropriately be raised and explored.

Footnote: 7 In addition to the possible evidentiary problems raised in conjunction with the letters, the Court perceives that there might be hearsay or expert opinion problems connected with such reports.

Supreme Court Of Appeals Of West Virginia

IN THE MATTER OF BRIAN D., JEFFREY D., SHERRIE D. And ALLEN D., ABUSED AND NEGLECTED CHILDREN, Infants, BARBARA JOHNSON, Respondent Below, Appellant,
v.
JOHN NANNY, DIRECTOR OF ATTENDANCE, OHIO COUNTY SCHOOLS, and WEST VIRGINIA DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH AND HUMAN RESOURCES, Petitioners Below, Appellees.

Submitted: January 10, 1995
Filed: July 19, 1995

SYLLABUS

1. "In a child abuse and neglect hearing, before a court can begin to make any of the dispositional alternatives under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5, it must hold a hearing under W. Va. Code 49-6-2, and determine 'whether such child is abused or neglected.' Such a finding is a prerequisite to further continuation of the case." Syl. Pt. 1, State v. T.C., 172 W. Va. 47, 303 S.E.2d 685 (1983).

2. "Under W. Va. Code, 49-6D-3 (1984), the Department of Human Services is required to prepare a family case plan with participation by the parties and their counsel and to submit it to the court for approval within thirty days." Syl. Pt. 4, State ex rel. W. Va. Dep't of Human Servs. v. Cheryl M., 177 W. Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987).

3. "The purpose of the family case plan as set out in W. Va. Code, 49-6D-3(a) (1984), is to clearly set forth an organized, realistic method of identifying family problems and the logical steps to be used in resolving or lessening these problems." Syl. Pt. 5, State ex rel. W. Va. Dep't of Human Servs. v. Cheryl M., 177 W. Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987).

4. "In formulating the improvement period and family case plans, courts and social service workers should cooperate to provide a workable approach for the resolution of family problems which have prevented the child or children from receiving appropriate care from their parents. The formulation of the improvement period and family case plans should therefore be a consolidated, multi-disciplinary effort among the court system, the parents, attorneys, social service agencies, and any other helping personnel involved in assisting the family." Syl. Pt. 4, In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

5. "Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security." Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

6. "The guardian ad litem's role in abuse and neglect proceedings does not actually cease until such time as the child is placed in a permanent home." Syl. Pt. 5, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991).

7. Cases involving children must be decided not just in the context of competing sets of adults' rights, but also with a regard for the rights of the child(ren).

8. "When the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources seeks to terminate parental rights where an absent parent has abandoned the child, allegations of such abandonment should be included in the petition and every effort made to comply with the notice requirements of W. Va. Code, 49-6-1 (1992)." Syl. Pt. 6, In re Christina L., Nos. 22803 and 22804, ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (filed July 11, 1995).

9. "In cases where there is a termination of parental rights, the circuit court should consider whether continued association with siblings in other placements is in the child's best interests, and if such continued association is in such child's best interests, the court should enter an appropriate order to preserve the rights of siblings to continued contact." Syl. Pt. 4, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991).

10. "When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest." Syl. Pt. 5, In re Christina L., Nos. 22803 and 22804, ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (filed July 11, 1995).

Workman, Justice:
Appellant Barbara Johnson appeals from the May 6, 1993, order of the Circuit Court of Ohio County terminating her parental rights to her son, Jeffrey D. See footnote 1 Given the lengthy and convoluted procedural history of this case, we ordered on January 27, 1995, that an immediate home study be completed and returned to this Court by February 10, 1995. We further ordered that telephone communication between Jeffrey and Appellant be immediately restored and suggested that supervised visitation be arranged, provided that the home study did not indicate that visitation would be harmful to Jeffrey. See footnote 2 After reviewing this matter in full, we reverse the termination order and remand this case to the court below to consider fashioning a meaningful improvement period and ultimately to determine whether it is in the best interests of Jeffrey to be returned to his mother's custody.

I. Seven Years of a Child's Life

In his concurring opinion in In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991), Justice Thomas B. Miller called the majority opinion "the bible not only for our circuit courts, but for all who are involved in this sensitive and difficult field." Id. at 633, 408 S.E.2d at 385 (Miller, J., concurring). The protracted procedural history of this case, as well as its substantive disregard of the rights of all the parties, could make the record below the bible for how not to handle an abuse and neglect case. Furthermore, the muddled state of the record in this matter has made this case difficult to sort out. It is especially troubling that although there are strong intimations of significant neglect and possible abuse, the only allegation of neglect or abuse ever formally alleged was truancy from kindergarten. Yet this matter has now lingered in the court system for almost seven years, without any permanent resolution for Jeffrey.

On December 8, 1988, John Nanny, the director of attendance for the Ohio County schools filed a petition against the Appellant See footnote 3 pursuant to West Virginia Code §§ 49-6-1 to -11 (1992 & Supp. 1994),See footnote 4 alleging neglect on the grounds that Jeffrey had missed twenty-four days of kindergarten out of a possible thirty-two days as of mid-October. See footnote 5 On December 9, 1988, a hearing was held on the neglect petition which resulted in the entry of an order directing that psychological evaluations be performed on Appellant, as well as her four children. The circuit court held a status hearing on the petition on January 27, 1989, and concluded that because Jeffrey was not emotionally ready for kindergarten, his attendance was voluntary pursuant to state law. See footnote 6 Rather than dismissing the petition as to Jeffrey, however, the court delayed its ruling pending receipt of the previously-ordered psychological evaluation.

A status hearing was held on February 17, 1989, at which time the court ordered that a court summary prepared by a protective service worker for the West Virginia Department of Human Services (hereinafter referred to as "DHS")See footnote 7 be filed and scheduled a hearing on June 2, 1989, for the purpose of reviewing the written psychological evaluations. See footnote 8 At the June 2, 1989, hearing, the court heard the testimony of John Nanny and the DHS protective service worker. The DHS worker asked the court to extend the improvement period See footnote 9 through November 1989 on the grounds that he had seen no indication that Jeffrey was going to start attending kindergarten in the fall. See footnote 10 He further testified that parenting classes had not been offered to Appellant as the examining psychologist had not felt that she would benefit from such classes. See footnote 11 The hearing was continued until June 30, 1989, to permit the State to call Corey Roman, the psychologist who performed the evaluations.

The prosecutor chose not to call Mr. Roman at the June 30, 1989, hearing, See footnote 12 but Mr. Nanny informed the court that Jeffrey had successfully begun attending a summer school session. See footnote 13 The court opined that the improvement period "is probably bearing fruit" and continued the matter until September 28, 1989, with the comment that "if the children's attendance is reasonable during that month then we could just dismiss this action . . . ."

The record reflects that the next action taken in connection with this case was the court's entry of an order on August 2, 1989, terminating the "paternal parental rights of Wilbur White and of any person claiming to be the father of any or all of said children . . . ."See footnote 14 A review of the record suggests that the impetus for terminating Mr. White's parental rights was a motion seeking to be relieved See footnote 15 by counsel originally appointed to represent the rights of the unknown father. See footnote 16

The record is unclear as to whether the scheduled hearing for September 28, 1989, ever took place. Two documents in the file, however, were obviously prepared in anticipation of such a hearing. First, a court summary bearing the date of September 20, 1989, by the DHS worker was ordered filed by Judge Callie Tsapis on September 25, 1989. Interestingly, that summary contains the recommendation that "[t]he Court order that the educational neglect petition against Barbara Johnson be dismissed." Second, a letter which is dated September 28, 1989, from John Nanny to Judge Tsapis states that: "I am pleased to share with the Court the improved attendance pattern of the . . . [D.] children as of this date. I would like to see an informal, unsupervised improvement period throughout the current school year."

The record suggests that this neglect case languished for almost two years before any further action was taken. The next entry in the abuse and neglect case court file pertaining to Jeffrey is a "Petition for Review of Custody," which was filed by the DHS on July 2, 1991. This petition indicates that Jeffrey had been residing at the St. John's Home for Children "continuously from March 16, 1990." The petition further reflects that Jeffrey "is in foster care by virtue of a Court order of the Juvenile Referee through the Circuit Court of Ohio County dated March 16, 1990." While the court record is completely devoid of any order bearing the date of March 16, 1990, counsel for Appellant obtained a copy of an order dated March 19, 1990, signed by George J. Fahey as Juvenile Referee, which directed that Jeffrey be "placed in the temporary custody of the West Virginia Department of Human Services, with said Department given the necessary authority to place the juvenile at St. John's Home for Children See footnote 17 . . . ." The order states no basis for Jeffrey's placement. See footnote 18

On August 2, 1991, a hearing was held before the circuit court on the petition for review filed in connection with Jeffrey's placement for more than a year at St. John's. See footnote 19 The October 4, 1991, order reflecting this proceeding indicates that due to the necessity of appointing new counsel See footnote 20 to represent Appellant, a new hearing date was scheduled on the petition for August 9, 1991. The order further reflects that by mutual agreement of the parties the court included a directive restraining Wilbur White from being present at the home of Appellant until further order of the court.

The August 9, 1991, hearing was an evidentiary proceeding which resulted in the entry of an order, entered on October 4, 1991, finding the children of Appellant to be abused "in that the . . . [Appellant] is unable to cope with or to supervise them or control them[.]"See footnote 21 The testimony proffered at this hearing included that of Daniel Tennant, a family therapist at St. John's, who stated that Appellant required individual counseling and that he could not provide the same as his job was limited to family counseling. During the testimony of Mr. Tennant, reference was made to possible physical abuse in the nature of corporal punishment by Wilbur White. See footnote 22 This issue, however, was addressed only in passing and without any specific testimony offered to support the allegations. The only specific problem identified by protective services worker Timothy Randolph was "an inability [on Appellant's part] . . . to cope with the demands of the children and an apparent need of avoiding confrontations with them[.]" The court granted a six-month improvement period See footnote 23 as to Jeffrey and a three-month improvement period concerning Appellant's three other children. Jeffrey's placement at St. John's was continued, whereas the three older children were permitted to remain in the custody of Appellant. The order also directs that Jeffrey cannot continue with overnight home visitation "until Wilbur White . . . leaves the home of" Appellant. The order further continues and encourages Appellant's regular visitation of Jeffrey at St. John's.

During a status conference held on November 15, 1991, Mr. Nanny moved for the termination of Appellant's parental rights. Because the record does not include a transcript from this proceeding, it is unclear as to what specifically prompted the motion for termination of parental rights. See footnote 24 The only reference to Jeffrey in the order concerning the conference is a ruling that his placement at St. John's is to continue.

A hearing was held on January 24, 1992, for the purpose of permitting evidence to be presented with regard to Mr. Nanny's motion for termination of parental rights. As a result of this hearing, the court entered an order dated March 6, 1992, finding that any neglect by Appellant towards her children was of a passive nature and further finding that Appellant "has made progress toward improvement of her passivity." See footnote 25 The court continued Jeffrey's placement at St. John's, but ordered home visits every other weekend. The order further enjoined Mr. White "from having any contact with . . . [Appellant's] children and from being present in the home of the children at any time while they are there. . . ." The court scheduled a review proceeding for May 1, 1992, which resulted in a further continuation of Jeffrey's placement at St. John's as well as the alternating weekend home visits.

On May 18, 1992, a hearing was held during which the court entertained Appellees' motion to place Jeffrey in foster care. Jeffrey's guardian ad litem interjected that "the counselors at St. John's believe that Jeffrey would be better off in a less restrictive environment[]" as the basis for such motion. After considering testimony regarding Jeffrey's progress, the court ruled that foster care arrangements should be arranged to commence on June 8, 1992. The court stated that after sixty days of foster care, it would review the situation and consider permitting him to live at home with Appellant if the foster care situation was working. The court further ordered that Appellant's home visits with Jeffrey were to continue.

At the sixty-day follow-up to Jeffrey's foster-care placement on August 6, 1992, the court directed that Jeffrey was to be returned to Appellant for a ninety-day trial visit. See footnote 26 The order directing the trial visit expressly forbade Appellant from permitting Wilbur White from having any contact with her family and directed her to contact her attorney in the event Mr. White showed up at the family's residence. The record in this case indicates that Mr. White was present in the home during several of Jeffrey's home visits prior to the ninety-day trial visit.

As a result of Jeffrey missing three of the first six days of school in September 1992, the parties returned to court on September 9, 1992. After hearing testimony from John Nanny regarding his discovery of Wilbur White in an alley behind Appellant's residence when he visited the home because of Jeffrey's absence from school, the court revoked the trial home visit and ordered that Jeffrey be returned to "whatever facility or foster home [the DHS] deemed to be best for said child." See footnote 27

A hearing was held on November 6, 1992, and Appellant was, for the first time, permitted to testify regarding the problems she had in trying to keep Wilbur White away from her family and home. See footnote 28 By order entered January 28, 1993, the court stopped all but supervised visitation pending proof that Wilbur White had left the area. See footnote 29 The court did order that Jeffrey be permitted to telephone Appellant "when he so desires, within reasonable limitations." The court obviously was reluctant to accept that Mr. White had indeed left the area, as the order directs the family to seek group counseling and to invite Mr. White to participate in the sessions. Because Judge Tsapis was leaving the bench at the end of 1992, the case was transferred to Judge Broadwater.

On February 16, 1993, Judge Broadwater held his first hearing in this case and endeavored to bring focus and direction to this case. He indicated that the case was ready for disposition, and the guardian ad litem again recommended termination of Appellant's parental rights. A dispositional hearing was then scheduled for March 4, 1993.

Dispositional Hearing

The dispositional hearing began initially on March 4, 1993, and was then continued to March 24, 1993. At the first hearing, the State proffered the testimony of Dr. Maceiko, a psychologist who had seen Jeffrey approximately forty times; John Nanny, and Donna Frader, a DHS protective services worker. Dr. Maceiko testified that his recommendation was to permit Jeffrey to continue in foster care and that he not be returned to Appellant based on her pattern of passive neglect. John Nanny testified that he never intended that Appellant's rights should be terminated but that if forced to make a recommendation, he would choose termination. He further stated that he would have no problem with supervised visitation even at the post-dispositional stage. Ms. Frader agreed with Dr. Maceiko's recommendation that Jeffrey not be returned to Appellant's home. At the continuation of the dispositional hearing on March 24, 1993, Jeffrey testified that he wanted to return home and that he is attached to Appellant. Evidence was proffered that Jeffrey called and spoke to Appellant almost every night. At the conclusion of the hearing, the court directed the parties to return on April 5, 1993.

At the proceeding held on April 5, 1993,See footnote 30 the guardian ad litem renewed his motion for termination of Appellant's parental rights while the State did not render any recommendation. Appellant asked the court for additional help, but the court indicated that it intended to terminate her parental rights as to Jeffrey.

By order entered on May 6, 1993, the court terminated Appellant's parental rights, finding that Appellant was unable to provide the continuity of care required by Jeffrey due to her lack of mental capacity and parenting skills. The court found that Appellant was unable to respond adequately or follow through with the DHS care plan by acquiring adequate parenting skills or conforming her behavior to such plan. The court further observed that there was no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglectful behavior could be substantially corrected and, noted additionally, the absence of a less restrictive alternative to termination. Finally, the order noted that the "[r]eunification of the child Jeffrey D. with his . . . mother [wa]s not in the best interests of the child[.]" The court's termination ruling also reflects its dissatisfaction with Appellant for her failure to comply with court directives to keep Wilbur White away from her home and Jeffrey.

By order entered on December 30, 1993, the court stayed the enforcement of the termination order pending the outcome of her appeal of said order, but denied visitation rights to Appellant during the stay. Appellant filed her petition for appeal seeking a reversal of the termination order on July 13, 1994. This Court granted the petition on October 13, 1994, and placed the matter on an expedited briefing schedule. Although this matter was originally scheduled for oral argument before this Court on November 29, 1994, a motion to continue was made due to the failure of the State and the guardian ad litem to file briefs, See footnote 31 and the matter was continued to the January 1995 term of this Court.

II. The Appeal

Appellant protests initially that the court did not have jurisdiction over Jeffrey at the time the order finding neglect was issued. She maintains that once the circuit court concluded in its order of April 5, 1989, that Jeffrey's kindergarten attendance was voluntary pursuant to state law, See footnote 32 the court no longer had jurisdiction over Jeffrey since the only ground alleged in the petition was truancy. As the State correctly explains, the circuit court properly had jurisdiction over Jeffrey following the entry of the April 5, 1989, order under the authority of West Virginia Code § 49-6-3. That statute provides, in pertinent part:

> Upon the filing of a [neglect or abuse] petition, . . . [i]n a case where there is more than one child in the home, . . . the petition shall so > state, and notwithstanding the fact that the allegations of abuse or neglect may pertain to less than all of such children, each child in the home for whom relief is sought shall be made a party to the proceeding.

> W. Va. Code § 49-6-3(a) (emphasis supplied).

Accordingly, Jeffrey was properly under the court's continuing jurisdiction at the time the neglect order was entered since the neglect petition at issue also named Jeffrey's siblings. By virtue of the court's continuing jurisdiction over his brothers and sister, the court had the authority to monitor the welfare of Jeffrey. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-3.

Appellant next alleges that the circuit court failed to follow the statutory framework for terminating her rights. In syllabus point one of State v. T.C., 172 W. Va. 47, 303 S.E.2d 685 (1983), this Court held that:

> In a child abuse and neglect hearing, before a court can begin to make any of the dispositional alternatives under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5, it must hold a hearing under W. Va. Code 49-6-2, and determine 'whether such child is abused or neglected.' Such a finding is a prerequisite to further continuation of the case.

Id. at 48, 303 S.E.2d at 686. Appellant finds fault with Judge Tsapsis' finding of neglect on the sole grounds that the State was the only party which offered testimony at the hearing on August 9, 1991, at the conclusion of which the finding of neglect was made. Upon review of the record, we observe that Appellant was represented by counsel at this hearing, albeit newly appointed, See footnote 33 and that Appellant was not prevented from offering evidence during this hearing, from raising any objections to the testimony elicited at such hearing, or from seeking a continuance if more time was needed to prepare her case. Appellant further argues that she was not notified that the August 9, 1991, hearing was to be adjudicatory in nature. The record, however, does not reflect any objection raised by Appellant regarding this issue.

The next assignment Appellant raises is the failure of the State to prepare a written case plan prior to the dispositional hearing held on May 3, 1993. Pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49- 6-5(a),

> [f]ollowing a determination pursuant to section two [§ 49-6-2] of this article wherein the court finds a child to be abused or neglected, the department shall file with the court a copy of the child's case plan, including the permanency plan for the child. The term case plan means a written document that includes, where applicable, the > requirements of the family case plan as provided for in . . . [§ 49-6D-3], . . . and that also includes at least the following: A description of the type of home or institution in which the child is to be placed, including a discussion of the appropriateness of the placement and how the agency which is responsible for the child plans to assure that the child receives proper care and that services are provided to the parents, child and foster parents in order to improve the conditions in the parent(s) home, facilitate return of the child to his or her own home or the permanent placement of the child, and address the needs of the child while in foster care, including a discussion of the appropriateness of the services that have been provided to the child. . . . Copies of the child's case plan shall be sent to the child's attorney and parent, guardian or custodian at least five days prior to the dispositional hearing. The court shall forthwith proceed to disposition giving both the petitioner and respondents an opportunity to be heard.

> W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a).

The obligation to formulate a case plan arises upon the granting of an improvement period under West Virginia Code § 49-6- 2(b). See Syl. Pt. 3, State ex rel. W. Va. Dep't of Human Servs. v. Cheryl M., 177 W. Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987). We expounded on the time period permitted statutorily for preparing case plans and the purpose of such plans in syllabus points four and five of Cheryl M.:

> Under W. Va. Code, 49-6D-3 (1984), the Department of Human Services is required to prepare a family case plan with participation by the parties and their counsel and to submit it to the court for approval within thirty days.
> The purpose of the family case plan as set out in W. Va. Code, 49-6D-3(a) (1984), is to clearly set forth an organized, realistic method of identifying family problems and the logical steps to be used in resolving or lessening these problems.
> 177 W. Va. at 688-89, 356 S.E.2d at 181-82, syl. pts. 4, 5.

More recently, we have enunciated, at length, the critical importance of developing and complying with meaningful improvement periods and family case plans in Carlita B. See 185 W. Va. at 624- 29, 408 S.E.2d at 376-81. We explained in syllabus point four of Carlita B. that,

> [i]n formulating the improvement period and family case plans, courts and social service workers should cooperate to provide a workable approach for the resolution of family problems which have prevented the child or children from receiving appropriate care from their parents. The formulation of the improvement period and family case plans should therefore be a consolidated, multi- disciplinary effort among the court system, the parents, attorneys, social service agencies, and any other helping personnel involved in assisting the family.
> Id. at 616, 408 S.E.2d at 368. We further explained:
>
> The goal [of improvement periods and case plans] should be the development of a program designed to assist the parent(s) in dealing with any problems which interfere with his ability to be an effective parent and to foster an improved relationship between parent and child with an eventual restoration of full parental rights a hoped-for result. The improvement period and family case plans must establish specific measures for the achievement of these goals, as an improvement period must be more than a mere passage of time. It is a period in which the D.H.S. and the court should attempt to facilitate the parent's success, but wherein the parent must understand that he bears a responsibility to demonstrate sufficient progress and improvement to justify return to him of the child.

In this case, the Appellees readily concede that the statutorily-required case plan was not filed prior to or at the time of the dispositional hearing. See footnote 34

The only term imposed by the circuit court in connection with the six-month improvement period ordered at the August 9, 1991, hearing and reflected by an October 4, 1991, order was that "the children and the respondent [Appellant] shall attend family counseling and such individual counseling as is appropriate and recommended by the Department of Health and Human Resources and the staff at St. John's Home[.]" The record reflects that a family therapist at St. John's testified at the August 9, 1991, hearing that Appellant's primary problem was her nonassertiveness. Mr. Tennant testified:

> Since Jeffrey has come to Saint John's last June, Barbara J., Jeffrey's mom, has been the only family member to attend family therapy. She's attended one time weekly faithfully. Unfortunately, family therapy can be done with one person but, unfortunately, not with

> Barbara. She lacks the ability to learn to take charge and control her family, regardless of her coming to therapy. Her family situation hasn't changed at all since I met them, because of her inability -- it's no fault of hers. I think that this is just one of her problems that she has; being nonassertive. That can be worked out in individual counseling, but my job at Saint John's is family counseling. (emphasis supplied)

At the August 9, 1991, hearing Mr. Tennant explained his recommendation of another six-month improvement period See footnote 35 by stating, "I think that Barbara is willing to change. I think that the change can occur in six months." However, despite the recognized need for individualized counseling for Appellant, the record does not reflect that Appellant ever received this type of specialized help during this six-month improvement period. We cautioned against improvement periods being nothing but a "mere passage of time" in Carlita B., yet it appears that this is exactly what occurred in the instant case. See 185 W. Va. at 625, 408 S.E.2d at 377.

We recognized in Cheryl M. that Appellant "was entitled to a meaningful improvement period to demonstrate her ability to care for her child as required by W. Va. Code, 49-6-2." 177 W. Va. at 695, 356 S.E.2d at 188. Given the failure of the State to provide Appellant with any individualized counseling aimed at addressing her lack of assertiveness, plus the absence of any additional measures taken to assist Appellant "in dealing with any problems which interfere[d] with . . . [her] ability to be an effective parent[,]" the various improvement periods cannot be viewed as meaningful consistent with this Court's rulings in Cheryl M. and Carlita B. See 177 W. Va. at 695, 356 S.E.2d at 188; 185 W. Va. at 625, 408 S.E.2d at 377. Accordingly, we reverse on the grounds that Appellant was not provided the meaningful improvement period to which she was entitled.

III. The Need for Monitoring

In Carlita B., we pronounced that "[c]hild abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security." 185 W. Va. at 615, 408 S.E.2d at 367, Syl. Pt. 1, in part. As the procedural history of this case illustrates, Jeffrey's case has unnecessarily failed to reach the point of finality for many years. This case amplifies our observations in Carlita B. that

> [t]he bulk of the most aggravated procedural delays . . . are occasioned less by the complexities of mending broken people and relationships than by the tendency of these types of cases to fall > through the cracks in the system. The long procedural delays in this and most other abuse and neglect cases considered by this Court in the last decade indicate that neither the lawyers nor the courts are doing an adequate job of assuring that children--the most voiceless segment of our society--aren't left to languish in a limbo-like state during a time most crucial to their development.

Despite our directive in Carlita B., abuse and neglect cases still are not being accorded priority status, and many circuit courts are still doing a woefully inadequate job of monitoring and managing the progress of these cases. The instant case is one of the more aggravated examples of how courts permit these cases to flag along with no real focus or direction. Carlita B., Canon 3 of the Code of Judicial Conduct, See footnote 36 and Rule 8See footnote 37 of the Time Standards for Circuit Courts place an affirmative duty on circuit court judges to manage the progress of cases. Therefore, this Court reiterates that circuit court judges must take whatever steps are necessary to monitor abuse and neglect cases pending before them in a diligent and expeditious fashion.

We are immensely troubled by the record's suggestion that Jeffrey's removal from his home was by order of a juvenile referee rather than a circuit court, even though an abuse and neglect case was pending. West Virginia Code § 49-5-8 (1995) provides for the circuit court's entry of an order directing that a child be taken into the state's custody if one of four grounds exist. See footnote 38 Given this Court's frustrated attempt to secure the complete juvenile record pertaining to Jeffrey, however, we cannot state with certainty that a circuit court order was never entered in connection with Jeffrey's removal from his home. We can only state that the documentation that has been lodged with this Court by the circuit court clerk, and represented as "the complete record," contains no such order.

We simply cannot fathom why it took so many years and an order by this Court to get a permanency plan developed. See footnote 39 As late as February 10, 1993, it was noted on a progress report that "[a] long term goal has not been developed for Jeff at this time." See footnote 40 This child, as well as numerous others who are not currently before the Court, deserve much better. They deserve to know where and with whom they are going to live and to be secure in the knowledge that there will eventually be some continuity in their fragile lives. Consistent with our recognition in syllabus point five of James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991), that "[t]he guardian ad litem's role in abuse and neglect proceedings does not actually cease until such time as the child is placed in a permanent home[,]" the obligations of the courts and the DHS similarly do not dissipate until a permanent resolution is made. Id. at 649, 408 S.E.2d at 401.

IV. A Meaningful Improvement Period

Despite all the so-called "improvement periods" in this case, none of them appear to have comported with the kind of focused, goal-oriented plan that we have previously mandated. Upon remand, the court, in formulating a meaningful improvement period, should adopt the consolidated, multi-disciplinary approach we recommended in Carlita B., giving regard not only to the provision of individual counseling for the mother, but also conducting a plenary review of the child's needs--physical, emotional, educational, and needed services. See footnote 41

In this connection, however, it should be noted that the home study provided to this Court on February 19, 1995, suggests a potential obstacle to such an improvement period. Appellant repeatedly indicated that she is unwilling to participate in any counseling programs offered to her by the DHS. She is quoted as stating that "she does not want an[y] involvement with the Department of Health & Human Resources, and sees our department as vindictive and harassing." The home study further indicates that Appellant "feels that she will not need any help adjusting to Jeffrey's return and has refused our offer of Family Preservation or Family Counseling Services, but states she will allow Jeffrey to continue seeing his therapist, if needed." Given this alleged unwillingness to engage in counseling services that the DHS has concluded are necessary, the circuit court on remand may inquire into this matter and if it finds that Appellant refuses to participate in individual counseling, then an improvement period would be for naught. Furthermore, a circuit court always has the authority to terminate an improvement period if there is evidence that the parent is not following the conditions prescribed or is failing to make improvement. The record is replete with indications that the Appellant has lacked insight in recognizing her parental deficits and in cooperating with the DHS to remedy the underlying problems. If a record is established on remand that the Appellant has been offered individual counseling in the past and has refused such counseling, then it may proceed to disposition.

At the conclusion of the improvement period, if given, the court should proceed to the determination set forth in syllabus point six of Carlita B.:

> 'the court shall review the performance of the parents in attempting to attain the goals of the improvement period and shall, in the court's discretion, determine whether the conditions of the improvement period have been satisfied and whether sufficient improvement has been made in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child.'
> 185 W. Va. at 616, 408 S.E.2d at 368, Syl. Pt. 6, in part.

In making this determination, the reality of Jeffrey's life during the last several years, including the fact that he has now resided with the Harrises for approximately three years cannot be ignored. Cases involving children must be decided not just in the context of competing sets of adults' rights, but also with a regard for the rights of the child(ren). Thus, how Jeffrey has fared educationally and emotionally with these foster parents and Jeffrey's own feelings and emotional attachments should be taken into consideration by the lower court.

As we said in Lemley v. Barr, 176 W. Va. 378, 343 S.E.2d 101 (1986), a case involving the rights of natural versus adoptive parents:

> 'The day is long past in this State, if it had ever been when the right of a parent to the custody of his or her child, where the extraordinary circumstances are present, would be enforced inexorably, contrary to the best interest of the child, on the theory solely of an absolute legal right. Instead, in the extraordinary circumstance, when there is a conflict, the best interest of the child has always been regarded as superior to the right of parental custody. Indeed, analysis of the cases reveals a shifting of emphasis rather than a remaking of substance. This shifting reflects more the modern principle that a child is a person, and not a subperson over whom the parent has an absolute possessory interest. A child has rights too, some of which are of a constitutional magnitude.'
> Id. at 386, 343 S.E.2d at 109 (quoting In re Bennett v. Jeffreys, 356 N.E.2d 277, 281 (N.Y. 1976)).

Another critical factor which must be examined is the living arrangements and potential presence of Wilbur White in Jeffrey's life, and the ability of the mother (or the lack thereof) to adequately protect Jeffrey. While the record in this case is very limited as to the actual harm that Mr. White has inflicted on Jeffrey, the various orders, psychological reports, court summaries, and recommendations from the guardian ad litem all concur on one point--Wilbur White's presence is harmful to Jeffrey. The failure of the mother to comply with earlier court orders not to permit Mr. White in the home with Jeffrey may also be considered on remand. The home study submitted to this Court on February 10, 1995, includes information that attempts made to verify Mr. White's current residence indicate that Mr. White receives his mail at the same address at which Appellant currently resides. This fact alone may, upon introduction of proper evidence verifying that Mr. White does pose a continuing problem with regards to Jeffrey, prevent Appellant from receiving custody of Jeffrey. Clearly, it would be disastrous to permit Jeffrey to return to his mother's home on a permanent basis without resolving this issue of Mr. White's presence and the potential that his presence, permanent or sporadic, would have a deleterious effect on Jeffrey's continued progress.

Should the court eventually determine that Jeffrey should be reunified with his mother, such change should be accomplished with a sufficient gradual transition period to enable Jeffrey to accept such change with as little upheaval as possible to his life. See Syl. Pt. 3, James M., 185 W. Va. at 649, 408 S.E.2d at 401 (recognizing need for gradual transition when permanent custodial arrangements are altered.)See footnote 42

In In re Christina L., Nos. 22803 and 22804, ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (filed July 11, 1995), we recently pointed out that West Virginia Code § 49-6-1 (1995) sets forth mandatory notice requirements in abuse and neglect cases. See footnote 43 In the instant case, it appears that the rights of Wilbur White were terminated without any allegation of abuse or neglect. Indeed, such rights appear to have been terminated on the basis of a finding of abandonment without there ever having been a formal allegation of abandonment. See footnote 44 Although the issue of the rights of Wilbur White are not before the Court at this time, we urge the lower court on remand to clean up the record, if not for the father's benefit (who from the record before us has indicated very little interest in the child), at least for Jeffrey's benefit.

We spoke with disapproval in Christina L. of the practice of not including allegations of abandonment in petitions for abuse and neglect, effectively leaving the child's legal status in limbo. In syllabus point six of Christina L., we said: "When the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources seeks to terminate parental rights where an absent parent has abandoned the child, allegations of such abandonment should be included in the petition and every effort made to comply with the notice requirements of W. Va. Code, 49-6-1 (1992)." If the rights of the father were terminated without due process, Jeffrey's future status could be subject to challenge.

V. Right of Child to Continued Associationy

In the event the proceedings on remand result in a termination of Appellant's parental rights, the court should consider whether the child should have continued visitation with his mother and/or his siblings, notwithstanding the termination of rights. Previously, this Court recognized the need for continuing association between siblings or step-siblings following a parental rights termination in syllabus point four of James M.:

> In cases where there is a termination of parental rights, the circuit court should consider whether continued association with siblings in > other placements is in the child's best interests, and if such continued association is in such child's best interests, the court should enter an appropriate order to preserve the rights of siblings to continued contact.

> 185 W. Va. at 649, 408 S.E.2d at 401.

We recently extended this concept to include the possibility of visitation between the child and the parent whose rights have been terminated for abuse or neglect:

> When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest.
> Syl. Pt. 5, Nos. 22804 and 22804, ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (filed July 11, 1995).

Accordingly, in the event that Appellant's parental rights are re-terminated, the court may consider awarding visitation rights to her consistent with the considerations identified in Christina L. If the court eventually returns custody to Appellant, it should inquire into the relationship Jeffrey has formed with his foster parents and, if it is in his best interests, fashion a plan for continued association between the foster parents and the child. As we said in Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W. Va. 448, 388 S.E.2d 322 (1989), a child has a right to continued association with those to whom he has formed an emotional bond. Id. at 452-53, 388 S.E.2d at 325-26.

Based on the foregoing, we hereby reverse the decision of the Circuit Court of Ohio County and remand this matter for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

Footnote: 1 We identify the child at issue by initials given his juvenile status plus the sensitive factual nature of this case in accordance with this Court's previous decisions. See, e.g., In re Jonathan P., 182 W. Va. 302, 303, 387 S.E.2d 537, 538 n.1 (1989).

Footnote: 2 Our order re-establishing visitation was necessitated by: (1) the complete extinguishment of visitation between Jeffrey and Appellant since December 30, 1993, based solely on a petition asserting neglect on the basis of Jeffrey's truancy from kindergarten at a time when he was not legally required to attend school; (2) evidence in the record of a close emotional bond between Jeffrey and Appellant; and (3) the granting of a stay of Appellant's termination pending appeal, but denial of continued contact.

Footnote: 3 Strangely enough, no allegations were made against Jeffrey's father in the neglect petition and he was not named as a party. The record is unclear as to whether he was served with a copy of the petition.

Footnote: 4 Because neither the 1992 or the 1994 amendments to the child neglect or abuse statutes affect the substantive provisions at issue, we do not cite to prior versions of the statutes which were in effect during earlier stages of this case.

Footnote: 5 The petition also named two of Jeffrey's siblings as being truant.

Footnote: 6 The order reflecting the January 27, 1989, hearing states that: "the Court heard testimony and reviewed West Virginia Code [§] 18-8-1 and West Virginia Code [§] 18-8-1a and determined that Jeffrey D. would not be compelled to continue attending kindergarten because he does not appear emotionally ready to attend school." West Virginia Code § 18-8-1 (1994) provides that: "Compulsory school attendance shall begin with the school year in which the sixth birthday is reached prior to the first day of September of such year or upon enrolling in a publicly sup[p]orted kindergarten program . . . ." West Virginia Code § 18-8-1a provides "[t]hat a child may be removed from such kindergarten program when the principal, teacher and parent or guardian concur that the best interest of the child would not be served by requiring further attendance . . . ." In making its ruling, the circuit court relied on Jeffrey's lack of emotional readiness plus the fact that he had not reached the age of six prior to the first day of September 1988, given his birthdate of December 2, 1982.

Footnote: 7 Notwithstanding the renaming of the DHS to the Department of Health and Human Resources, the department will be referred to as the DHS throughout this opinion for consistency.

Footnote: 8 Although the court-ordered psychological evaluations are dated as being completed on February 2, 1989, the record reveals that the circuit court did not receive such evaluations until sometime after April 3, 1989.

Footnote: 9 The record does not contain an order reflecting the granting of an improvement period for the period covering December 1988 until the June 2, 1989, hearing. The first reference to an improvement period that appears in the record is in a court summary dated May 31, 1989, wherein a DHS worker recommends the granting of an improvement period until November 1989. In the transcript from the June 2, 1989, hearing, Judge Tsapsis indicates that she is granting the recommended improvement period through November 1989. The only stated directive, which might be viewed as a term of such improvement period, was an admonition by the court during the June 2, 1989, hearing whereby "the burden [was placed] on you [Appellant] to see to it that Jeffrey attends those classes that the arrangements have been made for." The classes referred to were part-time summer instruction at Clay Elementary for speech.

The record does not contain an order reflecting the granting of the improvement period on June 2, 1989, or setting forth the terms and conditions of such improvement period. Appellee DHS states in its brief: "The dispositional order states that the Department filed a case plan pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-5. Neither the court file nor Appellee's file reflect a case plan at the time of disposition." This is highly confusing as the record tendered to this Court contains a letter dated June 30, 1989, from Gary L. Smith, Protective Service Worker, to Judge Tsapis attaching a family case plan. That attached document provides as a goal that there are to be "[n]o unexcused days from school for children." It further requires that Appellant is to: "See to it that the children get up for school and go to school. Have doctor's excuses when children miss school. Have Jeffrey attend summer school."

Footnote: 10 DHS protective services worker, Gary L. Smith, testified at the hearing--"I'm very pessimistic that Jeffrey D. is going to start attending kindergarten as far as in the fall. I have seen no signs as of yet where his attitude is changing towards school."

Footnote: 11 The report prepared by Corey P. Roman, M.A., states that:

> The examiner is not of the opinion that Ms. Johnson and her Family [sic] would gain benefit from outpatient counseling in order to deal with school attendance. The examiner suspects that limits in insight, understanding and, more importantly, motivation would circumvent successful outcome in this regard.

Footnote: 12 The explanation offered by the State for this tact was a determination that Mr. Roman could not offer any additional information that was not already reflected in his reports.

Footnote: 13 The record reflects that Jeffrey had started attending the summer program on June 13, 1989, which involved a half-day kindergarten program on some days and on others, attendance in remedial speech and reading classes.

Footnote: 14 The record repeatedly sets forth that Wilbur White is the biological father of Jeffrey. According to the report of psychologist William Hewitt dated March 18, 1991, Jeffrey related that he had lived with his uncle for a time. It is suggested that Jeffrey's references to his uncle were in fact to Mr. White and were apparently geared at hiding the fact that Mr. White was living periodically at the Appellant's residence. Ironically, however, the petition for abuse and neglect is silent as to the identity of the father and as to any allegations against him.

Footnote: 15 Counsel's motion to be relieved was prompted by an apparent change in her employment status.

Footnote: 16 The record provides minimal information regarding Mr. White's termination. Judge Tsapsis stated at the June 2, 1989, hearing that she was going to find the children abandoned by their father and there would therefore be "no need to have a father being represented here any longer." In response to this statement, Appellant's former counsel informed the court that "Jeffrey's father is known" and that "[h]e has shown some interest on occasion." The record contains an order entered on August 2, 1989, which states that "notice by Class II publication as required by law was made to the father or fathers of the children that their parental rights . . . would be terminated . . . ." and "that the paternal parental rights of Wilbur White . . . shall be . . . terminated." The record reflects additionally that a "Notice of Hearing to Appeal Termination of Parental Rights" was filed on July 19, 1989, providing Mr. White with the opportunity to appeal the termination order on September 28, 1989. Mr. White, however, has never challenged the termination of his parental rights to Jeffrey.

Footnote: 17 The record provides no information on the nature of this facility, but according to the 1991 West Virginia Child Care Association Directory, it appears to be a small group home for boys ages 8-14.

Footnote: 18 Subsequent to the oral argument of this case, this Court undertook on its own to obtain a copy of the juvenile file pertaining to Jeffrey in an effort to ascertain the nature of Jeffrey's placement at St. John's. The limited documentation which this Court obtained failed to reveal any further information regarding what incident(s) prompted the placement. The only reference in the record regarding the basis for the placement is noted in a psychological report dated March 18, 1991, and states that Jeffrey's placement was "court-ordered" "in part because of school refusal or school phobia."

Footnote: 19 West Virginia Code § 49-6-8(a) (1995) requires that,

"[i]f, twelve months after receipt (by the state department or its authorized agent) of physical custody of a child either by a court ordered placement or by a voluntary agreement, the state department has not placed a child in permanent foster care or an adoptive home or placed the child with a natural parent, the state department shall file with the court a petition for review of the case.

Footnote: 20 Apparently, Appellant's former counsel abandoned her without filing a motion with the court seeking to be relieved from his/her appointment as counsel.

Footnote: 21 There are in fact two orders that were entered on October 4, 1991: (1) the order appointing new counsel for Appellant and restraining Mr. White "from being present at the home of . . . [Appellant] until further order of th[e] Court[;]" and (2) the order finding Appellant's children to be abused.

Footnote: 22 Mr. White declared to a family therapist at St. John's and to a DHS caseworker that "'slapping Jeff around'" was his style of disciplining the child. This Court notes, however, that the allegation of physical abuse which surfaces periodically throughout these proceedings was never alleged in the petition and never formally addressed in any evidentiary proceeding, nor does it appear to be a specific basis for the various rulings entered throughout the years. Instead, the repeated negative references to Wilbur White appear to be based on his negative influence and effect on Jeffrey in general, as gleaned from the court summaries and testimony of Mr. Nanny and the various DHS workers.

Footnote: 23 As in 1981 at the time of the court's ruling, West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(b) (1995) provides for one improvement period of three to twelve months.

Footnote: 24 In reviewing the order which reflects the status conference proceedings, it appears that Appellant's daughter and her welfare were more the focus of the proceeding than Jeffrey.

Footnote: 25 The petition was dismissed as to Jeffrey's two brothers and an improvement period of three months was ordered with regard to his sister.

Footnote: 26 Only Jeffrey's guardian ad litem objected to the court's ruling that Jeffrey be permitted a trial home visit.

Footnote: 27 Jeffrey was returned to foster care effective September 9, 1992.

Footnote: 28 One specific explanation given by Appellant to the court was that the police did not help her enforce the restraining order entered against Mr. White.

Footnote: 29 The order reflects that Mr. White was purportedly residing in Cleveland, Ohio.

Footnote: 30 Although the record and the transcript itself bear the date of April 5, 1994, as opposed to 1993, this proceeding would not have occurred post-termination and the parties themselves have referred to the proceedings reflected by such transcript as having occurred on April 5, 1993. Accordingly, we presume that an error was made in transcription.

Footnote: 31 The motion to continue filed by the West Virginia Attorney General on behalf of the DHS reflects that there was a definite lack of communication between the office of the attorney general and the Ohio County Prosecutor's office with regard to who was responsible for representation of the DHS in connection with this case. The motion further states that the scheduling order prepared by the clerk of this Court was not served on the Ohio County Prosecuting Attorney, the DHS, or the attorney general's office. The records of the clerk of this Court, however, reflect that two notices were sent to Randy Dean Gossett, guardian ad litem; Greg Gellner, Appellant's counsel; and Scott R. Smith, counsel for DHS regarding the original scheduling of this matter for oral argument on November 29, 1994. Additionally, it is alleged in the motion to continue that Appellant's brief, filed on November 4, 1994, was not served on the DHS or the attorney general's office. If this allegation is true, this constitutes an obvious violation of Rule 15 of this Court's Rules of Appellate Procedure.

Footnote: 32 See supra note 6.

Footnote: 33 Counsel representing Appellant had been appointed only seven days prior to the August 9, 1991, hearing.

Footnote: 34 But see supra note 9.

Footnote: 35 The DHS caseworker concurred in Mr. Tennant's recommendation regarding a six-month improvement period.

Footnote: 36 Canon 3 of the Code of Judicial Conduct requires that: "A judge shall perform the duties of judicial office impartially and diligently." Section B.(8) of that Canon provides that "[a] judge shall dispose of all judicial matters promptly, efficiently, and fairly."

Footnote: 37 Rule 8 of the Rules on Time Standards for Circuit Courts, addressing abuse and neglect proceedings, provides:

(a) Applicability. The time standards set forth in this rule are not intended to supersede, but to supplement, statutory provisions applicable to civil abuse and neglect proceedings.

(b) Pre-Adjudicatory Motions. An order shall be entered on pre-adjudicatory motions within one week of hearing on the motions.

(c) Preliminary Hearing. If a preliminary hearing is held, it shall be conducted within two weeks from the filing of the petition.

(d) Adjudication. Unless continued for good cause to a date certain or unless a pre- adjudicatory improvement period is granted, the adjudicatory order shall be entered within one month of the filing of the petition if the child is not in temporary custody. If a pre- adjudicatory improvement period is granted, the adjudicatory order shall be entered within two weeks of the end of the pre-adjudicatory improvement period.

(e) Disposition. If abuse or neglect is found, the dispositional order placing the child shall be entered within six weeks of the adjudicatory order.

(f) Post-Adjudicatory Improvement Period. A further dispositional order shall be entered within two weeks of the end of the post-adjudicatory improvement period.

(g) Monitoring Improvement Period. An assessment of the status of the child(ren) and the progress of the parent(s) towards satisfying the conditions of the improvement period shall be conducted on a monthly basis.

(h) Modification. An order shall be entered on a motion to modify within one month of the filing of the motion.

(i) Foster Care Review. A further dispositional order shall be entered within one month of the filing of a petition for foster care review.

(j) Reporting Standard. The reporting standard from the filing of the petition to disposition shall be twelve months.

Footnote: 38 Those four grounds are:

(1) The petition shows that grounds exist for the arrest of an adult in identical circumstances; (2) the health, safety and welfare of the child demand such custody; (3) the child is a fugitive from a lawful custody or commitment order of a juvenile court; or (4) the child has a record of willful failure to appear at juvenile proceedings, and custody is necessary to assure his or her presence before the court.

W. Va. Code § 49-5-8(a).

Footnote: 39 Only when this Court directed, by order dated January 27, 1995, that a home study was to be conducted and "[a] copy of any permanency plan which has been prepared with regard to Jeffrey D. . . . forwarded immediately to this Court[]" was such a plan first formulated.

Footnote: 40 In the home study that was submitted to this Court on February 10, 1995, it is noted that: "The previous permanent plan for Jeffrey had been for Jeffrey to remain with the Harrises [foster parents], either in subsidized adoption or permanent foster care. Jeffrey would have had input as to which type of care he desired." This reference to a "previous permanent plan" is bewildering to this Court as the parties have stated that no previous plan had ever been prepared.

Footnote: 41 The record does reflect that Jeffrey has made steady progress during his years at St. John's and in foster care.

Footnote: 42 Based on Appellant's comment that she would need time to get reacquainted with Jeffrey when questioned in connection with the home study that was prepared at the direction of this Court, even she is cognizant of the need to gradually work towards any reunification or extended visitation period.

Footnote: 43 West Virginia Code § 49-6-1(b) states:

The petition and notice of the hearing shall be served upon both parents and any other custodian, giving to such parents or custodian at least ten days' notice, and notice shall be given to the state department. In cases wherein personal service within West Virginia cannot be obtained after due diligence upon any parent or other custodian, a copy of the petition and notice of the hearing shall be mailed to such person by certified mail, addressee only, return receipt requested, to the last known address of such person. If said person signs the certificate, service shall be complete and said certificate shall be filed as proof of said service with the clerk of the circuit court. If service cannot be obtained by personal service or by certified mail, notice shall be by publication as a Class II legal advertisement in compliance with the provisions of article three [§ 59-3-1 et seq.], chapter fifty-nine of this code. A notice of hearing shall specify the time and place of the hearing, the right to counsel of the child and parents or other custodians at every stage of the proceedings and the fact that such proceedings can result in the permanent termination of the parental rights. Failure to object to defects in the petition and notice shall not be construed as a waiver.

Footnote: 44 As we pointed out in syllabus point two of James M.: "Abandonment of a child by a parent(s) constitutes compelling circumstances sufficient to justify the denial of an improvement period." 185 W. Va. at 649, 408 S.E.2d at 401. And as we further pointed out in Christina L., it also constitutes grounds for termination of parental rights. However, such abandonment must be alleged and proven.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syllabus Point 1, In the Interest of: Tiffany S. Marie, 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

2. "'A natural parent of an infant child does not forfeit his or her parental right to the custody of the child merely by reason of having been convicted of one or more charges of criminal offenses.' Syllabus point 2, State ex rel. Acton v. Flowers, 154 W.Va. 209, 174 S.E.2d 742 (1970)." Syllabus Point 7, In re Emily, 208 W.Va. 325, 540 S.E.2d 542 (2000).

Per Curiam:

This case is before this Court upon appeal of a final order of the Circuit Court of Upshur County entered on July 13, 2000. Pursuant to that order, the circuit court terminated the parental rights of the appellant and respondent below, Brian L. D.,[1] to his child, Brian James D.[2] In this appeal, the appellant contends that the circuit court erred by terminating his parental rights based solely upon the fact that he committed the felony offense of delivery of a controlled substance. This Court has before it the petition for appeal, the entire record, and the briefs and argument of counsel.[3] For the reasons set forth below, the final order is reversed, and this case is remanded to the circuit court to develop and oversee a plan to reunify the appellant with his child.

I.

Abuse and neglect proceedings were initially instituted against the appellant and Brian James D.'s mother, Amanda K., in May 1999, after Amanda K. was incarcerated as a result of aiding and

[1]We follow our past practice in child abuse and neglect proceedings and other cases involving sensitive facts and do not use the last names of the parties. In the Matter of Jonathan P., 182 W.Va. 302, 303 n.1, 387 S.E.2d 537, 538 n.1 (1989).

[2]The parental rights of the child's mother, Amanda K., were also terminated, but she did not appeal the decision and is no longer a party in this case.

[3]At this point, we note that the child's guardian ad litem never filed a brief with this Court or appeared before us for oral argument. We find it disconcerting that the guardian has failed to represent his client at this crucial stage of the proceedings. In Syllabus Point 5 of James M. v. Maynard, 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991), this Court held that "[t]he guardian ad litem's role in abuse and neglect proceedings does not actually cease until such time as the child is placed in a permanent home." In addition, we have advised guardians ad litem that "it is their responsibility to represent their clients in every stage of the abuse and/or neglect proceedings." In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 454 n.7, 460 S.E.2d 692, 700 n.7 (1995). We once again emphasize that a guardian ad litem's duty to represent a child includes filing briefs and appearing before this Court for oral argument when an appeal has been filed.

abetting sexual assault and sexual abuse of an unrelated juvenile.[4] The petition alleging abuse and neglect of Brian James D. contained numerous allegations against Amanda K. but only asserted that the appellant had failed to visit or have any contact with the child. As a result of a dispositional hearing on August 3, 1999, the allegations against both parents were dismissed, and the appellant was granted custody of Brian James D.[5]

On March 29, 2000, a second abuse and neglect petition was filed against the appellant and Amanda K. This petition stated that the appellant had been arrested and charged with delivery of a controlled substance, marihuana. The petition further alleged that the appellant had admitted to selling marihuana from his residence, thereby exposing Brian James D. to drug trafficking and its associated dangers. The petition also noted that the appellant's wife, Donna H. D., had been arrested and charged with the same felony and that Amanda K. remained incarcerated. Upon filing of the petition, Brian James D. was placed in the temporary physical and legal custody of the appellee and petitioner below, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR").

An adjudicatory hearing was held on May 3, 2000, at which time the appellant admitted that he had sold drugs from his residence while Brian James D. was present. Thus, the circuit court found that the appellant had abused and neglected Brian James D. by exposing him to drug trafficking and its associated dangers as asserted by the DHHR. At the conclusion of the adjudicatory hearing, the appellant moved for leave to obtain a psychological evaluation regarding his fitness as a parent. The motion was granted, and a dispositional hearing was scheduled for June 7, 2000.

[5]We note that the appellant was not adjudicated as an abusive or neglectful parent in the first proceeding.

The dispositional hearing was continued to July 5, 2000, because the appellant's psychological evaluation was not yet complete. In the meantime, the DHHR filed a child case plan recommending that the parental rights of both the appellant and Amanda K. be terminated. In making this recommendation, the DHHR noted the possibility that the appellant, like Amanda K., might be incarcerated as a result of the criminal charges pending against him.

During the dispositional hearing on July 5, 2000, the psychological evaluation of the appellant completed by William Fremouw, Ph.D., was presented to the court. While Dr. Fremouw reported that the appellant denied the seriousness of his situation, he stated that the appellant has "no diagnosable psychiatric condition." Dr. Fremouw further stated that, "[t]he social summary dated 5/31/00 indicated that [the appellant] underwent a drug and alcohol assessment and was randomly drug tested on several occasions in 1999. These tests were negative for drugs and the assessment did not indicate drug or alcohol problems. This information does support [the appellant's] contention that he is not a regular drug or alcohol user."

Thereafter, the circuit court terminated the appellant's parental rights. Subsequently, the appellant pled guilty to two counts of delivery of a controlled substance and was given a one-to-five-year sentence for each count. However, the appellant was granted home confinement on the first count after serving 120 days in jail to be followed by five years probation on the second count. This appeal followed.

II.

We begin our analysis of this case by setting forth our standard of review. In Syllabus Point 1 of In the Interest of: Tiffany S. Marie, 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), this Court held that:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

With this standard in mind, we now consider the parties' arguments.

The appellant contends that the circuit court erred by terminating his parental rights based solely upon the fact that he was charged with and admitted to selling marihuana from his apartment, at times, while his child was present. After carefully reviewing and examining the record in this case, we agree.

In Syllabus Point 7 of In re Emily, 208 W.Va. 325, 540 S.E.2d 542 (2000), this Court held that "'[a] natural parent of an infant child does not forfeit his or her parental right to the custody of the child merely by reason of having been convicted of one or more charges of criminal offenses.' Syllabus point 2, State ex rel. Acton v. Flowers, 154 W.Va. 209, 174 S.E.2d 742 (1970)." In other words, incarceration, per se, does not warrant the termination of an incarcerated parent's parental rights. At the same time, we have also acknowledged that an individual's incarceration may be considered along with other factors and circumstances impacting the ability of the parent to remedy the conditions of abuse and neglect. Emily, 208 W.Va. at __, 540 S.E.2d at 559.

The final order in this case, however, indicates that the appellant's parental rights were terminated because of his arrest for delivery of a controlled substance. The State did not allege that the appellant is addicted to or uses drugs, nor did the State assert that the appellant's parenting abilities were impaired by selling marihuana. In fact, during the dispositional hearing, Sarah Crum, the child protective service worker who handled this case for the DHHR, testified that the primary reason she was recommending that the appellant's parental rights be terminated was because the appellant was arrested for trafficking a controlled substance. Ms. Crum further testified that:

> I cannot think of any service that we could provide to [the appellant] that are going to correct the problem. [The appellant] has continually stated that he does not do drugs. We've had him tested for that, it came back negative. We had drug and alcohol assessment done and it came back and said that he had no problem with that. And I can think of no services that are going to correct the situation of selling drugs.

In addition, Dr. Fremouw reported that the results of random drug testing of the claimant in 1999 were negative indicating that the appellant does not have drug or alcohol problems.

This Court takes very seriously the fact that the appellant exposed his child to the substantial risks inherent in dealing drugs, and recognizes that such conduct clearly constituted abuse and neglect sufficient to trigger remedial action by the circuit court. We disagree, however, with DHHR's contention that the appellant's conduct in this case demonstrates that "there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect can be substantially corrected in the near future...," as required by W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6). While Ms. Crum testified that she did not envisage any services that could be provided to curb the appellant's drug dealing, we observe that he is now subject to a lengthy term of home confinement and probation, which presumably will provide the necessary supervision to ensure that the criminal conduct that brought rise to the present proceeding will not be repeated. Moreover, we stress that the appellant is now on notice that any repeat of such activity will likely warrant action terminating his parental rights.[6] [6]The circuit court in terminating the appellant's parental rights did so in part based upon Dr. Fremouw's observation that appellant did not expressly acknowledge that his drug dealing was a "bad decision." Our review of Dr. Fremouw's report, however, indicates that this observation was made in connection with an initial interview, and that at a subsequent interview the appellant succinctly admitted that his behavior in this regard was "stupid." Thus, so far as the circuit court's decision to terminate parental rights was predicated upon a factual finding that the appellant refused to acknowledge the irresponsible nature of his drug-dealing activity, we find it clearly erroneous. See Syllabus Point 2, in part, Walker v. West Virginia Ethics Comm'n, 201 W.Va. 108, 492 S.E.2d 167 (1997) ("we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard....").

The DHHR maintains that the circuit court did not err in terminating the appellant's parental rights not only because criminal charges were pending against him, but also because of the child's need for permanency. This Court is certainly aware of the fact that this child was placed in at least six different homes before his second birthday. However, with the exception of his current placement which resulted from this abuse and neglect proceeding, the evidence shows that these placements occurred while the child was in the custody of Amanda K. Without question, this child deserves permanency in his life. Having carefully examined the record, we conclude that this child can receive the permanency he needs in his father's custody. As discussed in detail above, the record shows that the allegations of abuse and neglect in this case stemmed solely from the appellant's arrest, and that his parental rights were terminated for that reason alone. In accordance with our case law holding that a criminal conviction per se does not warrant the termination of parental rights, we find that the circuit court erred by terminating the parental rights of the appellant to his child.

Having found that the appellant's parental rights were erroneously terminated, we remand this case to the circuit court to immediately develop and oversee a plan for reunifying the appellant with his child as promptly as practicable. According to the record in this case, Brian James D. has been in the custody of the DHHR for over a year. This Court has previously determined that in these circumstances, a gradual transition of custody is needed to give both the parent and child a sufficient adjustment period. See James M. v. Maynard, 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991); Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W.Va. 448, 388 S.E.2d 322 (1989).

Therefore, for the reasons set forth above, the final order of the circuit court of Upshur County entered on July 13, 2000, is reversed, and this case is remanded to the circuit court to immediately develop and oversee a plan to reunify James Brian D. with his father as promptly as practicable.

Reversed and Remanded.

SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS
OF WEST VIRGINIA

Maynard, Justice, dissenting:

I dissent because I do not believe that the circuit court terminated the appellant's parental rights only because he was arrested for delivery of a controlled substance. Moreover, I believe that the majority ignored the best interests of the child in this case.

The dispositional order shows that the circuit court's decision to terminate the appellant's parental rights was based on substantially more than the fact that the appellant had been arrested for delivery of a controlled substance and was facing the possibility of incarceration. It is clear that the appellant's failure to appreciate the seriousness of his felonious actions was an important factor in the circuit court's decision. During his psychological evaluation, the appellant told Dr. Fremouw that he was selling drugs to support his family, and he did not think he would get caught or that his son would be taken away. The appellant said he guessed he was "advertising to the wrong people." He repeatedly described his involvement in drugs as merely a business decision.

The appellant completed drug and alcohol assessments administered by Dr. Fremouw in an invalid manner suggesting that he was not being honest. In addition, his test scores showed a high level of resistance to treatment. It is apparent that the appellant never thought he was exposing his child to any danger and would not have ceased his illegal drug activity had he not been arrested. Unlike the majority, I do not believe that the appellant's acknowledgment of his actions as "stupid" means that he has accepted responsibility for his conduct. Instead, the appellant's attitude leads me to conclude, as I am sure the circuit court concluded, that it is very likely that the appellant will engage in drug activity in the future.

The dispositional order also indicates that the circuit court considered the child's need for permanency and concluded that it would be in the child's best interests to terminate the appellant's parental rights. The circuit court's decision in this regard is consistent with this Court's vast case law holding that the best interests of the child are paramount in abuse and neglect proceedings. See In re George Glen B. Jr., 207 W.Va. 346, 355, 532 S.E.2d 64, 73 (2000) ("[W]hen a petition alleging abuse and neglect has been filed, a circuit court has a duty to safeguard the child and provide for his or her best interests."); Syllabus Point 5, Carter v. Carter, 196 W.Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996) ("In visitation as well as custody matters, we have traditionally held paramount the best interests of the child."); Michael K.T. v. Tina L.T., 182 W.Va. 399, 405, 387 S.E.2d 866, 872 (1989) ("[T]he best interests of the child is the polar star by which decisions must be made which affect children.").

Although the majority recognized the child's need for permanency, I believe the real best interests of the child were disregarded. The record in this case shows that Brian James D. lived in six different homes, presumably with at least six different caretakers, all before his second birthday. He simply has never had any permanency in his life and as a result, is developmentally delayed. In addition, the child has exhibited symptoms of fetal alcohol syndrome.

This Court has held that "courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened. . . ." Syllabus Point 7, in part, In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991). I firmly believe that this child will be exposed to the dangers of drug trafficking again if he is returned to his father's custody, which the majority concedes will warrant yet another abuse and neglect proceeding. The evidence in the record shows that this child needs permanency in his life now. Therefore, I would affirm the final order of the circuit court terminating the appellant's parental rights.

Accordingly, for the reasons set forth above, I respectfully dissent. I am authorized to state that Justice Davis joins me in this separate opinion.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "'Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected.' Syllabus Point 2, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980)." Syl. Pt. 4, In re Jonathan P., 182 W. Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537 (1989).

2. "'W.Va.Code, 49-1-3(a) (1984), in part, defines an abused child to include one whose parent knowingly allows another person to commit the abuse. Under this standard, termination of parental rights is usually upheld only where the parent takes no action in the face of knowledge of the abuse or actually aids or protects the abusing parent.' Syl. pt. 3, In re Betty J. W., 179 W. Va. 605, 371 S.E.2d 326 (1988)." Syl. Pt. 2, In re Jeffrey R. L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993).

3. "Parental rights may be terminated where there is clear and convincing evidence that the infant child has suffered extensive physical abuse while in the custody of his or her parents, and there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified and the parents, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, have taken no action to identify the abuser." Syl. Pt. 3, In re Jeffrey R. L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993).

4. "Termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W.Va.Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such parent contends nonparticipation in the acts giving rise to the termination petition but there is clear and convincing evidence that such nonparticipating parent knowingly took no action to prevent or stop such acts to protect the child. Furthermore, termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W.Va.Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such nonparticipating parent supports the other parent's version as to how a child's injuries occurred, but there is clear and convincing evidence that such version is inconsistent with the medical evidence." Per Curiam:
This Petition on behalf of three minor children requests reversal of an August 14, 1992, order of the Circuit Court of Wood County granting Lonnie M., the father of the children (hereinafter "the father" or "Lonnie"), an improvement period. See footnote 1 The petition further requests reversal of an October 18, 1993, order awarding custody of the two surviving children to the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR") but refusing to terminate the parental rights of the father. We find that the lower court erred in failing to terminate the parental rights of the father, and we order such termination and the continued legal custody of the two surviving children in DHHR.

I.

On January 24, 1992, Connie Jones, a DHHR Protective Services worker, filed a petition in the lower court seeking an adjudication that seven-year-old Krista M., two-year-old Lonnie M., and two-month-old Brianna Elizabeth M. had been neglected and/or abused. Specifically, DHHR alleged that one or both parents, Carol and Lonnie M., had, on January 1, 1992, intentionally inflicted physical abuse or had knowingly allowed such abuse to be inflicted upon their two-month-old daughter, Brianna. DHHR further requested termination of the parental rights of both parents. See footnote 2 Brianna was taken to St. Joseph's Hospital in Parkersburg, West Virginia, in the early morning hours of January 1, 1992. She vomited repeatedly, was unresponsive, and was apparently suffering from seizures. A CAT scan revealed that the seizures resulted from hematomas located in the front and back of her brain. These injuries were described by her pediatricians as subdural effusions, including a large area of cerebral atrophy in the midbrain. By the evening of January 1, 1992, Brianna began suffering tremors of the arms and legs. On January 2, 1992, three fractures of Brianna's ribs were discovered, and child abuse was thereafter diagnosed. See footnote 3 Based upon the CAT scan, chest x-rays, and other analyses, it was determined that at least two incidents of aggravated child abuse had occurred. Brianna was transferred to the Intensive Care Unit of Children's Hospital in Columbus, Ohio, on January 2, 1992. Pediatricians treating her at that facility explored all possible causes of the head and rib injuries and also concluded that Brianna was the victim of child abuse. The pediatricians further concluded that two or more separate incidents of abuse had occurred and that Brianna had suffered permanent brain damage. See footnote 4 After reviewing the January 1992 petition, the lower court immediately removed all three children from their parents and placed them in the legal custody of DHHR, and in the physical custody of their paternal grandparents. See footnote 5 Subsequent to several adjudicatory hearings held on various dates from January through June 1992, the lower court determined that abuse upon Brianna had been committed by the mother and that both parents had committed neglect. Throughout the proceedings, the parents offered no plausible explanation for Brianna's injuries. They suggested such causes as a defective baby swing and botulism; however, no proof of any of these allegations was offered.

Lonnie consistently and repeatedly maintained that he had never seen his wife harm the children or verbally abuse them. Acquaintances of the parents, however, testified that they had witnessed Carol's physical and verbal abuse of her children. Janet Watson, a friend of the family, testified that she had witnessed an incident during which the mother "really lost it" and repeatedly struck the older daughter until Ms. Watson intervened. Ms. Watson also indicated that Carol had called Krista a "bitch" on at least one occasion. Carol had also apparently telephoned her mother when Krista was an infant to request her mother to take Krista because Lonnie had allegedly attempted to smother the child.

Linda Sandel, the counselor for the parents, testified that Carol suffered a personality disorder with passive/aggressive and paranoid tendencies. See footnote 6 Ms. Sandel also testified that Lonnie had described Carol's cycles of high energy and agitated states in which she verbally abused her husband and children. Ms. Sandel further testified that Lonnie employed repression and denial to deal with psychological conflicts and had not yet acknowledged that his wife had perpetrated the abuse.

The lower court, by order dated August 14, 1992, terminated the parental rights of the mother, from which she has not sought an appeal, but granted Lonnie a one-year improvement period based upon his alleged intention to divorce Carol. See footnote 7 Lonnie separated from his wife and resided in a camper behind his parents' home subsequent to the August 1992 order, and the children resided with Lonnie's parents. Brianna died on May 4, 1993, due to complications resulting from the original head injuries.

In August 1993, the Petitioner, by the Prosecuting Attorney of Wood County, sought to terminate the father's improvement period based upon his alleged consent to contact between the children and their mother. See footnote 8 Lonnie and Carol had still not finalized a divorce, and Carol resided in a home which had previously been the marital home within two blocks of the children's residence.

By the October 18, 1993, final dispositional hearing, Lonnie and Carol had obtained a divorce. DHHR worker Jane Dodd expressed concern at the hearing that Lonnie had not satisfied the conditions of his improvement period and explained that he had failed, in the fourteen months since his improvement period was granted, to complete "some of the crucial things that needed to be done to ensure that . . . [his] children will be safe." He had not, for instance, yet severed all ties with Carol, and he continued to permit her to remain in their marital home only a few blocks from the children. Ms. Dodd also emphasized that "most importantly, Mr. M. has not once expressed that he knows Brianna's injuries were caused by his wife. It does not appear that Mr. M. realizes the seriousness of what has occurred to his children." See footnote 9

The Petition presently before us seeks termination of Lonnie's parental rights and continued legal custody in the DHHR. DHHR joins in this appeal and also seeks termination of the parental rights of the father.

II.

In syllabus point 4 of In re Jonathan P., 182 W. Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537 (1989), we explained the following:

> 'Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected.' Syllabus Point 2, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

Syllabus point 2 of In re Jeffrey R. L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993) further elaborates on that issue, as follows:

> 'W.Va.Code, 49-1-3(a) (1984), in part, defines an abused child to include one whose parent knowingly allows another person to commit the abuse. Under this standard, termination of parental rights is usually upheld only where the parent takes no action in the face of knowledge of the abuse or actually aids or protects the abusing parent.' Syl. pt. 3, In re Betty J. W., 179 W. Va. 605, 371 S.E.2d 326 (1988).

This Court also explained in syllabus point 3 of Jeffrey R. L. that when the perpetrator of child abuse has not been absolutely identified and when the caretaker offers no explanation, those factors alone may justify termination of parental rights. Syllabus point 3 states:

> Parental rights may be terminated where there is clear and convincing evidence that the infant child has suffered extensive physical abuse while in the custody of his or her parents, and there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified and the parents, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, have taken no action to identify the abuser.

In syllabus point 2 of In re Scottie D., we developed our rationale for termination of parental rights of a parent who did not actually participate in the abuse, as follows:

> Termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W.Va. Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such parent contends nonparticipation in the acts giving rise to the termination petition but there is clear and convincing evidence that such nonparticipating parent knowingly took no action to prevent or stop such acts to protect the child. Furthermore, termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W.Va. Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such nonparticipating parent supports the other parent's version as to how a child's injuries occurred, but there is clear and convincing evidence that such version is inconsistent with the medical evidence.

As we noted in In re Darla B., 175 W. Va. 137, 331 S.E.2d 868 (1985), "it is ludicrous for [the nonparticipating father] to assert that he should be held blameless for his nonaction in protecting his child." Id. at 141, 331 S.E.2d at 873.

In the present case, the lower court granted the father an improvement period despite the absence of any acknowledgment of the abuse. The father insisted that he did not know how such horrendous injuries had been inflicted, and he repeatedly refused to acknowledge that his wife could be the abuser even in the fact of overwhelming medical evidence of extreme child abuse. As in the present case, the father in In re Scottie D. did not directly participate in the abuse. Yet we noted in that case that "[a]lthough the appellee's version does not expressly support his wife's account, it is nonetheless supportive, and, importantly, inconsistent with the medical evidence presented." 185 W. Va. at 196, 406 S.E.2d at 219 (emphasis in original).

Further, in the present case, Lonnie permitted the children's mother to maintain unsupervised contact with them subsequent to the termination of her parental rights. This inability or unwillingness to prevent his former wife from having contact with the children evidences a disregard for the orders of the lower court and for the safety of his two surviving children.

Lonnie could conceivably have been unaware of the extent of his wife's abusive behavior prior to Brianna's injuries. The lower court conveyed the benefit of any doubt in that regard upon Lonnie when it granted him an improvement period rather than simply terminating his parental rights when Carol's rights were terminated. Yet Lonnie still maintained contact with his wife, permitted her to have contact with the children, and failed to acknowledge that his wife had inflicted serious injuries upon his daughter which ultimately caused Brianna's death.

Although sound public policy and the whole tenor of law seek generally to perpetuate the marital bond, the rights of children to be free from abuse require that a parent's first loyalty be to the protection of his or her children.

Upon thorough evaluation of this case, we reverse the decision of the lower court and remand this matter for an order terminating the parental rights of Lonnie M. to his surviving children. Pursuant to the recommendations of DHHR, however, it appears that supervised visitation See footnote 10 between Lonnie M. and his children may be in their best interest at this time. The children should remain in the legal custody of DHHR and in the physical custody of their paternal grandparents, with whom the evidence shows they have an emotional bond, as long as such custody arrangements prove beneficial to the best interests of the children. There remains some concern whether the paternal grandparents will be able to offer these children the protection and security they have not had from either parent. Thus, these children should be monitored closely by the DHHR over the ensuing months, and the circuit court should hold frequent reviews to determine whether such protection is being accorded and whether this placement is in the children's best interest. As part of these reviews, the court should also examine whether any additional services to the children or the grandparents are needed to facilitate their success. If the paternal grandparents become unwilling or unable to care for the children or to protect their interests, the DHHR should return to court to seek alternative permanent placement.

All children deserve the resolution in their lives of a permanent placement. Consequently, the court should hold a plenary review of this case in one year, and should determine at that time whether the grandparents have acted in such a manner that would justify placing the children in their permanent custody; and if they have done so, the court should make such permanent placement. See footnote 11 If the paternal grandparents become unwilling or unable to care for the children or to protect their interests, the DHHR should return to court to seek alternative permanent placement.

Reversed and remanded.

Footnote: 1 We continue our longstanding tradition of referencing the parties only by their first names to protect the anonymity of the children. See In re Scottie D., 185 W. Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214 (1991).

Footnote: 2 The other two children, Krista and Lonnie, were alleged to have been abused and neglected by virtue of residing in the home where such abuse of Brianna had occurred.

Footnote: 3 Pediatricians treating Brianna testified that rib fractures in a six-week-old infant were extraordinary, since the flexibility of a newborn's bones make the bones very difficult to fracture.

Footnote: 4 The pediatricians explored such possible causes of Brianna's injuries as a serious automobile accident, serious fall, or intentional abuse. They determined that the rib fractures were of recent origin, within five days prior to the examination. They also estimated that the head injuries had occurred on two separate occasions, based upon bleeding which appeared to have originated within 72 hours of the CAT scan and older bleeding which originated two to six weeks prior to the CAT scan.

Footnote: 5 Krista and Lonnie continue to reside with their paternal grandparents.

Footnote: 7 During this August 14, 1992, dispositional hearing, DHHS requested termination of the mother's parental rights, but asked that the father be granted a one-year improvement period. The lower court noted that the father supported and colluded with the mother in defending both of them against charges of abuse. The court also recognized that the father had not yet admitted that the mother had perpetrated the abuse. Moreover, the attorney for the children requested immediate and permanent termination of parental rights of both parents. The lower court followed the recommendations of the DHHS, however, terminating the parental rights of the mother and granting the father a one-year improvement period.

Footnote: 8 Carol was not permitted to see the children after the termination of her parental rights, and Lonnie was required, as part of his improvement period, to prevent the children from having contact with their mother. The Motion to Revoke Improvement Period filed with the lower court alleges that the "respondent-father has allowed Carol [M.] to have contact with Lonnie and Krista [M.]." The petition also alleges that the parents "spend a great deal of time together" indicating the father's "refusal to comply with the spirit of the Court's Order." Testimony was elicited at an August 1993 hearing from a neighbor who had witnessed Carol returning Lonnie and Krista home to their grandparents' home from an outing. Another witness testified that he played in a band with Lonnie and had seen thechildren with their mother.

Footnote: 9 The requirements of Lonnie's improvement period included attendance at all sessions of one series of parenting classes, initiation of individual therapy, and preparation of a written report describing what, in hindsight, he could have done to prevent the removal of his children from him and his wife. He discontinued therapy shortly after it was initiated and failed to acknowledge that his children were removed because of the serious injuries inflicted upon Brianna. Lonnie was also required to take Krista for individual therapy and to engage the children in family therapy. He discontinued Krista's therapy and failed to attend family therapy.

Footnote: 10 On remand, the circuit court should consider the nature of the supervision, and determine whether the grandparents will be able to offer the necessary supervision and protection.

Footnote: 11 The court may include within such final order the right of permanent visitation in the father if he has acted in such a manner as to justify it.

CHIEF JUSTICE BENJAMIN, deeming himself disqualified, did not participate.

JUDGE J. D. BEANE, sitting by temporary assignment.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "The standard of appellate review of a circuit court's order granting relief through the extraordinary writ of prohibition is de novo." Syllabus Point 1, Martin v. West Virginia Div. of Labor Contractor Licensing Bd., 199 W.Va. 613, 486 S.E.2d 782 (1997).

2. "Prohibition lies only to restrain inferior courts from proceeding in causes over which they have no jurisdiction, or, in which, having jurisdiction, they are exceeding their legitimate powers and may not be used as a substitute for writ of error, appeal or certiorari." Syllabus Point 1, Crawford v. Taylor, 138 W.Va. 207, 75 S.E.2d 370 (1953).

3. "Cases involving children must be decided not just in the context of competing sets of adults' rights, but also with a regard for the rights of the child(ren)." Syllabus Point 7, In re Brian D., 194 W.Va. 623, 461 S.E.2d 129 (1995).

4. "Pursuant to the plain language of W.Va. Code § 44–10–3(a) (2006) (Supp.2007), the circuit court or family court of the county in which a minor resides may appoint a suitable person to serve as the minor's guardian. In appointing a guardian, the court shall give priority to the minor's mother or father. 'However, in every case, the competency and fitness of the proposed guardian and the welfare and best interests of the minor shall be given precedence by the court when appointing the guardian.' W.Va. Code § 44–10–3(a)." Syllabus Point 6, In re Abbigail Faye B., 222 W.Va. 466, 665 S.E.2d 300 (2008).

5. "In exceptional cases and subject to the court's discretion, a psychological parent may intervene in a custody proceeding brought pursuant to W.Va. Code § 48-9-103 (2001) (Repl.Vol. 2004) when such intervention is likely to serve the best interests of the child(ren) whose custody is under adjudication." Syllabus Point 4, In re Clifford K., 217 W.Va. 625, 619 S.E.2d 138 (2005).

6. W.Va. Code §§ 51-2A-2(a)(17) [2012] and 44-10-3(a) [2006] clearly and unambiguously grant a family court the subject matter jurisdiction to hear questions concerning guardianship of a child.

7. W.Va. Code §§ 51-2A-2(a)(6) [2012] and 48-9-103 [2001] clearly and unambiguously grant a family court the subject matter jurisdiction to consider establishing a parenting plan, or to otherwise allocate custodial responsibility or decision-making responsibility, to someone who intervenes in an action alleging they are a psychological parent.

8. Jurisdiction is a court's inherent power to decide a case; venue, however, designates the particular county in which a court having jurisdiction may properly hear and determine the case.

9. "A man may live in several different places but he can have only one domicile. Domicile is a place a person intends to retain as a permanent residence and go back to ultimately after moving away." Syllabus Point 2, Shaw v. Shaw, 155 W.Va. 712, 187 S.E.2d 124 (1972).

10. "Because a determination of residency depends on the intent of the parties, it is typically a question of fact[.]" Syllabus Point 5, in part, Farmers Mut. Ins. Co. v. Tucker, 213 W.Va. 16, 576 S.E.2d 261 (2002).

11. It is not for this Court arbitrarily to read into a statute that which it does not say. Just as courts are not to eliminate through judicial interpretation words that were purposely included, we are obliged not to add to statutes something the Legislature purposely omitted.

12. W.Va. Code § 44-10-3(a) [2006] places jurisdiction and venue of an infant guardianship action in the West Virginia county in which a minor resides. It is the minor's residency alone that controls, and not the residency of any other person such as a parent, guardian, or other person with custody or control of the minor. A determination of the minor's residency is typically a question of fact.

Ketchum, Justice:

Since the founding of our State, this Court has abided by the principle that issues of child custody are to revolve around the best interests of the child. This appeal demonstrates what happens when sight is lost of that polar star principle.

The petitioner in this appeal contends that she is the psychological parent of a child. The child's biological mother has virtually no contact with the child. After the child's biological, custodial father (the respondent) pleaded guilty to several crimes and anticipated being incarcerated, the petitioner filed a motion to intervene in an existing family court action and sought either shared parenting with the father, or guardianship of the child if the father was sentenced to prison.

Instead of responding to the petitioner's factual contentions, the biological father petitioned the circuit court for a writ of prohibition. The father's current counsel claimed that the family court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to consider a motion for either shared parenting or guardianship. The circuit court granted the writ of prohibition and halted the family court's consideration of the petitioner's motion.

We reverse the circuit court's order granting the writ of prohibition, and find that the family court plainly had subject matter jurisdiction to consider the petitioner's motion.

I.
FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

On February 1, 2003, the child at the center of this case – who we refer to as "A.C." – was born. Her biological parents are Leslie F. and the respondent, Donald C. In a paternity action filed in the Family Court of Cabell County in 2004, Donald was adjudicated as the biological father, and was granted primary physical and legal custody of A.C. Although Leslie was afforded visitation rights, she has had no meaningful relationship with the child and rarely sees her. One party asserts the biological mother last visited the child in 2007.[1]

Donald had discovered that he was A.C.'s father when she was 20 months old. At the time, he was dating and living with the petitioner, Brooke B. Brooke asserts that after Donald took custody of A.C., and with the assent and encouragement of Donald, she began performing more than half of the parenting tasks for A.C. including financially supporting, housing, feeding, clothing, bathing, dressing and teaching A.C. For the next seven years, Brooke had a continuous and uninterrupted relationship with the child. She took the child to school, to doctor's appointments, to haircuts, and to school and extracurricular activities. The child's guardian ad litem states that A.C. "perceives

Brooke . . . as her mother," and a psychologist reported that Brooke "fulfills the accepted description of a psychological parent."[2]

In 2009, Donald and Brooke ended their relationship. Brooke moved out of his house and into her own home in Kanawha County. However, through 2009 and 2010, A.C. allegedly spent the majority of her time living in Brooke's home, and Brooke continued to perform those parenting duties she had been performing throughout A.C.'s life. A.C. was enrolled in a private school in Kanawha County, had numerous friends in Kanawha County, and participated in extracurricular activities like plays and Girl Scouts in Kanawha County.

On January 6, 2011, Donald pleaded guilty to tax evasion and bank fraud in the United States District Court for the Southern District of West Virginia. His sentencing was scheduled for a later date, but he faced up to 35 years in prison. At approximately the same time, Donald refused to let A.C. stay at Brooke's house. Brooke

[2] We adopted the following definition of a "psychological parent" in Syllabus Point 3 of In re Clifford K., 217 W.Va. 625, 619 S.E.2d 138 (2005):

> A psychological parent is a person who, on a continuing day-to-day basis, through interaction, companionship, interplay, and mutuality, fulfills a child's psychological and physical needs for a parent and provides for the child's emotional and financial support. The psychological parent may be a biological, adoptive, or foster parent, or any other person. The resulting relationship between the psychological parent and the child must be of substantial, not temporary, duration and must have begun with the consent and encouragement of the child's legal parent or guardian. . . .

alleges that Donald acted "to establish himself as a single parent performing the majority of parenting duties . . . to impress the federal court and decrease his sentencing."

Less than two weeks later, on January 18, 2011, Brooke filed a motion to intervene in Donald's paternity case in the Family Court of Cabell County. Brooke's motion asserted that she has been A.C.'s psychological mother since the child was 20 months old, and that the child lived with her in Kanawha County. Brooke asked the family court for a share of parenting duties, and for an order appointing Brooke as A.C.'s legal guardian while Donald was incarcerated. Copies of the motion were served on Donald and on the biological mother, Leslie F.

The Family Court of Cabell County, however, did not rule on Brooke's motion. Instead, the family court entered an order transferring the case to Kanawha County "because the Petitioner [Brooke] resides in Kanawha County and the minor child resided with the Petitioner in Kanawha County at the time of the filing of the petition."[3]

Shortly thereafter, Donald's attorney filed a motion to dismiss with the Family Court of Kanawha County. The motion did not challenge venue in Kanawha County. Donald's motion only asserted, as a matter of fact, that Donald was the primary caretaker of A.C. and that Brooke was not a psychological parent.

[3] The Family Court of Cabell County appears to have transferred the case pursuant to W.Va. Code § 48-24-101(a) [2002], which permits transfers of venue in paternity actions to a county where a party resides "if judicial economy requires."

At a hearing on February 11, 2011, the family court declined to grant Donald's motion to dismiss[4] because resolution of the fact-based motion would require the taking of evidence and testimony. A hearing to take testimony was scheduled for March 17th. In the meantime, the family court, "based upon an agreement of the parties," ordered Brooke and Donald to divide their custodial time with the child equally. The family court also ordered that A.C. not be removed from her private school in Kanawha County.

Shortly thereafter, Donald hired a new lawyer. The new lawyer filed a motion to continue the March 17th hearing, ostensibly because he would not have enough time to gather evidence and prepare for the hearing. The family court had a teleconference on the motion to continue on March 16th. Counsel for Brooke objected because two physicians had cleared their schedules to appear at the hearing. As a compromise, the family court ruled that the March 17th hearing would be continued except for the taking of testimony from the two physicians.

It is at this point that counsel for Donald initiated a detour away from consideration of the best interests of the child. On March 16, 2011, at 9:11 p.m., counsel for Donald faxed a new 45-page motion to dismiss to the family court judge. Counsel's new motion asserted that Brooke had never filed or served any formal petition, complaint, or summons on Donald, and therefore "[w]hatever fugitive papers have collected to create this misbegotten process must be stricken from the docket as of no jurisdictional consequence." Donald's motion further asserted that he had "primary physical and legal custody" of A.C., and that Donald and A.C. "reside in Putnam County, West Virginia and have lived there for many years." On these grounds, counsel for Donald claimed that the Family Court of Kanawha County did not have subject matter jurisdiction to hear Brooke's case.

On the morning of March 17th, the family court convened the hearing to do nothing more than take the testimony of the two physicians. A.C.'s biological mother, Leslie, appeared at the hearing (but reiterated she was not asking for custody of A.C.). At the outset, counsel for Donald orally asserted that the family court didn't have subject matter jurisdiction to do anything. Counsel for Brooke contended that Donald's lawyer was not truly making a jurisdiction argument but rather a venue argument. However, Brooke's counsel asserted that Donald's prior lawyer had orally but explicitly chosen Kanawha County as the better venue over Putnam County, and had waived any venue objections. The family court declined to rule on Donald's new motion to dismiss because the court had not had time to review the motion, and allowed the lawyers to examine and cross-examine the two physicians.

At the conclusion of the March 17th hearing, the family court set a hearing for May 9th to consider Donald's new motion to dismiss. Nonetheless, minutes after the conclusion of the family court hearing, at 11:26 a.m., counsel for Donald filed a petition seeking a writ of prohibition from the Circuit Court of Kanawha County. Donald's lawyer repeated his claims that the Family Court of Kanawha County lacked subject matter jurisdiction because A.C. "lived" and "resided" with her father in Putnam County, and that Brooke had never filed a formal petition or complaint in Kanawha County sufficient to invoke the family court's jurisdiction. Donald also argued that the family court was not giving Donald's counsel adequate time to prepare for hearings. Donald therefore asked that the circuit court prohibit the family court from proceeding any further on Brooke's motion for relief.

In an order dated June 29, 2011, the circuit court granted Donald a writ of prohibition. The circuit court prohibited the family court from taking any further action on Brooke's motion. The circuit court determined that, as a matter of law, A.C.'s residence was identical to that of her father's in Putnam County. As such, the circuit court concluded that "the family and circuit courts of Putnam County have subject matter jurisdiction to entertain a petition for appointment of a guardian . . ; the Kanawha County Family Court does not."

Shortly thereafter, Donald – who by now was a resident of Boone County – appears to have filed a guardianship proceeding in the Family Court of Boone County. In that proceeding, on July 18, 2011, Donald had his mother (that is, A.C.'s paternal grandmother) appointed as guardian of the child.[5] According to the parties, A.C. now resides with her grandparents in Logan County.

[5] Brooke asserts that Donald's lawyer violated the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Minor Guardianship Proceedings [2009] in the Boone County action by omitting any mention of A.C.'s relationship with Brooke. Rule 3(a)(7) requires that a petition for the appointment of a guardian for a minor must contain a list of the "places where the minor has lived during the last five years . . . and present addresses of the persons with whom the minor lived during that period[.]" Rule 3(a)(8) requires the petitioner to describe "any past or current proceeding involving the minor's custody[.]"

Continued . . .

On September 21, 2011, Donald was sentenced to 51 months in prison by the federal district court.

Brooke now appeals the Circuit Court of Kanawha County's June 29, 2011, order granting a writ of prohibition.

II.
STANDARD OF REVIEW

"The standard of appellate review of a circuit court's order granting relief through the extraordinary writ of prohibition is de novo." Syllabus Point 1, Martin v. West Virginia Div. of Labor Contractor Licensing Bd., 199 W.Va. 613, 486 S.E.2d 782 (1997). We therefore apply the same guidelines as the circuit court relied upon in considering whether to the issue a writ of prohibition.

W.Va. Code § 53-1-1 [1923] provides as follows:

> The writ of prohibition shall lie as a matter of right in all cases of usurpation and abuse of power, when the inferior court has not jurisdiction of the subject matter in controversy, or, having such jurisdiction, exceeds its legitimate powers.

Brooke asserts that Donald's lawyer failed to advise the family court of the Kanawha County proceedings, or that A.C. lived in Brooke's house in Kanawha County for the two years preceding the Boone County action.

On February 14, 2012, the Family Court of Boone County granted Brooke's motion to intervene in the guardianship action. The family court ordered that Brooke be permitted "visitation" with A.C., and during summer vacation 2012, ordered that Brooke receive 50/50, week on/week off, shared parenting. The family court also ordered alternating weekend shared parenting after A.C. returned to school in the fall of 2012.

On July 17, 2012, counsel for Donald filed a petition for a writ of prohibition with the Circuit Court of Boone County in an attempt to halt or to circumvent the family court's orders. The circuit court has not yet ruled on the petition.

Similarly, we have oft stated that a writ of "[p]rohibition lies only to restrain inferior courts from proceeding in causes over which they have no jurisdiction, or, in which, having jurisdiction, they are exceeding their legitimate powers and may not be used as a substitute for writ of error, appeal or certiorari." Syllabus Point 1, Crawford v. Taylor, 138 W.Va. 207, 75 S.E.2d 370 (1953).

Utilizing those standards of review, we examine the circuit court's order determining that the Family Court of Kanawha County had no subject matter jurisdiction to consider Brooke's motion seeking guardianship or shared parenting of A.C.

III.
ANALYSIS

For a century-and-a-half, the courts of this State have been guided by the fundamental rule that, when addressing custody issues involving children, the best interests of the child trump all other considerations. It is the polar star that steers all discretion.[6] As we said in 1925, "we must not lose sight of the rule that obtains in most jurisdictions at the present day, that the welfare of the child is to be regarded more than the technical legal rights of the parent." Connor v. Harris, 100 W.Va. 313, 317, 130 S.E. 281, 283 (1925).

In the instant case, the best interests of the child appear to have been wholly disregarded. Brooke's initial motion (for guardianship or an allocation of custodial responsibility) facially sought what was best for A.C., and raised questions of fact that necessitated the taking of evidence. However, Donald's petition for a writ of prohibition sought to circumvent those questions of fact, and – as the family court noted – "seems to . . . throw everything against the wall and pray that something sticks." Nowhere in Donald's filings do we perceive any consideration of what is best for A.C.

The circuit court – at the urging of Donald's counsel – granted a writ of prohibition after concluding that the family court had no subject matter jurisdiction. On appeal, Brooke asserts that the circuit court's decision was wrong. After consideration of the statutes creating the family court's authority, we agree with Brooke that it is clear that Vanvacter*, 9 W.Va. 600, 612-13 (1866) ("the court will exercise its discretion according to the facts, consulting the wishes of the minor, if of years of discretion; if not, exercising its own judgment as to what will be best calculated to promote the interests of the child."), *citing Armstrong v. the circuit court erred. Unquestionably, the Family Court of Kanawha County had jurisdiction to hear Brooke's motion for guardianship or shared parenting responsibility.

The subject matter jurisdiction of the family courts over guardianship proceedings and proceedings allocating custodial responsibility derives from various statutes.

As to guardianship proceedings, W.Va. Code § 51-2A-2(a)(17) [2012] gives a family court "jurisdiction over the following matters: . . . All proceedings relating to the appointment of guardians or curators of minor children[.]" Similarly, W.Va. Code § 44-10-3(a) [2006] states that a "family court of the county in which the minor resides . . . may appoint as the minor's guardian a suitable person."[7] See also, Syllabus Point 6, in part, In re Abbigail Faye B., 222 W.Va. 466, 665 S.E.2d 300 (2008) ("Pursuant to the plain language of W.Va. Code § 44–10–3(a) (2006) (Supp.2007), the circuit court or family court of the county in which a minor resides may appoint a suitable person to serve as the minor's guardian.").

As to shared parenting and "custody," W.Va. Code § 51-2A-2(a)(6) [2012] gives a family court "jurisdiction over the following matters: . . . All actions for the establishment of a parenting plan or other allocation of custodial responsibility or

[7] The statute also confers concurrent jurisdiction over infant guardianship proceedings to circuit courts. Rule 2(a) of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Minor Guardianship Proceedings [2009] clarifies the statute and states, in part:

> (a) Jurisdiction. 1) Circuit courts and family courts have concurrent subject matter jurisdiction over minor guardianship proceedings, whether involving guardianship of the person or estate of a minor, or both[.]

decision-making responsibility for a child[.]" Non-parents, such as petitioner Brooke, are specifically allowed to seek an allocation of custodial responsibility under W.Va. Code § 48-9-103(b) [2001], which provides in part that:

> In exceptional cases the court may, in its discretion, grant permission to intervene to other persons . . . whose participation in the proceedings under this article it determines is likely to serve the child's best interests. The court may place limitations on participation by the intervening party as the court determines to be appropriate.

We specifically found, in Syllabus Point 4 of In re Clifford K., 217 W.Va. 625, 619 S.E.2d 138 (2005), that the statute authorizes a psychological parent to intervene in a custody proceeding:

> In exceptional cases and subject to the court's discretion, a psychological parent may intervene in a custody proceeding brought pursuant to W.Va. Code § 48-9-103 (2001) (Repl.Vol.2004) when such intervention is likely to serve the best interests of the child(ren) whose custody is under adjudication.

"Where the language of a statute is free from ambiguity, its plain meaning is to be accepted and applied without resort to interpretation." Syllabus Point 2, Crockett v. Andrews, 153 W.Va. 714, 172 S.E.2d 384 (1970). "A statutory provision which is clear and unambiguous and plainly expresses the legislative intent will not be interpreted by the courts but will be given full force and effect." Syllabus Point 2, State v. Epperly, 135 W.Va. 877, 65 S.E.2d 488 (1951).

These statutes plainly express a legislative intent to vest subject matter jurisdiction in the family courts to consider any action that concerns the custody and guardianship of a child. W.Va. Code §§ 51-2A-2(a)(17) and 44-10-3(a) clearly and unambiguously grant a family court the subject matter jurisdiction to hear questions concerning guardianship of a child. W.Va. Code §§ 51-2A-2(a)(6) and 48-9-103 clearly and unambiguously grant a family court the subject matter jurisdiction to consider establishing a parenting plan, or to otherwise allocate custodial responsibility or decision-making responsibility, to someone who intervenes in an action alleging they are a psychological parent. The circuit court's order finding the family court was without subject matter jurisdiction was, therefore, plainly in error.

The arguments by Donald's counsel confuse jurisdiction with venue. Jurisdiction is a court's inherent power to decide a case; venue, however, designates the particular county in which a court having jurisdiction may properly hear and determine the case. Syllabus Point 9, Hinerman v. Daily Gazette Co., Inc., 188 W.Va. 157, 423 S.E.2d 560 (1992) ("Jurisdiction implies or imports the power of the Court, venue the place of the action."); Sidney C. Smith Corp. v. Dailey, 136 W.Va. 380, 388, 67 S.E.2d 523, 527 (1951). Donald essentially argues that venue did not lie in Kanawha County, but rather was vested in Putnam County where he then resided.

Donald's venue argument ignores Brooke's request for a parenting plan and a share of custodial and decision-making responsibility. Instead, it focuses solely on her request for guardianship. Donald's argument starts with a novel interpretation of the guardianship statute, W.Va. Code § 44-10-3(a), which creates jurisdiction in the "family court of the county in which the minor resides[.]" Donald argues that, as a matter of law, "the county in which the minor resides" is identical to that of a custodial parent. The basis for his position is W.Va. Code § 48-9-602 [2001], which states, in part:

> Solely for the purposes of all other state and federal statutes which require a designation or determination of custody, a parenting plan shall designate the parent with whom the child is scheduled to reside the majority of the time as the custodian of the child. However, this designation shall not affect either parent's rights and responsibilities under a parenting plan.

In 2006, the Family Court of Cabell County designated Donald as the custodian of A.C. He argues, therefore, that the child, as a matter of law, resided with him wherever he might live.

We reject Donald's suggested interpretation of our laws.

First, W.Va. Code § 48-9-602 applies only to "statutes which require a designation or determination of custody[.]" There is nothing in the guardianship statute that requires a court to first designate or determine the custody of a child before then determining who may be guardian of the child.[8] Accordingly, W.Va. Code § 44-10-3(a) is not one of the statutes envisaged by the Legislature when it crafted W.Va. Code § 48-9-602.

Second, the Legislature's choice of words in W.Va. Code § 44-10-3(a) and W.Va. Code § 48-9-602 indicates that the Legislature was aware circumstances could arise where a minor had more than one residence. In W.Va. Code § 44-10-3(a), the Legislature based a court's jurisdiction and venue in any county in which a minor has a residence, or "resides." The verb "'[t]o reside' and its corresponding noun residence are chameleon-like expressions, which take their color of meaning from the context in which they are found. The word 'residence' has been described as being 'like a slippery eel, and the definition which fits one situation will wriggle out of our hands when used in another context or in a different sense.'" Farmers Mut. Ins. Co. v. Tucker, 213 W.Va. 16, 21, 576 S.E.2d 261, 266 (2002) (citation omitted). And in W.Va. Code § 48-9-602, the Legislature required any parenting plan to specify where "the child is scheduled to reside the majority of the time;" the statute does not resolve whether the child resides in other places, but rather implies that a child can reside in multiple places.[9] [9] In the context of insurance, there is a bounty of case law discussing the numerous "residences" of a child of divorced or separated parents, or children who have temporarily left their parents' home to pursue an education, job, medical treatment, or the armed forces:

[8] The "state and federal statutes" likely referred to in W.Va. Code § 48-9-602 include the Internal Revenue Code, 26 U.S.C. § 152 [2008] (which allows a custodial parent to claim a dependent deduction); the Food Stamp Program, 7 U.S.C. § 2015 [2008] (which requires a custodial parent to cooperate with state child support agencies); federal criminal statutes relating to parental kidnapping, 18 U.S.C. § 1204 [2003]; federal regulations issued on Veterans' Benefits, 38 CFR 3.24, 3.57, and 3.850, and Social Security, 42 U.S.C. § 1396r-1a [2000]; and statutes regarding finding a missing child and reuniting the child with their legal custodian, 42 USC § 5773 [2008] and § 5775 [1999]. See Kimpel v. Kimpel, 122 Wash.App. 729, 734 n.1, 94 P.3d 1022, 1024 n.1 (2004).

> Numerous other cases have found a child of divorced or separated parents -- even though living primarily under the roof of only one parent -- was a "resident" of both parents' "households" for purposes of insurance coverage. Courts note that children often leave belongings at both homes, have a room or area of their "own" in each home, and until the child expresses another intent, generally hold that the child is a resident of both homes. . . .
> Another common class of cases where courts usually find coverage involves children who have temporarily left their parents' insured house to pursue an education, a job, extensive medical treatment, or to join the armed forces. These individuals often establish a residence a substantial distance from the insured house, and maintain that residence for an extended period. When the facts establish that the

It is an axiom in the law that residence and domicile are not synonymous, and that a person "may have several residences, but only one domicile." Lotz v. Atamaniuk, 172 W.Va. 116, 118, 304 S.E.2d 20, 23 (1983). This Court said in Syllabus Point 2 of Shaw v. Shaw, 155 W.Va. 712, 187 S.E.2d 124 (1972) that a person "may live in several different places but [she] can have only one domicile. Domicile is a place a person intends to retain as a permanent residence and go back to ultimately after moving away." Black's Law Dictionary says that residence must be distinguished from domicile:

> As "domicile" and "residence" are usually in the same place, they are frequently used as if they had the same meaning, but they are not identical terms, for a person may have two places of residence, as in the city and country, but only one domicile. Residence means living in a particular locality, but domicile means living in that locality with intent to make it a fixed and permanent home.

We noted in Syllabus Point 5 of Farmers Mut. Ins. Co., supra, that "[b]ecause a determination of residency depends on the intent of the parties, it is typically a question of fact[.]" Accordingly, since W.Va. Code § 44-10-3(a) places jurisdiction and venue of an infant guardianship action in any West Virginia county in which a minor resides, where the minor resides is generally a question of fact.

> child continues to call and treat their parents' house as "home," leaving their belongings there and returning when possible, courts usually find that the child is an insured "resident" of their parents' "household." . . .

Farmers Mut. Ins. Co. v. Tucker, 213 W.Va. at 22-23, 576 S.E.2d at 267-68 (citations and footnotes omitted).

Third, W.Va. Code § 44-10-3(a) vests jurisdiction in the county "in which the minor resides;" it does not mention anything about where the custodial parent of the minor might reside. We reject the respondent's invitation that we add jurisdictional limitations to W.Va. Code § 44-10-3(a) that the Legislature intentionally omitted.

> It is not for this Court arbitrarily to read into [a statute] that which it does not say. Just as courts are not to eliminate through judicial interpretation words that were purposely included, we are obliged not to add to statutes something the Legislature purposely omitted.

Banker v. Banker, 196 W.Va. 535, 546-47, 474 S.E.2d 465, 476-77 (1996). The Legislature purposely created jurisdiction in courts where the minor resides. Our Rules of Practice and Procedure for Minor Guardianship Proceedings similarly specify that venue over a child's guardianship proceeding is determined solely with reference to the child and no one else. Rule 2(b) states:

> (b) Venue. A petition for appointment of a minor guardian shall be filed and heard in the county where the minor resides; or if the minor is a nonresident of the state, a county in which the minor has an estate. Any subsequent proceedings shall be heard in the county in which the guardian was appointed.

In summary, we believe that our infant guardianship statute is clear: W.Va. Code § 44-10-3(a) places jurisdiction and venue of an infant guardianship action in the West Virginia county in which a minor resides. It is the minor's residency alone that controls, and not the residency of any other person such as a parent, guardian, or other person with custody or control of the minor. A determination of the minor's residency is typically a question of fact.

The record shows that Brooke alleged that the child, A.C., resided with her at her home in Kanawha County. If this is true, then under W.Va. Code § 44-10-3(a) venue lies with the Family Court of Kanawha County to ascertain whether Brooke is competent and fit to be the minor's guardian, and whether it is in the minor's welfare and best interests.

IV.
CONCLUSION

As set forth above, the Family Court of Kanawha County plainly had subject matter jurisdiction to consider the petitioner's arguments. The Circuit Court of Kanawha County erred in issuing its June 29, 2011, order granting a writ of prohibition. The order is therefore reversed.

With the dissolution of the circuit court's prohibition order, the Family Court of Kanawha County should expeditiously proceed to resolve the parties' motions. We understand from the parties that a competing action involving the custody, parenting responsibilities, and/or guardianship of A.C. is pending in the Family Court of Boone County. This competing action was filed after petitioner Brooke filed her motion to intervene (requesting shared parenting or guardianship) that was transferred to the Family Court of Kanawha County. Pursuant to Rule 19(f) of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court [2007],[10] the Family Court of Kanawha County should promptly order the Boone County action (and any other subsequently filed actions) transferred to Kanawha County.

The family court should then quickly resolve the questions raised by the parties' motions, including determining A.C.'s residency at the time Brooke's motion was filed and thereby whether venue is proper in Kanawha County. If so, the family court should then expeditiously resolve the shared parenting and guardianship issues raised by Brooke's motion.

Finally, the Clerk of the Court is directed to issue the mandate forthwith.

Reversed.

> (f) Consolidation of simultaneous proceedings. When two or more family court actions between the same two parties are pending before different family court judges, the court in which the first action was commenced shall order all of the actions transferred to it or any other family court in which such action is pending. The court to which the actions are transferred may order a joint hearing or trial of any or all of the matters in issue in any of the actions; it may order all of the actions consolidated; and it may make such other orders concerning proceedings as may tend to avoid unnecessary costs or delay.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." 2. "W. Va.Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], requires the State Department of Welfare [now the Department of Health and Human Resources], in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove 'conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition ... by clear and convincing proof.' The statute, however, does not specify any particular manner or mode of testimony or evidence by which the [Department of Health and Human Resources] is obligated to meet this burden." 6. "At the conclusion of the improvement period, the court shall review the performance of the parents in attempting to attain the goals of the improvement period and shall, in the court's discretion, determine whether the conditions of the improvement period have been satisfied and whether sufficient improvement has been made in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child." Per curiam:

This appeal arises from the May 1, 2009, final dispositional order entered by the Circuit Court of Wood County in an abuse and neglect proceeding that resulted in the placement of the minor children in the home of their mother, Robin M., and her husband, Anthony M. In this appeal, Brian H., the appellant and respondent-father below, contends that the circuit court erred in granting the children's stepfather an improvement period, by adjudicating the children abused and/or neglected because of his own conduct, and by placing the children in the home of their mother and stepfather.[1] The mother, Robin M., and her husband, Anthony M., did not appeal any part of the order but did participate in this appeal.

The Court has before it the petition for appeal and the entire record in this matter. Based upon the briefs and arguments of the parties, and for the reasons set forth below, the order of the circuit court is reversed, and this case is remanded to the circuit court with directions to hold an immediate dispositional hearing that adequately contemplates the placement of the children in the home of Brian H., as a non-abusing parent.

[1] It was revealed at the oral argument of this case that one of the children who had been returned to Robin M.'s custody was in fact residing elsewhere. This fact did not appear to have been known by the Department, who had ceased monitoring the family.

I.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

This proceeding commenced in the Circuit Court of Wood County with the filing of a petition on August 28, 2007, alleging that four children of the appellee-respondent, Robin M.[2] were abused and neglected children. The four children affected by this action were Bryanna H., born June 24, 1998; Skylar H., born April 24, 1996; and twins Holly T. and Hanna T., born November 9, 1994. The father of Bryanna H. and Skylar H. is Brian H., the appellant-respondent in this matter. The father of Holly T. and Hanna T. is Kenny T. The order appealed by Brian H. does not address the placement of Holly and Hanna T. and as such, Kenny T. did not participate in this appeal.[3] Counsel was appointed for all parties and a guardian ad litem was appointed to represent the minor children.

The original petition herein was signed and verified by Amy Rexroad, a representative of the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources, hereinafter referred to as "the Department." In it, the Department alleged that the children were abused and/or neglected children within the definition of West Virginia Code §49-1-3 (2007) (Repl. Vol. 2009). The petition contained allegations that the children's health, safety and welfare was endangered by events as early as October of 2006, when Robert J., then the husband of the mother Robin M. and the children's stepfather, committed acts of domestic violence involving a firearm. Skylar H. and Holly T. were instrumental in disarming Robert J. on this occasion. Over the course of the next six months, the family received services including counseling for the children and domestic violence counseling for the family, but domestic violence continued in the home. In May, 2007, Robert J. left the residence that he shared with Robin M. and the four children.

[2]We follow our traditional practice in cases involving sensitive facts and use initials to identify the parties rather than their full surnames. See In the matter of Jonathan P., 182 W. Va. 302, 303 n.1, 387 S.E.2d 537, 538 n. 1 (1989).

[3]By Order entered April 29, 2009, the circuit court ordered, inter alia, that "in regards (sic) to the above named children, Holly and Hanna T. that physical and legal custody shall remain with the respondent father, Kenny T. and that the parents shall return to the original parenting plan with encouragement to expand visitation as desired by the children and the parent."

At about the same time, Robin M. began a new relationship with Anthony M., an appellee in this matter. While the family was still receiving services from the Department related to when Robert J. Live in the family home, a new referral was made alleging that Robin M. and Anthony M. were engaging in drug use in the presence of the children. The children also informed social workers of a trip to a local tattoo shop where Anthony M. and Robin M. purchased drugs. The petition included an allegation that Anthony M.'s parental rights to his own children had been terminated in another proceeding by order dated May 27, 2005. Anthony M.'s parental rights were affected in part by his conviction on child abuse charges arising in the State of Florida, as well as by acts of domestic violence against his former wife in the presence of his children. The petition also included an allegation that Anthony M. had an "extensive criminal history."

The concerns about the presence of Anthony M. in the home prompted social workers providing services to the family to approach Robin M. about signing a protection plan that included a condition that Anthony M. would not reside in the home. Robin M. refused to agree to this plan, calling it harassment on the part of the Department. The mother's failure to execute the protection or safety plan prompted the filing of the initial petition.

In the order filing the petition, the lower court found, inter alia, that "by removing Anthony M. from the home of the respondent-mother, the children can be protected and safe." The court order contained the following findings:

> There exists no imminent danger to the children if Anthony M. is not permitted to have contact with the children, and therefore if he is removed from the home, removal from the home of the respondent-mother would not be in the best interest of the children.
> It is accordingly ORDERED that Bryanna H., Skylar H., Holly T. and Hanna T. shall remain in the home of Robin J.
> It is further ORDERED that the alleged abusing person, Anthony M., is ordered to refrain from visiting or residing in the home of the children, and from having any unauthorized contact with the children.

> It is further ORDERED that if the respondent-mother continues to let Anthony M. live in her home or have contact with the children, then the children should be removed immediately from the home and placed in the custody of the Department, after which the Court should be immediately notified and a preliminary hearing will be held.

The order filing the petition required the Department to convene a multi-disciplinary team (MDT) meeting within 30 days of the filing of the petition, and required that the Department provide the respondent parents with forms to complete for the purposes of evaluating and establishing child support.

On August 28, 2007, the Department filed an amended petition with new allegations regarding Robin M.'s conduct since being served with the original petition. At the time of the filing of the amended petition Holly T. and Hanna T. were residing with their biological father. Skylar H. and Bryanna H. likewise were residing in the home their biological father, the appellant Brian H., and paternal grandmother. The amended petition included an allegation that Robin M. was not going to make Anthony M. leave the home and that they intended to get married. It was alleged that Anthony M. was disruptive during the process of carrying out the court's order and police officers attempted to escort him off the property, to the mother's protest.

The preliminary hearing on the amended petition was scheduled for September 4, 2007. After a hearing, the lower court found that imminent danger existed to the physical well-being of the children and that there were no reasonable alternatives to the removal of these children from the home of their mother, Robin M. The circuit court found that reasonable efforts were made to prevent the removal of the children including services by the Department and the opportunity offered to Robin M. to have the children remain in her home provided Anthony M. was not present. The lower court further found that Robin M. "refused to cooperate with the Department and further failed to comply with the previous Order of this Court in that she refused to keep Anthony M. away from her children." The Department was granted legal custody of Bryanna H. and Skylar H. and their placement was at the paternal grandmother's home.

An adjudicatory hearing was scheduled for September 19, 2007. The respondent mother, through her counsel, requested that this hearing be continued. The adjudication of this matter was rescheduled for October 20, 2007.

At an adjudicatory hearing on October 20, 2007, Robin M. and Anthony M. moved for a pre-adjudicatory improvement period pursuant to West Virginia Code §49-6-12(a) (1996) (Repl. Vol. 2009) and Rule 23 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect.[4] In her motion for the improvement period, the appellee mother requested that the children remain with her during the pendency of the improvement period. The Department objected to the children's placement with their mother and Anthony M. on a period of improvement without appropriate evidence being received in support of the motion. The court continued the hearing to December 14, 2007, and ordered that Robin M. and Anthony M. be subjected to urinalysis to detect the presence of drugs in their bodies. Anthony M. acknowledged to the court that his urine screen would be positive for marijuana. At the hearing on December 14, 2007, Robin M. and Anthony M. withdrew their request for pre-adjudicatory improvements periods and announced that they wished to stipulate to the adjudication. The court continued the hearing to January 28, 2008. Evidence was taken on January 28, 2008, and the hearing was continued until March 7, 2008. This date was later changed to March 18, 2008. Because of the guardian ad litem's illness, this hearing was continued until April 18, 2008.

[4]Both Robin M. and Anthony M. requested pre-adjudicatory improvement periods, which may be in effect for a period not to exceed three months. This contrasts with the post-adjudicatory improvement period defined by West Virginia Code §49-6-12(b), which may continue for a period not to exceed six months, and the dispositional improvement period contained in West Virginia Code §49-6-12(c), which allows for an improvement period for a period not to exceed six months. Both post-adjudicatory improvement periods and dispositional improvement periods may be extended for a period not to exceed three months pursuant to West Virginia Code §49-6-12(g) "when the court finds that the respondent has substantially complied with the terms of the improvement; that the continuation of the improvement period will not substantially impair the ability of the department to permanently place the child; and that such extension is otherwise consistent with the best interest of the child."

On April 18, 2008, Robin M. and Anthony M. stipulated to the circuit court that the children were abused and neglected. Their written stipulation contained the following admissions:

1. Anthony M. has had his parental rights terminated to his own natural children. The underlying basis for the termination was physical abuse of a step-child and use of illegal controlled substances. Anthony was given an improvement period, which he failed to complete.[5]
2. Robin C.[6] has previously been married to Robert J. and while married, the children observed domestic violence between the two, including the use of a gun and leaving bruising to the respondent-mother. The Department opened a case in 2006 and Robin cooperated with the Department receiving parenting classes and counseling for the children. Robert J. finally moved out of the house in April, 2007.
3. Robin C. then began dating Anthony M., living in the home with the children and Robin.
4. Anthony M. continued to use illegal controlled substances and the children testified they saw him using illegal controlled substances as well as saw the illegal controlled substances and the paraphernalia used to consume said substances. Robin C. was aware of his use of marijuana.
5. Robin C. refused to have Anthony M. move out of her home.

[5]At a hearing on January 28, 2008, John Arnott testified on behalf of the Department that he was the assigned child protective services worker working with the Anthony M. family. An abuse and neglect proceeding was instituted in 2005, that ultimately led to the termination of Anthony M.'s parental rights to his children with Bobby Jo M., his former wife, and the prohibition of continued contact with his stepchildren who were also named in the petition.

[6]Throughout the course of these proceedings the appellee-mother has been known by various surnames. At the time of the filing of the original petition, Robin M. was known by the name of Robin J. When she divorced her husband Robert J., she returned to her previous name of Robin C.

As a part of the stipulation and by agreement, Robin M. was granted a six-month post-adjudicatory improvement period. The stipulation and agreement did not include an improvement period for Anthony M. The Department, the appellant and the father of the other children involved in the proceeding objected to the granting of the improvement period to Anthony M. The lower court ruled, however, that Anthony M. should receive an improvement period. As result of their agreement and the court's order, the appellees were placed on a six-month post-adjudicatory improvement period. As noted above, at this time Bryanna H. and Skylar H. were residing in the home of their paternal grandparents, which was also the home of their biological father, Brian H.

After the entry of the adjudication against the appellee mother and Anthony M., the petition was amended on April 30, 2008, for a second time. This amended petition, which is the subject of this appeal, contained the first allegations of wrongdoing regarding the appellant, including that he had a history of domestic violence, which included pushing Robin M. "down in the street while the children are present and throwing items at the children (sic) October 1997." The petition also contained reference to a conversation between the guardian ad litem, the guardian ad litem's investigator and the children wherein it was reported that the children believed any mail they received from their mother, Robin M., was confiscated and hidden from them in a file in their grandparents' computer room.

The Department characterized this as "emotional abuse" on the part of the grandparents and on Brian H.'s part, because he knew the mail was being taken and it upset the children. It was further alleged that the children were not happy in their current placement at their paternal grandparents because their father was not around and they did not like his girlfriend. The petition also alleged that Brian H. was inappropriate in his interactions with personnel at his children's school and that he wrongfully attempted to remove the children from school.

At the adjudicatory hearing, the principal witnesses against Brian H. were Robin M. and the children. Robin M. testified that in 2005, she petitioned Wood County Family Court seeking cessation of his contact with the children. Robin M. testified that she sought this relief "because the girls were coming back crying about things he did to them and that happened to them when they was (sic) with him." While the record does not contain a copy of the applicable Family Court order, Robin M. stated that the order entered prohibited Brian H. from having contact with his children.[7] Despite the existence of this prohibition, Robin M. began letting the children see Brian H. again "right before all this started with me and Anthony."

[7]The failure of the record to include applicable Family Court orders is troubling to this Court. When the basis of the Department's prohibition of placement with a parent is another court's order, the parties should ensure that that particular document is in the record for this Court's review.

Skylar H. testified at the May 23, 2008, adjudicatory hearing that on one occasion after the filing of the petition, she and her sister Bryanna H. went to the home of their father's girlfriend, April G., and to Blockbuster. On several other occasions their father took them to McDonald's or to school without anyone else being present. Regarding what the circuit court ultimately concluded was emotional abuse on the part of Brian H., the following testimony was elicited between the assistant prosecuting attorney and the child:

Q. Now, when you stayed with your Grandma and your Grandpa H., were there things that kind of bothered you?
A. Yeah.
Q. Can you give me an example of some things that bothered you while you were there?
A. They'd hide our cards and letters that my mom gave us or sent.
Q. How did you know they hid them?
A. One day I was getting on the computer to check my Myspace page, and --
Q. You have a Myspace page?
A. Yeah.
Q. Is it good stuff on that page?
A. Yeah.
Q. Okay. All right.
A. And I went to drawing, and they had a file that said, "Letters," and I clicked on it. And it had a copy of all our letters.
Q. And who were they from?
A. My mom.
Q. Okay. Did they ever tell you you got those letters?
A. No.
Q. Did you ask them about it?
A. No.
Q. Was there anything else that bothered you while you were there?
A. Only that we didn't get to go very many places.

Other complaints included the paternal grandparents calling Robin M. names. Skylar H. testified that Brian H. was not present but that she complained to him about the name-calling. The state elicited the testimony of Skylar H. regarding an incident in which Brian H. was alleged to have violated the initial order in this proceeding by being alone with the children.

The adjudicatory order against Brian H. was entered by the circuit court on December 15, 2008, based upon hearings that were held on May 23, 2008, August 19, 2008, and September 16, 2008. The court found that Bryanna H. and Skylar H. were abused and /or neglected children, within the definition of West Virginia Code § 49-1-3(a)[8] (2007) (Repl.

[8]The statutory definition of abused child in W. Va. Code §49-1-3(a) is as follows:

"Abused child" means a child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by:

> (2) Sexual abuse or sexual exploitation; or
> (3) The sale or attempted sale of a child by a parent, guardian or custodian in violation of section sixteen, article four, chapter forty-eight of this code; or
> (4) Domestic violence as defined in section two hundred two, article twenty-seven, chapter forty-

Vol. 2009) and §49-1-3(j)(1) (2007) (Repl. Vol. 2009)[9]. The lower court made the following findings of fact relating to the testimony of Skylar:

> a. She saw April around her grandparents' house on several occasions, although she remained in the truck and did not come inside;
> b. She went with her Dad and Bryanna to Blockbuster to pick out a movie, during which time they saw "Uncle Lee." After picking out a movie, Skylar testified that they all went to April G.'s trailer to watch the movie with her. This did not constitute supervised visitation as Brian H. had the girls in his custody alone, without his parents or other suitable persons present;
> c. Her father, alone, took her to school, McDonald's, and Kroger;
> d. Her Dad, grandparents, and aunt would not let the girls have the cards and letters from their mother;

9(1) "Neglected child" means a child:

> (A) Whose physical or mental health is harmed or threatened by a present refusal, failure or inability of the child's parent, guardian or custodian to supply the child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care or education, when such refusal, failure or inability is not due primarily to a lack of financial means on the part of the parent, guardian or custodian; or
> (B) Who is presently without necessary food, clothing, shelter, medical care, education or supervision because of the disappearance or absence of the child's parent or custodian.

e. Her grandparents and aunt would make the girls stand and sit in the corner for extended periods of time, sometimes over an hour, as punishment;

f. Her grandparents would call her mother derogatory names, (sic) when she reported this to her Dad, he did nothing about it and accused her of lying;

g. A pair of tennis shoes given to Bryanna by her mother were urinated on by the dog and her grandparents and/or her Dad would not wash them and made Bryanna wear them to school where the other children called her names because of the smelly shoes;

h. Her Dad did not spend much time with either of the girls because of his work schedule (9:00 p.m. to 6:00 a.m. Monday through Friday). After he got off work he would apparently go to sleep and then wake up around 3:00 p.m. and pick up April's kids, take them to her house, and then come to his parent's home and only spend a short time with the girls. After spending only a short time with the girls at his parents' house, Brian H. would go running around until reporting to work at 9:00 p.m.

The court order concluded that there was clear and convincing evidence that Bryanna H. and Skylar H. had suffered emotional abuse by the appellant, Brian H., by his failure to make sure that the children were not being mentally abused and that appropriate supervision was being given. The adjudicatory order also stated that there was clear and convincing evidence that the children had been neglected by Brian H. by the "threat of harm to their mental and physical health" by Brian H., by "his present refusal to make sure that this children were not being mentally abused and that appropriate supervision was being given."

Despite a finding that the appellant was not directly responsible for these actions,[10] the order also concluded that the "pattern of inappropriate and derogatory remarks regarding the children's mother" as well as keeping the children's correspondence from their mother, the children suffered emotional abuse by the appellant. The adjudicatory order granted the father visitation, but required that his visitation be closely supervised "until he can demonstrate that he will fully comply with agreements and court orders and can demonstrate that he will be fully responsible for their care and protection when they are in custody." The children remained in the legal custody of the Department after the entry of this order.

> This abuse and neglect was perpetuated by the respondent-father's failure to follow through with complaints by the children that the grandparents were preventing them form getting their mail, calling the respondent-mother inappropriate and derogatory names, and providing inappropriate discipline, thereby knowingly permitting the children to be subjected to this activity. Additionally, this abuse and neglect was perpetuated by the respondent-father's failure to follow through with adequate supervision by permitting the children to be in the presence of April G[.], from whom the respondent-father was to keep the children away.

April G. was the former girlfriend of Brian H. The record indicates that the children did not feel comfortable around April G. but there is no substantive allegation regarding her fitness as a parent or stepparent. As a result of the children's protests, Brian H. was directed by the Department to keep the children away from April G.

The circuit court reviewed this matter on January 9, 2009. At this time the lower court granted the appellant an improvement period. A hearing was scheduled for February 3, 2009, to enter the terms and conditions of Brian H.'s improvement period. Both Anthony M. and Brian H. moved for unsupervised visitation with the children. Brian H. objected to the granting of unsupervised visitation to Anthony M. After a hearing on February 20, 2009, and through an order entered February 27, the circuit court granted Brian H.'s motion for unsupervised visitation and denied the stepfather Anthony M.'s request. Anthony M. was, however, allowed to be with the children when Robin M. was present.

The circuit court continued to have regular reviews of the progress of the parties as they worked through their improvement periods. A dispositional hearing for Robin M. and Anthony M. was scheduled for April 21, 2009, as well as a review of the father's improvement period. Prior to the hearing, Brian H. filed a motion for custody of the minor children. In his motion for the children to be placed with him, Brian H. stated that he had been compliant with the improvement period, had appropriate housing for himself and the children and reiterated his concern for the safety of the children if they were placed in the home of Robin M. and Anthony M. Brian H.'s motion contained the following plea to the Court:

> As the Court is aware, Mr. M[.] has been terminated to his own children in a prior abuse and neglect proceeding and has a lengthy criminal history including a felony child neglect for which he was incarcerated in the state of Florida. Mr. M[.]

> tested positive for drugs during the pendency of this proceeding. Mr. M[.] and the Respondent Mother married during the pendency of this proceeding after the mother was made aware of the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (sic) concerns regarding Mr. M[.]

On April 21, 2009, a dispositional hearing was conducted by the circuit court. Robin M. and Anthony M. moved that the children be returned to the custody of their mother, Robin M., and Anthony M. The appellant, Brian H., moved that the children be placed in his custody. The guardian ad litem expressed her approval of the placement of the children with their mother and stepfather. The Department took no position. Brian H. objected to the proposed placement. The lower court found that it was in the best interest for Bryanna H. and Skylar H. to be placed in the physical and legal custody[11] of their mother, Robin M., and granted the motion. As such, the court below denied the motion of Brian H. From this order entered May 1, 2009, Brian H. pursues this appeal.

[11]At the oral argument of this case, the Court learned that one of the parties' children had left her mother's household and was now primarily living with the appellant. The Department did not appear to be aware of this fact. By letter dated March 9, 2010, counsel for the Department provided the Court with updated information regarding the safety of the child in her present placement. We are concerned that the Department did not appear to be cognizant of the significant change in circumstances from the lower court's dispositional order, but express our appreciation to counsel for providing this information.

Our standard of review of the findings and conclusions of the circuit court in regard to abuse and neglect proceedings is well established.

Syl. pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996). With this standard in mind, we review the circuit court's findings and conclusions.

III.

DISCUSSION

The appellant raises numerous errors in the lower court's adjudicatory order. These errors may be placed in the following categories: A) insufficient evidence to support the court's findings regarding abuse and/or neglect; B) error in granting the stepfather, Anthony M., an improvement period; C) error in not granting custody of the children to Brian H.; and D) lack of due process because of the delay in adjudicating this matter. Each shall be addressed in turn.

Sufficiency of the Evidence

At the heart of the claims of Brian H. is the sufficiency of the proof against him that led to the circuit court's conclusions that the children were indeed abused and neglected children as a result of his actions. Without the proper evidence, the findings are meaningless. As we have previously stated:

> W. Va.Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], requires the State Department of Welfare [now the Department of Health and Human Resources], in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove 'conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition ... by clear and convincing proof.' The statute, however, does not specify any particular manner or mode of testimony or evidence by which the State Department of Welfare is obligated to meet this burden." Syllabus pt. 1, In the Interest of S.C., 168 W. Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981).

Additionally, "[t]he standard of proof required to support a court order limiting or terminating parental rights to the custody of minor children is clear, cogent and convincing proof." Syl. pt. 6, In re: Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1974).

In its findings and conclusions, the circuit court concluded that the children were abused and neglected not so much by the acts of the appellant himself, but by the acts of others in their lives, especially the children's paternal grandparents, where the children were placed pursuant to court order. These conclusions were reached after more substantive abuse and neglect allegations had been levied against the children's mother and stepfather, including the charge that the stepfather's presence endangered the children's safety, and that the children's mother refused to end his presence around the children. We are ever mindful that any semblance of an issue regarding Brian H.'s fitness as a parent arose only during the course of these proceedings. Brian H.'s role in the children's life, while limited, was not in question at the time that the original petition was filed. This is not to say that this Court condones the father's actions, or as the case may be, his limited role in the children's lives. It is simply to view such behavior against the entire backdrop of these children's lives. We are especially concerned that the father may have condoned the interference with Robin M.'s communication with the children. Giving the trial court the deference it deserves under our standard of review, we find that there was no error in adjudicating the children abused and/or neglected with respect to their father.

Role of Anthony M. in these proceedings

The appellant also objected throughout the course of the underlying proceeding to the granting of an improvement period to Anthony M., on standing issues as well as because of the prior termination of his parental rights to two other children. As to the standing, if any, of Anthony M. to participate in these proceedings, Anthony M. obviously was not the parent of any of Robin M.'s children. At the time of the filing of the initial petition alleging Robin M.'s children were abused and neglected, however, Anthony M. resided in the home of Robin M., along with the children, and acted in the role of stepfather to the children. We thus determine that inasmuch as Anthony M. resided with Robin M. and the children prior to the filing of this initial abuse and neglect petition, and in view of his actual involvement in the children's lives, he was a custodian entitled to fully participate in these proceedings. Anthony M. therefore has standing in this matter.

We must next address the effect of the prior termination of Anthony M.'s parental rights first as they related to Robin M., and secondly, in his role as a custodian of the children. We note from the outset that this is not a case where the Department would be required to seek the termination of Robin M.'s parental rights because of the previous termination of Anthony M.'s parental rights to his other children. The provisions of West Virginia Code §49-6-5b (2006) (Repl. Vol. 2009), which detail when the Department must initiate or join in a proceeding to terminate parental rights, would not apply in this case, inasmuch as the children of Anthony M. are not siblings of Robin M.'s children. [12] That is not to say, however, that the effect of the prior termination of Anthony M.'s parental rights is not an important point for the circuit court's inquiry, and certainly so if the question is whether to extend to Anthony M. the right to an improvement period. Anthony M.'s presence in the case was attendant to his marriage to the mother of the children and his role as their stepparent. Again, we cannot conclude that it was error for the circuit court to allow

[12]West Virginia Code §49-6-5b details those circumstances that require the Department to seek termination of parental rights as follows;

> (a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, the department shall file or join in a petition or otherwise seek a ruling in any pending proceeding to terminate parental rights:
> > ...(3) If a court has determined the parent has committed murder or voluntary manslaughter of another of his or her children or the other parent of his or her children; has attempted or conspired to commit such murder or voluntary manslaughter or has been an accessory before or after the fact of either crime; has committed unlawful or malicious wounding resulting in serious bodily injury to the child or to another of his or her children or to the other parent of his or her children; or the parental rights of the parent to a sibling have been terminated involuntarily.

Anthony M. to fully participate in these proceedings as the spouse of the children's mother and as their stepfather.

C.

Failure to grant Brian H. custody of the children

It seems clear throughout this lengthy proceeding that Brian H. was never perceived to be a likely candidate for custody of his biological children. From the beginning of this case, when all allegations regarding the abuse and neglect of these children were related to the conduct of their mother, the children were placed elsewhere. After the petition was amended to reflect conduct that happened during the course of these proceedings, while the Department's focus was on Robin M. and Anthony M., Brian H. complied with the terms and conditions of his improvement period. He was not, however, effectively considered to be a placement for his children. Indeed, though the children were returned to their mother, Brian H. did not have defined custodial time.

We glean from the record that the return of the children to the home of their mother was to restore the children's last placement prior to the intervention of the Department through the abuse and neglect petition. The authority for this position is readily ascertainable. We have stated:

> At the conclusion of the improvement period, the court shall review the performance of the parents in attempting to attain the goals of the improvement period and shall, in the court's discretion, determine whether the conditions of the improvement period have been satisfied and whether sufficient improvement has been made in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child.

Syl. pt. 6, In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

The right of a parent to the custody of his or her child is foremost in our jurisprudence. We have repeatedly emphasized the importance of parental rights and have stated:

> ' "A parent has the natural right to the custody of his or her infant child, and, unless the parent is an unfit person because of misconduct, neglect, immorality, abandonment, or other dereliction of duty, or has waived such right, or by agreement or otherwise has permanently transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody, the right of the parent to the custody of his or her infant child will be recognized and enforced by the courts." Syllabus, State ex rel. Kiger v. Hancock, 153 W. Va. 404, 168 S.E.2d [798] (1969).' Syllabus pt. 2, Hammack v. Wise, 158 W. Va. 343, 211 S.E.2d 118 (1975)."

Syl. pt. 1, Nancy Viola R. v. Randolph W., 177 W. Va. 710, 356 S.E.2d 464 (1987).

We have further held:

> "In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions."

Syl. pt. 1, In re: Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129.

With these standards in mind, we now review whether the circuit court erred in placing the children with Robin M. and Anthony M., as opposed to placement with their father, Brian H. The circuit court's order concludes that it was in the best interests of the children to be placed with their mother, Robin M., and her husband, Anthony M. There is no mention whatsoever of why the home of Brian H. was not an appropriate placement for the children, or why it was apparently not even considered. It should have been. Hence, the record before us gives an insufficient view of the rationale of the lower court in making its determination. As such, we are limited in our review and consideration of the best interests of the children. In light of one child's return to her father's home despite the underlying order, we conclude that it was error to summarily place the children in the home of Robin M. and Anthony M. without consideration of the placement of the children with Brian H. The circuit court should forthwith reconvene a dispositional hearing to determine whether the children should live with Robin M. or Brian H. Such a hearing should also consider any updated information on the children and their best interests.

D. Timeliness of Adjudication

The appellant has raised an issue regarding the length of time between the filing of the amended petition below and the final order in this matter. In light of the resolution of the other issues herein, we do not believe it to now be necessary to address this concern.

IV.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, we conclude that the circuit court did not commit error in finding that Skylar H. and Bryanna H. were abused and/or neglected children as a result of their father's actions. We find error in the dispositional phase of this proceeding in that the circuit court failed to adequately consider the home of Brian H. as a placement for Skylar H. and Bryanna H. We therefore affirm that portion of the circuit court's order that adjudicated the children abused and neglected by the acts of Brian H. We reverse that portion of the order of the circuit court which placed the children in the home of Robin M. and Anthony M. We therefore remand this matter to the circuit court for a hearing on an appropriate placement of the children, with appropriate consideration being given to the father, Brian H., as the custodial parent. The mandate of the Court shall issue forthwith.

Affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded.

The Honorable Charles M. LOBBAN.

Dec. 6, 1984

Syllabus by the Court

1. Under W.Va.Code 49-6-2(a) [1984] a child who is the alleged victim of sexual abuse may not be interrogated at any time during the abuse or neglect proceeding without the presence of her counsel unless counsel waives that right on behalf of the child.

2. When a child's capacity to testify that she was the victim of a sexual abuse or neglect is present, the court should appoint a neutral child psychologist or psychiatrist to conduct a transcribed or otherwise recorded interview.

Mary Beth Kershner, Asst. Atty. Gen., Lauren Young, Charleston, for petitioner.

Richard Gunoe, Asst. Pros. Atty., Hinton, for respondent, Judge.

David L. Parmer, Hinton, for M.J. and V.J.

Perry E. Mann, Hinton, for R.J.

NEELY, Justice:

The petitioners seek to prohibit the enforcement of certain provisions of a circuit court order permitting the interrogation of the alleged child-victim of sexual abuse outside the presence of her court-appointed attorney. Because of the clear language of W.Va.Code 49-6-2(a) [1984] providing that a child in a neglect or abuse proceeding shall have the right to be represented by counsel "at every stage of the proceedings", we award the writ. In addition, we hold that the court, in an abuse or neglect proceeding, may appoint a neutral psychologist or psychiatrist to inquire into the child's capacity to testify.

I

In this case a five-year-old girl was allegedly the victim of sexual abuse inflicted by her father. During a preliminary hearing on this matter, the circuit court issued an order that counsel for the respondent-parents and the guardian ad litem appointed for the child should "interview said child together and then privately." The court found no reason not to permit the child to be interviewed by her father's counsel without anyone else, including her own lawyer, being present.

W.Va.Code 49-6-2(a) [1984] reads in part: "In any proceeding under the provisions of this article, the child, ... shall have the right to be represented by counsel at every stage of the proceedings ..." Clearly this section is dispositive: a child who is the subject of a sexual abuse or neglect proceeding may not be interrogated at any time during such proceeding without the presence of her counsel unless her counsel waives that right.

This Court has previously held that in juvenile delinquency proceedings an immature minor is incapable of waiving his right to assistance of counsel except upon the advice of counsel. State ex rel J.M. v. Taylor, W.Va., 276 S.E.2d 199 (1981). Certainly, it is absurd to maintain that an alleged abuse victim five years old is capable, not only of exercising independent judgment during a private interrogation conducted by the lawyer representing the alleged perpetrator of the abuse, but also of withstanding the subtle pressure that such a lawyer might attempt, consciously or unconsciously, to exert.

A parent accused of sexual abuse by his minor child has a constitutional right to know of what his child accuses him in order to prepare his defense. But certainly the child victim has a concurrent right to be protected against unrestrained private examination by adverse interests. Child victims of sexual abuse doubtless have undergone a horrifying experience. For that reason it is necessary to assure the child a modicum of protection. See generally, Parker J., "The Rights of Child Witnesses: Is the Court a Protector or Perpetrator?" 17 New Eng. L.J. 3 (1982); Note, "Evidentiary Problems in Criminal Child Abuse Prosecutions," 63 Geo. L.J. 257 (1974).

Often a child in an abuse proceeding is the only potential witness. Thus, the problem confronting any court at the outset of an abuse proceeding is whether the child is competent to testify against her parents. See footnote 1 When dealing with adult witnesses, the issues of competency and credibility are separable. These distinctions become blurred in the case of a five-year-old, however. In some situations a child may be engaging in phantasy. For example, the child may desire to "hurt" the parent for a real or imagined grievance. In other cases, the child may be incapable of making rational judgments on his own without being unduly influenced by others. See, Note, "Lawyering for the Abused Child: You Can't Go Home Again" 29 UCLA L. Rev. 1216, at 1241-44 (1982).

Therefore, we understand a trial court's concern to determine that a child is a competent witness before she is allowed to be the prime accuser. To do this the court should appoint a neutral child psychologist or psychiatrist to inquire into the child's capacity. However, the court may not force the child to be interviewed by the psychologist or psychiatrist alone unless both the court and the guardian ad litem agree that the interview is best conducted in that manner. The corollary to the proposition that the guardian ad litem must give permission, however, is that the trial court can refuse to allow the child to be a witness in the absence of an unimpeded interview with a child psychologist or psychiatrist who could then give some assurance of competency. Under W.Va.Code 49-6-2(c) [1984] this interview with the child psychologist or psychiatrist should be transcribed or recorded in an unobtrusive manner (unless waived by all the parties to the proceedings).

For the reasons stated above, the writ of prohibition prayed for is awarded.

Writ Awarded.

Footnote: 1 The traditional test in determining the competency of a child witness is whether the child "has intelligence enough to make it worthwhile to hear him at all and whether he feels a duty to tell the truth." McCormick on Evidence § 62 (3d ed. E. Cleary 1984). Thus the judge usually considers the child's capacity to tell the truth and not simply his age.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syl. Pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

2. "At the conclusion of the improvement period, the court shall review the performance of the parents in attempting to attain the goals of the improvement period and shall, in the court's discretion, determine whether the conditions of the improvement period have been satisfied and whether sufficient improvement has been made in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child." Syl. Pt. 6, In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

3. "As a general rule the least restrictive alternative regarding parental rights to custody of a child under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] will be employed; however, courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and this is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illness, need consistent close interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by numerous placements." Syl. Pt. 1, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

4. "Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W. Va. Code, 49–6–5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected." Syl. Pt. 2, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

5. "It is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians. Lower courts in cases such as these should provide, whenever possible, for a gradual transition period, especially where young children are involved. Further, such gradual transition periods should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment of the children to this change and to maintain as much stability as possible in their lives." Syl. Pt. 3, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991).

Workman, Chief Justice:

This case is before the Court upon the appeal of the Mother, S.L.H.,[1] (hereinafter referred to as "the Mother") from the April 30, 2014, order of the Circuit Court of Raleigh County, West Virginia, terminating her parental rights. The Mother argues that the circuit court erred when it: 1) terminated her parental rights to her two children[2] because it was not the least restrictive alternative available; 2) abused its discretion by not granting her a dispositional period; 3) failed to place the children with their maternal grandmother;[3] and 4) allowed the children to remain in their paternal aunt's care. Based upon our review of the appendix record,[4] the parties' briefs and arguments, and all other matters before the

[3]The maternal grandmother, pro se, filed a motion to intervene in this case on January 15, 2014. Contrary to the assigned error, the circuit court did not make any ruling regarding the grandmother's motion in its April 30, 2014, order that is the subject of the instant appeal. Moreover, by order entered May 20, 2014, the circuit court indicated that it had been advised that the grandmother "had filed a motion to intervene but after argument, the Court will consider her motion and will set a hearing on the motion in the future." Consequently, there is no factual or legal basis for this assigned error and the Court will not address it.

Court, we reverse the circuit court's decision to terminate the Mother's parental rights and remand the case for the implementation of a gradual transition plan to return the children to the custody of their Mother.[5]

I. Procedural and Factual History

On August 28, 2012, an abuse and neglect petition was filed against both

Rules of Appellate Procedure. Due to the inadequacy of the appendix record, this Court, by order entered January 16, 2015, requested the entire record in the case. From a review of the record below, it is evident that the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") failed to include the case plans at issue in this case and failed to submit any written motion and supporting documents upon which the circuit court relied to terminate the Mother's parental rights. There were also salient orders entered by the circuit court that the parties failed to submit to this Court. Further, there are documents included in the appendix record that were not included in the record below. Those documents, which include certifications and letters regarding the Mother's treatment and case summaries prepared regarding visitation between the Mother and her children, may have been submitted as exhibits before the circuit court during hearings. The documents, however, were not contained in the record below.

We find it necessary to remind parties that they are bound to follow the West Virginia Rules of Appellate Procedure when pursuing an appeal before this Court, which includes the preparation and filing of an appendix record in compliance with our rules. The appendix record submitted in this case failed to comport with our rules; however, there was no objection to it by either the DHHR or the guardian ad litem.

C.R.M., who is the children's father,[6] and the Mother. The allegations in the petition concerned severe domestic violence, as well as alcohol and drug abuse in the presence of the infant children. The allegations included a referral to Child Protective Services ("CPS") on August 14, 2012, concerning both parents abusing alcohol and drugs, namely Oxycontin, and not providing a safe environment for the children. The petition also contained a referral to CPS on August 27, 2012, wherein the Mother, who was intoxicated, allegedly hid in the woods near the home with her two children, having fled due to a domestic altercation with the father. A preliminary hearing was held on October 18, 2012. By order entered October 26, 2012, the circuit court determined that probable cause existed warranting the removal of the children from the parents' home.

On December 6, 2012, the circuit court conducted an adjudicatory hearing. During the hearing, both parents stipulated to allegations of abuse and neglect. Specifically, the Mother stipulated "that she neglected her children through her drug abuse affecting her ability to parent her children." Both parents separately moved for post-adjudicatory improvement periods. The circuit court subsequently granted a six-month post-adjudicatory improvement period for each parent. The circuit court ordered that the Multi-Disciplinary

[6]The children's father's rights were also terminated by the circuit court as indicated in the April 30, 2014, order. The circuit court's termination of the father's rights is not before the Court.

Team ("MDT") was to meet by December 14, 2012,[7] and that a family case plan was to be developed and filed with the court by January 7, 2013. No case plan was placed in the record below or in the appendix record submitted before this Court.[8]

The appendix record also contained two monthly summaries for December 2012 and January 2013 prepared by Kelly Cook-Stevens, ASO Service Provider, regarding the Mother's visits with her children. In December 2012, Ms. Stevens supervised three visits between the Mother and her children. Ms. Stevens reported:

> [Mother]. . . is very interactive and affectionate with her children. She gets in the floor and plays with them and she made a tent with . . . [one child] and also played the Nintendo Wii. She balances the time equally between both boys and they

[7]The Mother represents in her brief that the MDT met on December 11, 2012, and a case plan was developed for the Mother. The Mother represents, and neither the DHHR nor the guardian ad litem dispute, that the "major components" of that case plan were:

> 1. [The Mother] . . . is to complete a psychological evaluation and follow recommendations of the psychologist.
> 2. [The Mother] . . . is to work one-on-one with her service providers.
> 3. [The Mother] . . . will successfully complete an inpatient substance abuse program.

The Mother further maintains in her brief that: 1) she completed the psychological evaluation on January 7, 2013; 2) the DHHR did not make a referral for services until August 2013 and that is when the Mother started counseling, which she successfully completed; and 3) she has successfully completed an inpatient substance abuse program.

[8]West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a) (2014) requires the DHHR to "file with the court a copy of the child's case plan, including the permanency plan for the child."

> interact very well with her. She changes their diapers throughout the visit and is very nurturing with both children. [One of the boys] cries at the end of the visits and she comforts him well and tries not to show any emotion.

In the January 2013 summary, Ms. Stevens reported:

> Provider supervised three visits during the month of January. [Mother] . . . is very interactive and affectionate with her children. [Mother]. . . was very loving with both boys and focuses on them the entirety of the visits. She balances the time equally between both boys and they interact very well with her. She changes [the younger boy's] . . . diaper throughout the visit and is very nurturing with both children. [The older boy] . . . cries at the end of the visits and she comforts him well and tries not to show any emotion. She graduated from Turning Point on January 31st and seems to be doing well in her recovery.

The record also contained a March 6, 2013, report prepared by a CPS worker for DHHR. This report indicated that the Mother "has made progress towards completing the goals set forth in her Family Case Plan. She successfully completed Turning Point on January 31, 2013, and has successfully maintained sobriety." Further, visits with her children were described as "positive." The Mother "interacts with her children well and makes up games to play with them. She balances her time equally between both boys and is nurturing to both children."

On March 7, 2013, the circuit court held an improvement period review hearing. By order entered March 22, 2013, the circuit court noted that it was "advised that respondent mother is progressing and when she obtains beds for the children, weekend

overnights will be started for her and reunification is the permanency plan for her."

A report of the guardian ad litem, dated June 7, 2013, indicates that a MDT meeting was conducted on May 21, 2013, wherein it was noted that visitation had been increased between the Mother and her children, but then decreased due to the Mother's housing situation. "The MDT concluded that as soon as the Respondent Mother established a new housing arrangement with her mother, visitation could resume to overnights and there would be no opposition by any party to a three (3) month extension." Further, "there were no concerns with drug use on the part of the Respondent Mother." The recommendation was to give the Mother a three-month extension on her improvement period.

The circuit court held another improvement period review hearing on June 13, 2013. By order entered July 29, 2013, the circuit court stated that "the MDT is proposing and moving for a three (3) month extension to transition the children back to respondent mother which motion the Court hereby GRANTS."

On September 26, 2013, the circuit court conducted another improvement period review hearing. By order entered November 19, 2013, the circuit court noted that during the hearing on September 26, the circuit court "was advised that Respondent Mother was progressing but had suffered a relapse based upon alcohol intoxication and loss of a job[,] but[,] since September 3, 2013, she has been re[-]employed and tested negative for three (3) weeks." According to this order, "[t]he Department was willing to agree to an extension of her improvement period on a dispositional basis but due to her denial of a problem, the Court, after argument, will take under advisement whether it will deny or grant an extension of her improvement period."[9] The circuit also directed the MDT to meet "within ten (10) days and create a treatment plan for . . . [the Mother] and report to the Court." No treatment plan or report is contained in the record.[10]

The appendix record reveals that the Mother entered an inpatient treatment facility on November 14, 2013. According to a letter dated January 3, 2014, from the Mother's attorney to DHHR, the Mother successfully completed Prestera's Addictions Recovery Center Program on December 7, 2013. Included with the letter was a treatment narrative indicating that she successfully completed the short-term residential program.

After completing Prestera's inpatient treatment program, the Mother enrolled

[9]Both the DHHR and the guardian ad litem represented in their respective briefs that by order dated September 26, 2013, the circuit court granted the Mother a requested extension of her improvement period. Contrary to this representation, according to the November 19, 2013, order, the requested extension was not granted. The circuit court only took it under advisement.

[10]Both the DHHR and the guardian ad litem represent that on October 4, 2013, the Mother signed a second case plan agreeing to attend inpatient rehabilitation. Once again, this case plan was not made a part of the record.

in Prestera's Co-Occurring Intensive Outpatient Program on January 16, 2014. On January 10, 2014, the mother also was accepted into the West Virginia Oxford House, a residential sober living program, located in Huntington, West Virginia.

The circuit court conducted another hearing on January 10, 2014. By order entered March 5, 2014,[11] as a result of the January hearing, the circuit court indicated that it "was advised that Respondent Mother is enrolled in the Oxford House in Huntington, WV, but the Department and Guardian ad Litem do not believe this facility is appropriate for her and that there is a bed at Storm Haven in Beckley, WV."[12] The case was continued status quo and another review hearing was scheduled for April 10, 2014. According to the April 30, 2014, order entered by the circuit court, "[a]nother identified problem with Oxford [H]ouse was that it was clearly not an appropriate place for children. This prevented the Department from beginning to reunite the children through overnight visitation and longer unsupervised visits."[13] The only reason given for this determination was found in the DHHR's brief wherein the following statement was made: "The facility was not considered to be an appropriate place for child visitation because it was apparently tended and staffed by recovering addicts." Notwithstanding this representation, there is no evidence in the record before the Court regarding why the DHHR and the guardian ad litem "believed" that the Oxford House was not appropriate for the Mother. Similarly, there is no evidence regarding why the Oxford House "was clearly not an appropriate place for children."

[12]The Mother indicated in her brief before the Court that the reason she chose the treatment program in Huntington was because she "felt she could be most successful in recovery to remove herself from the Beckley area where she had previously used and relapsed."

Also contained within the appendix record is a March 7, 2014, letter from Tara R. Henry, BA, a case manager with Prestera Center for Mental Health Services, Inc. Ms. Henry reports that the Mother is enrolled in Co-Occurring Intensive Outpatient Program that she started on January 16, 2014. Ms. Henry also indicates that the Mother is participating in "individual and group therapy, individual and group supportive intervention, as well as 12-step groups." Ms. Henry states that once the Mother graduates, she will be referred to the Substance Abuse Outpatient program to continue her recovery.

Further, the appendix record contains a letter, dated April 7, 2014, from Terry Johnson, an assistant outreach worker at the Oxford House. Ms. Johnson advises that the Mother > has met all the requirements associated with membership and is in good standing. She is drug screened randomly and has passed them all. She has successfully found employment and is actively fulfilling her agreement with Oxford House West Washington by getting a sponsor, working steps and attending her choice of recovery meetings regularly.

A second undated letter in the record from Natalie Roe of the Oxford House indicates that the Mother "has become an amazing leader and accepted the responsibility of the house president. She has continued to gain employment and grow in her recovery." According to this letter, the Mother was scheduled to graduate on April 16, 2014, and she "maintains actively in the program through follow up therapy[,]" attending Alcoholics Anonymous ("AA") and Narcotics Anonymous ("NA") meetings. She was also employed.

On April 10, 2014, the circuit court held a hearing[14] "on a motion to terminate the improvement periods of both parents, and for disposition of both parents." While the record contains a motion filed by the DHHR to terminate the father's parental rights, there is no motion filed by the DHHR seeking a termination of the Mother's parental rights.[15] The only mention in the record that disposition for the Mother might occur at this hearing was [14]Notwithstanding the parties' failure to submit an appendix record that comports with West Virginia Rule of Appellate Procedure 7, which is applicable to abuse and neglect appeals, see note four supra, the parties also elected to proceed in this matter without transcripts of the hearings below as permitted by Rule 11 of the West Virginia Rules of Appellate Procedure concerning abuse and neglect appeals. See W. Va. R. App. P. 11 (i) ("In order to provide an inexpensive and expeditious method of appeal, the petitioner is encouraged to perfect an appeal under this Rule without the transcript of testimony taken in the lower court. In lieu of filing all or part of the transcript of testimony, the petitioner shall set out in the petitioner's brief a statement of all facts pertinent to the assignments of error.") (Emphasis added). The parties, however, failed to include in their briefs "all the facts pertinent to the assignment of error." See id. The parties' respective factual recitations contained in the briefs lack any discussion of the evidence that was introduced at the dispositional hearing that resulted in the termination of the Mother's rights.

found in the March 5, 2014, order wherein the court sets "[a]n improvement period review hearing or dispositional hearing on . . . [the Mother]" for April 10, 2014. The April 30, 2014, order regarding this hearing indicates that the circuit court heard testimony that the Mother had signed a case plan on October 4, 2013, agreeing to attend an inpatient rehabilitation facility. According to the order, she > filled out intake forms for four (4) rehab facilities and was contacted by John D. Good Recovery Center for a phone interview and she stated she did not need detox and was removed from the waiting list. Respondent Mother was later admitted to Prestera's twenty eight (28) day Addictions Recovery Center on November 14, 2013, but left the program.[16] The Department had asked the Respondent Mother to move to a facility in Beckley, WV, so that the Mother could spend more time with her children because of the difficulty of transporting the children to Huntington and because Oxford House is not appropriate for any children's visitation.[17]

[17]As previously mentioned, there is no evidence in the record as to why Oxford House was not appropriate for children's visitation, only the DHHR's representation that the facility is "apparently tended and staffed by recovering addicts." Counsel for the Mother represented to the Court during oral argument that the treatment facility the DHHR recommended that the Mother go to in Beckley was similar to the Oxford House that the Mother enrolled in in Huntington. According to the website for Storm Haven, located in Beckley, like the Oxford House, it too is a "sober living environment"founded by Doug Stanley, who "was in recovery from alcohol addiction[.]" Storm Haven Recovery Home, http://stormhavenrecoveryhome.org (last visited March 2, 2015).

Following the April 10 hearing, but before the circuit court entered the April 30, 2014, order concerning that hearing, the Mother submitted a letter dated April 28, 2014, from Prestera Center indicating that the Mother "has completed 8 of the 9 interventions for her substance abuse treatment goal[,]" and had also "completed 3 of the 7 interventions of the goal for depression." The appendix record also contains a "certificate of completion" of "Prestera's Co-Occurring Intensive Outpatient Program" dated June 22, 2014, as well as log sheets showing that the Mother was attending AA/NA meetings.

By order entered April 30, 2014,[18] the circuit court found that: 1) the children had been in the custody of the DHHR for nineteen of the last twenty-two months; 2) the Mother had not substantially complied with the case plan she signed; 3) the Mother had not made sufficient progress towards reunification with her children; 4) the Mother was unwilling to make the reunification of her family her first priority; and 5) the Mother deliberately ignored reasonable directives of DHHR and recommendations contained in the treatment plan that she signed and agreed to follow. As the circuit court stated in its order, the Mother "refused to enter a long term intensive rehabilitation program, refused to move to a facility in Beckley where she could spend more time with her children, and failed to make any substantial progress toward reunification with her children in a timely manner."

Further, the order provided that the Mother "failed to show this Court by clear and convincing evidence that she will be able to comply with a future improvement period and further she has failed to prove by clear and convincing evidence that she is motivated to put her children's best interests ahead of her own personal pursuits." Based upon the foregoing, the circuit court terminated the Mother's parental rights to her two children, determined that "the infant children shall remain in the temporary legal and physical custody of the Department of Health and Human Resources with placement of the infant children to be in the discretion of the Department[,]" and found that "[t]he permanency has not been achieved but the Department has made reasonable efforts to achieve the same and that this hearing meets the requirements for foster care review . . . ." It is this ruling that forms the basis for the instant appeal.

II. Standard of Review

> This Court has explained that
> > "[f]or appeals resulting from abuse and neglect proceedings, such as the case sub judice, we employ a compound standard of review: conclusions of law are subject to a de novo review, while findings of fact are weighed against a clearly erroneous standard." In re Emily, 208 W. Va. 325, 332, 540 S.E.2d 542, 549 (2000).

In re J.S., 233 W. Va. 394, 400, 758 S.E.2d 747, 753 (2014). We have also applied the following standard of review to cases involving abuse and neglect proceedings:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court

> are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

Syl. Pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996); accord In re B. H., 233 W. Va. 57, 754 S.E.2d 743 (2014)(applying same standard of review in abuse and neglect proceeding where mother admitted to neglect, circuit court adjudicated the children abused and neglected, and issue before Court concerned whether mother had substantially complied with terms of her post-adjudicatory improvement period). We are also ever mindful of our strong precedence in abuse and neglect cases that "the best interests of the child is the polar star by which decisions must be made which affect children." Michael K.T. v. Tina L.T., 182 W. Va. 399, 405, 387 S.E.2d 866, 872 (1989) (citation omitted); see Syl. Pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996) ("Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children."). Guided by these standards of review, we turn to the arguments before us.

III. Discussion

A. Termination of the Mother's parental rights.

The Mother argues that the circuit court erred in terminating her parental rights. More precisely, the Mother contends that the circuit court erred in finding that she left Prestera's Addictions Recovery Center early and that she had not made sufficient progress towards reunification with her children and had not substantially complied with the family case plan. Conversely, the DHHR argues that the circuit court properly terminated the Mother's parental rights because she failed to demonstrate a reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect could be corrected. The DHHR maintains that she "failed to comply with her improvement period or to consider recommendations that would result in her timely reunification with her children," because she ignored the DHHR's recommendations regarding where to enroll in treatment for her addiction thereby frustrating reunification with her children.

This Court has held that

> [a]t the conclusion of the improvement period, the court shall review the performance of the parents in attempting to attain the goals of the improvement period and shall, in the court's discretion, determine whether the conditions of the improvement period have been satisfied and whether sufficient improvement has been made in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child.

Syl. Pt. 6, In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991). Moreover, we have held

that

> [a]s a general rule the least restrictive alternative regarding parental rights to custody of a child under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] will be employed; however, courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and this is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illness, need consistent close interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by numerous placements.

Syl. Pt. 1, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980). Finally,

> [t]ermination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected.

In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. at 496, 266 S.E.2d at 114, Syl. Pt. 2.

The undisputed evidence before the circuit court clearly demonstrated that the Mother successfully completed the twenty-eight-day inpatient rehabilitation at the Prestera Center. The record is completely devoid of any evidence that supports the finding that the Mother left this program. Moreover, completion of an inpatient treatment program was the requirement of her case plan and the record shows that she did complete such a program. Again, there is no evidence in the record, or in the circuit court's order, that supports any finding that the Mother was directed by the circuit court to obtain treatment only where the DHHR recommended. Rather, the requirement placed on the Mother was that she had to undergo treatment. The Mother successfully completed both inpatient and long-term outpatient treatment programs for her addiction. She has also been participating in individual and group therapy, individual and group supportive intervention, as well as twelve-step groups. According to the Mother's brief, she has attended AA and NA meetings on a daily basis since January 10, 2014. Additionally, the Mother removed herself from the abusive relationship with the children's father. She remains sober, she is employed, she is going to attend college, and, according to her status update, she has obtained housing.[19]

The circuit court focused solely upon the Mother's failure to complete the treatment program in Beckley recommended by the DHHR. The DHHR maintained, and the circuit court found, that because of this, the Mother frustrated the goal of reunification with her children and failed to make her children her first priority.[20]

[19]In her status update filed with the Court pursuant to West Virginia Rule of Appellate Procedure 11(j), the Mother is currently living in Vienna, West Virginia, in an apartment with a one-year lease. She has been working at Red Lobster since October 20, 2014. She was previously employed by SRBI, a telemarketer, from March 2014 to October 2014. She was supposed to start school at WVU-Parkersburg on January 12, 2015, with the goal of becoming a surgical technician. She will attend classes on Mondays and Wednesdays. She continues to screen weekly for drugs and her results have been negative.

[20]Visitation between parent and child during an out-of-custody improvement period is important in evaluating whether a parent is making strides towards reunification with the child. As we stated in In re Carlita B., "[a] parent's level of interest in visiting with his or

The Mother's choice of undergoing treatment for her addiction in Huntington as opposed to Beckley may have made it more difficult to visit her children. Despite the representations by the DHHR and the guardian ad litem regarding the difficulty with visitation caused by the Mother undergoing treatment in Huntington, there is no evidence

her child during an out-of-home improvement period is an extremely significant factor for the circuit court to review. A parent who consistently demonstrates a desire to be with his child obviously has far more potential for being a nurturant and committed parent than one whose interest in being with his child is erratic." 185 W. Va. at 628, 408 S.E.2d at 380. In the instant case, the Mother enunciated a sound reason for choosing the Huntington treatment program. Moreover, her interest in visiting her children was not at issue, rather the logistics of arranging visitations with the Mother was made more difficult due to her decision to enter a treatment program that was further away from her children. That decision was necessitated by her desire to remedy the thing that made her a neglectful mother – her addiction to drugs and alcohol. The DHHR, and the circuit court, therefore, lost sight of the purpose of the improvement period We also discussed the purpose of improvement periods in In re Carlita B. as follows:

> The goal should be the development of a program designed to assist the parent(s) in dealing with any problems which interfere with his ability to be an effective parent and to foster an improved relationship between parent and child with an eventual restoration of full parental rights a hoped-for result. The improvement period and family case plans must establish specific measures for the achievement of these goals, as an improvement period must be more than a mere passage of time. It is a period in which the . . . [DHHR] and the court should attempt to facilitate the parent's success, but wherein the parent must understand that he bears a responsibility to demonstrate sufficient progress and improvement to justify return to him of the child.

regarding how visitation was made more difficult or, more importantly, how the Mother was purposely trying to thwart reunification with her children by obtaining treatment from one facility instead of the other. Likewise, despite statements in the DHHR's brief that the Oxford House in Huntington "was not considered to be an appropriate place for child visitation [including overnight visitation] because it was apparently tended and staffed by recovering addicts[,]" there was no evidence in the record to support this assertion. Nor was there any evidence in the record to indicate that Storm Haven in Beckley, which was the treatment facility recommended by the DHHR, was an appropriate venue for visitation, including overnight visitation. There is, however, evidence in the appendix record that demonstrates that the Mother maintained consistent visitation with her children during her improvement period. The record further demonstrates that during visitation with her children, the Mother was very nurturing and loving with them. She gave each child equal amounts of her time, prepared their meals, and played with them.

There is also a lack of evidence to support the circuit court's determination that "the Respondent Mother has shown that she is unwilling to make the reunification of her family her first priority." The record is devoid of evidence to support the circuit court's finding that "the Respondent Mother has deliberately ignored reasonable directives of the DHHR and recommendations contained in the treatment plan that she signed and agreed to follow." Neither does the record support the circuit court's finding that the Mother "failed to make any substantial progress towards reunification with her children in a timely manner." Rather, the appendix record demonstrates that the Mother successfully completed multiple treatment programs, obtained housing and employment, enrolled in college, and participated in successful visitations with her children. Thus, based upon our review of both the record below and the appendix record, we find the Mother was making steady progress during the post-adjudicatory improvement period. The circuit court erred in its findings to the contrary, including its determination that there was "no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future. . . ." See W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6). Having found that the circuit court's findings supporting termination were clearly erroneous, see In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. at 223, 470 S.E.2d at 177, we reverse the circuit court's decision.[21]

[21]West Virginia Code § 49-6-5 clearly establishes that termination of a parent's rights is the last resort. In this case, given the great strides made by the Mother, who by all accounts was and continues to be pursuing a path toward recovery from her addiction, there were other options short of termination of rights that the circuit court should have employed. According to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5:

> The court shall give precedence to dispositions in the following sequence:
> (1) Dismiss the petition;
> (2) Refer the child, the abusing parent, the battered parent or other family members to a community agency for needed assistance and dismiss the petition;
> (3) Return the child to his or her own home under supervision of the department;

B. Transition Period

Because termination of the Mother's parental rights is not warranted in this case, the priority now is to reunify the Mother with her children. Our concern in this case, and every case involving children, is the welfare of the children. The two boys in this case have been in the care and custody of the DHHR and the paternal aunt for the majority of their lives. Consequently, this case calls for a gradual transition period of custody to the Mother in a manner that will cause the least amount of trauma and stress for the two children involved. As this Court first held in syllabus point three of James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991):

> custodian which prescribe the manner of supervision and care of the child and which are within the ability of any parent or parents or custodian to perform;
>
> (5) Upon a finding that the abusing parent or battered parent or parents are presently unwilling or unable to provide adequately for the child's needs, commit the child temporarily to the custody of the state department, a licensed private child welfare agency or a suitable person who may be appointed guardian by the court. . . .
> (6) Upon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future and, when necessary for the welfare of the child, terminate the parental, custodial and guardianship rights and responsibilities of the abusing parent and commit the child to the permanent sole custody of the nonabusing parent, if there be one, or, if not, to either the permanent guardianship of the department or a licensed child welfare agency. The court may award sole custody of the child to a nonabusing battered parent. . . .

> It is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians. Lower courts in cases such as these should provide, whenever possible, for a gradual transition period, especially where young children are involved. Further, such gradual transition periods should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment of the children to this change and to maintain as much stability as possible in their lives.

See Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W. Va. 448, 453, 388 S.E.2d 322, 326 (1989). Further,

> [a]s this Court stated in In re George Glen B., Jr., 207 W. Va. 346, 355, 532 S.E.2d 64, 73 (2000), "[e]xplicit in both Honaker v. Burnside and James M. v. Maynard is the principle that the circuit court, and not the Department or a private agency, bears the burden of crafting a plan for the gradual transition of custody." Moreover, "[w]hen a circuit court determines that a gradual change in permanent custodians is necessary, the circuit court may not delegate to a private institution its duty to develop and monitor any plan for the gradual transition of custody of the child(ren)." Syllabus Point 7, In re George Glen B., Jr.

Kristoper O. v. Mazzone, 227 W. Va. 184, 195, 706 S.E.2d 381, 392 (2011).

Upon remand, we direct the circuit court to expeditiously set this matter for a hearing to establish a clear gradual transition period plan for reunification of the children with their Mother. Even though the length of a gradual transition period is within the circuit court's discretion, due to the length of time that the children have been with their paternal aunt, a transition period of several months similar to the one we discussed in Honaker would be reasonable. See 182 W. Va. at 453, 388 S.E.2d at 326. As in Honaker, > visitation for the natural . . . [Mother] so as to lead to a natural progression to full custody. Such transition plan should give due consideration to both . . . [the Mother's and the paternal aunt's] work and home schedules and to the parameters of the . . . [children's] daily school and home life, and should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment of these children to this change while not unduly disrupting the lives of the parties or the children.

> [f]or the transition period to be effective in accomplishing this purpose, it should provide for ever-increasing amounts of

Id. Additionally, the circuit court must impose specific conditions upon the Mother, such as attending regular AA /NA meetings, and must continue to closely monitor those conditions beginning with bi-monthly reviews for a reasonable period of time in order to be certain that the Mother continues her path to recovery.[22] On remand, the Mother also needs to demonstrate that she is able to care for her children, that her current residence is suitable for the children, that she is able to provide for the children and that she has childcare for the children when she is working and attending school. Lastly, it is in the best interests of the children for the circuit court to provide for the continued reasonable visitation between the children and their paternal aunt. The paternal aunt and these children undoubtedly have bonded and the close relationship formed as a result must be allowed to continue.[23]

[22]The circuit court can gradually increase the time period between reviews as it deems appropriate.

to the Mother is no small feat, both logistically and emotionally, for all involved. As we recognized in Honaker, "[n]o matter how artfully or deliberately the trial court judge draws the plan for these coming months, however, its success and indeed the chances for . . . [the children's] future happiness and emotional security will rely heavily on the efforts . . . [of the Mother and the paternal aunt]. The work that lies ahead for both of them is not without inconvenience and sacrifice on both sides." Id. We are optimistic that the Mother and the paternal aunt will work together for the sake of the children to show them that they are loved and to give them security and stability they need in their lives.

IV. Conclusion

Based upon the foregoing, we reverse the decision of the circuit court and remand the matter for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. The Clerk of this Court is directed to issue the mandate in this case forthwith.

Reversed and remanded
with directions.

No. 14-0533 - In Re: C.M and C.M.

FILED
March 2, 2015
RORY L. PERRY II, CLERK
SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS
OF WEST VIRGINIA

LOUGHRY, Justice, dissenting:

In this tragic case, the Court reverses the fully-warranted termination of the mother's parental rights and orders that she be reunified with her two-young children despite the fact that they have been in the DHHR's custody twenty-nine of the last thirty-two months. Given that the mother has never successfully completed the terms of her improvement period, the majority's decision to order reunification contravenes this Court's longstanding recognition that the children's best interest is the compass by which these decisions are to be governed. See Syl. Pt. 1, State ex rel. Cash v. Lively, 155 W.Va. 801, 187 S.E.2d 601 (1972) ("'In a contest involving the custody of an infant the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided.'"). Had the majority felt compelled to give the mother additional time to demonstrate her fitness as a parent, the most generous procedural relief warranted under the circumstances of this case would have been to remand the case to the circuit court for the purpose of extending the previous improvement period.[1] Instead, the majority literally ignores the sound judgment of the circuit court, the DHHR, the members of the Multi-Disciplinary team, the guardian ad litem, the entire record below, and then unwisely chooses the interests of an abusive and neglectful mother over the best interests of two innocent victims. As grounds for its decision that reunification is justified, the majority imprudently relies upon the mother's self-serving assertions. For these reasons, I dissent from the majority's decision in this case.

The record below fully demonstrates why these young children have yet to achieve any permanency in their lives. When the subject abuse and neglect proceedings began in August of 2012, the mother admitted both to illegally ingesting a daily dose of Oxycontin for the last eight years and drinking in the presence of her children.[2] After stipulating to the abuse and neglect of her two children, who were then two years old and less than two months old, respectively, the mother signed a case plan whereby she agreed to attend an in-patient rehabilitation facility. Deciding against the inpatient, long-term intensive rehabilitation program in Raleigh County where her children live, as was recommended by the DHHR, the mother entered an outpatient, short term twenty-eight-day program at an addiction recovery center located two hours away in Cabell County. Four days shy of the completion date, she left the program.

As the basis for its termination ruling, the trial court found that the mother:

[2]Assuming that the mother was telling the truth when she admitted to ingesting Oxycontin on a daily basis, an obvious conclusion can be drawn that she was doing so during her pregnancies with both children.

- showed that she was unwilling to make the reunification of her family her first priority;
- deliberately ignored the DHHR's reasonable directives and recommendations as contained in the treatment plan that she signed and agreed to follow;
- refused to enter a long-term rehabilitation program;
- refused to move to a facility in Beckley which would allow her to spend more time with her children; and
- failed to make any substantial progress towards reunification with her children in a timely manner.

The trial court's ruling that the mother failed to establish that reunification with her family was her first priority is demonstrated by her repeated choices in treatment and living options that were several hours from where her children were residing with their paternal aunt. As indicated above, she chose to participate in a program outside the Beckley area where her young children were living. The DHHR continually voiced its frustration with the logistical difficulties presented by the distance between where the children were living and where the mother was residing. The mother acknowledged that although she is allowed to see her children on a weekly basis, she only sees them "at least once per month." From the record submitted in this case, it is clear that the mother's paramount concern was not the pursuit of treatment and living options in close proximity to her children. If visiting and maintaining frequent contact with her children was her first priority, it seems logical to conclude that the mother would have sought treatment as near to them as possible. Instead, she bypassed the inpatient treatment plan she had originally agreed to complete, moved to Huntington, West Virginia, and later to Vienna, West Virginia.

Critically, since August of 2012, this mother has not built any meaningful relationship or bond with her two children and, according to the most recent report to the DHHR by the administrative service provider dated January 4, 2015, the mother currently has myriad unresolved parenting deficiencies including:

> Lack of knowledge and competence in providing safety for children, lack of appropriate supervision, hygiene, budgeting, obtaining and maintaining housing, obtaining and maintaining gainful employment, use of appropriate coping and problem solving skills, communication skills, basic home management skills, social and/or emotional support networks developed.

Nonetheless, in spite of the fact that there is nothing in the record to show that the mother is even remotely capable of caring for her young children, the majority blindly orders their reunification with her.

"[A] circuit court's substantive determinations in abuse and neglect cases on adjudicative and dispositional matters–such as whether neglect or abuse is proven, or whether termination is necessary–is entitled to substantial deference in the appellate context." In re Rebecca K.C., 213 W.Va. 230, 235, 579 S.E.2d 718, 723 (2003) (internal citations omitted).[3]

[3]This Court has explained that:

As this Court stressed in In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), "a judgment regarding the success of an improvement period is within the court's discretion . . ." Further, "'courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement . . . where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened . . . .' Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980)." Syl. Pt. 4, in part, In re Cecil T., 228 W.Va. 89, 717 S.E.2d 873 (2011).[4] This Court has also

> "[a]lthough parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syl. Pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996).

[4]This Court has always remained mindful that > whenever a child appears in court, he is a ward of that court. W.Va. Code § 49-5-4 (1996); Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W.Va. 341, 438 S.E.2d 521 (1992). Courts are thus statutorily reposed with a strong obligation to oversee and protect each child who comes before them. As Justices Cleckley and Albright stated in West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ex. rel. Wright v. Brenda C., 197 W.Va. 468, 475 S.E.2d 560 (1996), "[a]bove all else, child abuse and neglect proceedings relate to the rights of an infant." Id. at 477, 475 S.E.2d at 569.

State v. Julie G., 201 W.Va. 764, 776, 500 S.E.2d 877, 889 (1997) (J. Workman, dissenting). Moreover, as we stated in Timber M., 231 W.Va. 44, 743 S.E.2d 352,

> [I]t is clear from our [child abuse and neglect] procedural rules, as well as our prior case law, that "[t]here cannot be too much advocacy for children." State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 200 W.Va. 555, 570, 490 S.E.2d 642, 657 (1997) (Workman, C.J., concurring). Indeed, if one thing is firmly fixed in our recognized that "'it is possible for an individual to show "compliance with specific aspects of the case plan" while failing "to improve . . . [the] overall attitude and approach to parenting.' W.Va. Dept. of Human Serv. v. Peggy F., 184 W.Va. 60, 64, 399 S.E.2d 460, 464 (1990)." In re Jonathan Michael D., 194 W.Va. 20, 27, 459 S.E.2d 131, 138 (1995). Thus, "'[t]he assessment of the overall success of the improvement period lies within the discretion of the circuit court . . . . "regardless of whether . . . the individual has completed all suggestions or goals set forth in family case plans."' In Interest of Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 626, 408 S.E.2d 365, 378 (1991)." In re Jonathan Michael D., 194 W.Va. at 27, 459 S.E.2d at 138.[5]

In this same regard, this Court has previously observed that "[t]he question at the dispositional phase of a child abuse and neglect proceeding is not simply whether the > jurisprudence involving abused and neglected children, it is that the "polar star test [is] looking to the best interests of our children and their right to healthy, happy productive lives[.]" In re Edward B., 210 W.Va. 621, 632, 558 S.E.2d 620, 631 (2001). This Court has repeatedly stated that a child's welfare acts as "the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided." In Re: Clifford K., 217 W.Va. 625, 634, 619 S.E.2d 138, 147 (2005) (internal citation omitted).

[5]See also Matter of Brian D., 194 W.Va. 623, 636, 461 S.E.2d 129, 142 (1995) ("Cases involving children must be decided not just in the context of competing sets of adults' rights, but also with a regard for the rights of the child(ren). . . . and [the children's] own feelings and emotional attachments should be taken into consideration by the lower court.").

parent has successfully completed his or her assigned tasks during the improvement period. Rather, the pivotal question is what disposition is consistent with the best interests of the child." In re Frances J.A.S., 213 W.Va. 636, 646, 584 S.E.2d 492, 502 (2003).[6] Nonetheless, with little analysis, the majority simply concludes that the trial court was wrong with its first-hand observations and determinations relative to the mother's compliance with her treatment plans and her unwillingness to abide by the DHHR's directives and recommendations. In this case, the trial court, after years of involvement in this matter, determined that the mother was not moving towards a successful reunification with her children. Usurping the trial court's function, the majority wholly discarded the lower court's findings and rulings and, instead, declared that "the Mother was making steady progress during the post-adjudicatory improvement period." I strongly disagree.[7]

[6]This Court has also said:

> [a]t the conclusion of the improvement period, the court shall review the performance of the parents in attempting to attain the goals of the improvement period and shall, in the court's discretion, determine whether the conditions of the improvement period have been satisfied and whether sufficient improvement has been made in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child.

Syl. Pt. 6, In Interest of Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991) (emphasis added).

As indicated from the most recent reports submitted by the guardian ad litem to this Court, it appears that the mother has been seeing the biological father of the children and has spent several nights with him. This is alarming for innumerable reasons. The father's parental rights to these children were previously terminated due to his failure to complete a psychological evaluation, his positive test results on multiple drug screens, and later his failure to report for any further drug screens. He failed to complete the BIPPS program, failed to complete a substance abuse program, and did not participate in any of the parenting skills classes with the service providers. The DHHR's initial petition for termination of the father's rights was stayed due to his March 19, 2013, incarceration (which lasted for approximately one year) as a result of selling illicit drugs out of his home. This is the same man from whom the mother previously hid in the woods with one of the infant children because she feared for their safety. She was found with substantial injuries to her body, including bruises, bloody lacerations, and an inability to move her left arm. Because the father's rights were terminated and because the mother initially viewed herself as the statement that she "enrolled in college" the only "proof" is the assertion by her counsel that she intended to take classes to be a surgical technician in Parkersburg, West Virginia. There is no actual evidence that she started such a program. Furthermore, as far as the fact that the mother has apparently signed a lease for an apartment in Vienna, the DHHR points out that it is unknown whether such housing is suitable for these children. The DHHR maintains that the mother has not been available for home visits, which is further frustrated by the fact that she refuses to have direct contact with the DHHR and only communicates through her legal counsel. The DHHR contends that all of the mother's goals, including work and college classes, could have been achieved in Raleigh County where her children are currently living.

victim of his drug-related habits and life-style, there is obvious renewed concern that the mother may be sliding into an old pattern of behavior that is not indicative of someone seeking to stay away from environments where drug usage may be occurring. While no negative drug or alcohol screens have yet surfaced, the guardian ad litem notes several instances where required drug screens did not take place.[8] All of this adds further support to the trial court's conclusion that there was "no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future."

This Court strives to attain permanent custodial arrangements for children determined to be abused and/or neglected with as much alacrity as possible. See In Re Beth Ann B., 204 W.Va. 424, 429, 513 S.E.2d 472, 477 (1998) (recognizing need for circuit court to "act with great dispatch to bring safety, stability, security, and permanency" to lives of abused and or neglected children"). As previously discussed, the underlying abuse and neglect proceeding has been pending for nearly three years and the permanency plan for the children will once again be in a state of turmoil. See W.Va. R.P. Child Abuse & Neglect Proceed. 43 ("Permanent placement of each child shall be achieved within twelve (12) months of the final disposition order, unless the court specifically finds on the record extraordinary reasons sufficient to justify the delay."). With regard to the time frame in which final disposition of abuse and neglect cases should be made, this Court has recognized that "[a]lthough it is sometimes a difficult task, the trial court must accept the fact that the statutory limits on improvement periods (as well as our case law limiting the right to improvement periods) dictate that there comes a time for decision, because a child deserves resolution and permanency in his or her life. . . ." Amy M., 196 W.Va. at 260, 470 S.E.2d at 214. Indeed, improvement periods are "regulated, both in their allowance and in their duration, by the West Virginia Legislature, which has assumed the responsibility of implementing guidelines for child abuse and neglect proceedings generally." In re Emily, 208 W.Va. at 334-35, 540 S.E.2d at 551-52. The circuit court understood this and acted in a manner that allowed these children to remain in the stable environment in which they had lived with their paternal aunt for the past two-and-one-half years. It is unfortunate that the majority of this Court has now destroyed that stability.

[8]The guardian ad litem states that during the month of October 2014, the mother did not have drug screens for three weeks and, on January 6, 2015, the same day as her visit with her children, she missed her drug screen in Parkersburg. She informed her provider that she would test either in Parkersburg or Beckley that same day; however, she did not make arrangements to test until several days later. The guardian ad litem maintains: "As the history with [the mother] in the record before the Circuit Court was that [the mother] abused both prescription drugs and alcohol which remain in an individual's system for just a period of a few days and a missed drug screen as late as last week, the Guardian is left to speculate as to whether she is abusing drugs or alcohol again. The mere fact that [the mother] failed to make arrangements at either of the drug screening locations on the day of her visit and after telling her provider that she would [take the] test suggests a failure to act as a responsible and stable adult."

This is not a case where the mother has not had time to demonstrate her fitness as a parent. She simply has not stepped up to the plate with regard to the reunification aspect of her improvement plan. She may have had early success with her drug-related issues, but as previously stated, she ignored the long-term drug and alcohol treatment program and, according to the DHHR, she still denies having any such dependency issues.

These children deserve a safe and stable environment and that environment has been continually provided by the paternal aunt in whose home the children have been residing since the inception of this matter. For the majority now to decide it knows better than the trial court what these children need–especially in light of the trial court's finding that it would not be in the best interests of the children to be returned to their mother–is both misguided and violative of the trial court's discretion in this matter. See Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. at 239, 470 S.E.2d at 193 ("[A] reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.").

For the foregoing reasons, I respectfully dissent.

JUSTICE LOUGHRY dissents and reserves the right to file a separate opinion.

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syl. Pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

2. "At the conclusion of the improvement period, the court shall review the performance of the parents in attempting to attain the goals of the improvement period and shall, in the court's discretion, determine whether the conditions of the improvement period have been satisfied and whether sufficient improvement has been made in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child." Syl. Pt. 6, In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

3. "As a general rule the least restrictive alternative regarding parental rights to custody of a child under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] will be employed; however, courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and this is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illness, need consistent close interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by numerous placements." Syl. Pt. 1, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

4. "Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W. Va. Code, 49–6–5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected." Syl. Pt. 2, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

5. "It is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians. Lower courts in cases such as these should provide, whenever possible, for a gradual transition period, especially where young children are involved. Further, such gradual transition periods should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment of the children to this change and to maintain as much stability as possible in their lives." Syl. Pt. 3, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991).

Workman, Chief Justice:

This case is before the Court upon the appeal of the Mother, S.L.H.,[1] (hereinafter referred to as "the Mother") from the April 30, 2014, order of the Circuit Court of Raleigh County, West Virginia, terminating her parental rights. The Mother argues that the circuit court erred when it: 1) terminated her parental rights to her two children[2] because it was not the least restrictive alternative available; 2) abused its discretion by not granting her a dispositional period; 3) failed to place the children with their maternal grandmother;[3] and 4) allowed the children to remain in their paternal aunt's care. Based upon our review of the appendix record,[4] the parties' briefs and arguments, and all other matters before the

[2]The children are two boys, who are four years old and two years old. Both boys have names with the initials C.M.

[3]The maternal grandmother, pro se, filed a motion to intervene in this case on January 15, 2014. Contrary to the assigned error, the circuit court did not make any ruling regarding the grandmother's motion in its April 30, 2014, order that is the subject of the instant appeal. Moreover, by order entered May 20, 2014, the circuit court indicated that it had been advised that the grandmother "had filed a motion to intervene but after argument, the Court will consider her motion and will set a hearing on the motion in the future." Consequently, there is no factual or legal basis for this assigned error and the Court will not address it.

Court, we reverse the circuit court's decision to terminate the Mother's parental rights and remand the case for the implementation of a gradual transition plan to return the children to the custody of their Mother.[5]

I. Procedural and Factual History

On August 28, 2012, an abuse and neglect petition was filed against both

Rules of Appellate Procedure. Due to the inadequacy of the appendix record, this Court, by order entered January 16, 2015, requested the entire record in the case. From a review of the record below, it is evident that the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") failed to include the case plans at issue in this case and failed to submit any written motion and supporting documents upon which the circuit court relied to terminate the Mother's parental rights. There were also salient orders entered by the circuit court that the parties failed to submit to this Court. Further, there are documents included in the appendix record that were not included in the record below. Those documents, which include certifications and letters regarding the Mother's treatment and case summaries prepared regarding visitation between the Mother and her children, may have been submitted as exhibits before the circuit court during hearings. The documents, however, were not contained in the record below.

We find it necessary to remind parties that they are bound to follow the West Virginia Rules of Appellate Procedure when pursuing an appeal before this Court, which includes the preparation and filing of an appendix record in compliance with our rules. The appendix record submitted in this case failed to comport with our rules; however, there was no objection to it by either the DHHR or the guardian ad litem.

C.R.M., who is the children's father,[6] and the Mother. The allegations in the petition concerned severe domestic violence, as well as alcohol and drug abuse in the presence of the infant children. The allegations included a referral to Child Protective Services ("CPS") on August 14, 2012, concerning both parents abusing alcohol and drugs, namely Oxycontin, and not providing a safe environment for the children. The petition also contained a referral to CPS on August 27, 2012, wherein the Mother, who was intoxicated, allegedly hid in the woods near the home with her two children, having fled due to a domestic altercation with the father. A preliminary hearing was held on October 18, 2012. By order entered October 26, 2012, the circuit court determined that probable cause existed warranting the removal of the children from the parents' home.

On December 6, 2012, the circuit court conducted an adjudicatory hearing. During the hearing, both parents stipulated to allegations of abuse and neglect. Specifically, the Mother stipulated "that she neglected her children through her drug abuse affecting her ability to parent her children." Both parents separately moved for post-adjudicatory improvement periods. The circuit court subsequently granted a six-month post-adjudicatory improvement period for each parent. The circuit court ordered that the Multi-Disciplinary

[6]The children's father's rights were also terminated by the circuit court as indicated in the April 30, 2014, order. The circuit court's termination of the father's rights is not before the Court.

Team ("MDT") was to meet by December 14, 2012,[7] and that a family case plan was to be developed and filed with the court by January 7, 2013. No case plan was placed in the record below or in the appendix record submitted before this Court.[8]

The appendix record also contained two monthly summaries for December 2012 and January 2013 prepared by Kelly Cook-Stevens, ASO Service Provider, regarding the Mother's visits with her children. In December 2012, Ms. Stevens supervised three visits between the Mother and her children. Ms. Stevens reported:

> [Mother]. . . is very interactive and affectionate with her children. She gets in the floor and plays with them and she made a tent with . . . [one child] and also played the Nintendo Wii. She balances the time equally between both boys and they

[7]The Mother represents in her brief that the MDT met on December 11, 2012, and a case plan was developed for the Mother. The Mother represents, and neither the DHHR nor the guardian ad litem dispute, that the "major components" of that case plan were:

> 1. [The Mother] . . . is to complete a psychological evaluation and follow recommendations of the psychologist.
> 2. [The Mother] . . . is to work one-on-one with her service providers.
> 3. [The Mother] . . . will successfully complete an inpatient substance abuse program.

The Mother further maintains in her brief that: 1) she completed the psychological evaluation on January 7, 2013; 2) the DHHR did not make a referral for services until August 2013 and that is when the Mother started counseling, which she successfully completed; and 3) she has successfully completed an inpatient substance abuse program.

[8]West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a) (2014) requires the DHHR to "file with the court a copy of the child's case plan, including the permanency plan for the child."

> interact very well with her. She changes their diapers throughout the visit and is very nurturing with both children. [One of the boys] cries at the end of the visits and she comforts him well and tries not to show any emotion.

In the January 2013 summary, Ms. Stevens reported:

> Provider supervised three visits during the month of January. [Mother] . . . is very interactive and affectionate with her children. [Mother]. . . was very loving with both boys and focuses on them the entirety of the visits. She balances the time equally between both boys and they interact very well with her. She changes [the younger boy's] . . . diaper throughout the visit and is very nurturing with both children. [The older boy] . . . cries at the end of the visits and she comforts him well and tries not to show any emotion. She graduated from Turning Point on January 31st and seems to be doing well in her recovery.

The record also contained a March 6, 2013, report prepared by a CPS worker for DHHR. This report indicated that the Mother "has made progress towards completing the goals set forth in her Family Case Plan. She successfully completed Turning Point on January 31, 2013, and has successfully maintained sobriety." Further, visits with her children were described as "positive." The Mother "interacts with her children well and makes up games to play with them. She balances her time equally between both boys and is nurturing to both children."

On March 7, 2013, the circuit court held an improvement period review hearing. By order entered March 22, 2013, the circuit court noted that it was "advised that respondent mother is progressing and when she obtains beds for the children, weekend

A report of the guardian ad litem, dated June 7, 2013, indicates that a MDT meeting was conducted on May 21, 2013, wherein it was noted that visitation had been increased between the Mother and her children, but then decreased due to the Mother's housing situation. "The MDT concluded that as soon as the Respondent Mother established a new housing arrangement with her mother, visitation could resume to overnights and there would be no opposition by any party to a three (3) month extension." Further, "there were no concerns with drug use on the part of the Respondent Mother." The recommendation was to give the Mother a three-month extension on her improvement period.

The circuit court held another improvement period review hearing on June 13, 2013. By order entered July 29, 2013, the circuit court stated that "the MDT is proposing and moving for a three (3) month extension to transition the children back to respondent mother which motion the Court hereby GRANTS."

On September 26, 2013, the circuit court conducted another improvement period review hearing. By order entered November 19, 2013, the circuit court noted that during the hearing on September 26, the circuit court "was advised that Respondent Mother was progressing but had suffered a relapse based upon alcohol intoxication and loss of a job[,] but[,] since September 3, 2013, she has been re[-]employed and tested negative for three (3) weeks." According to this order, "[t]he Department was willing to agree to an extension of her improvement period on a dispositional basis but due to her denial of a problem, the Court, after argument, will take under advisement whether it will deny or grant an extension of her improvement period."[9] The circuit also directed the MDT to meet "within ten (10) days and create a treatment plan for . . . [the Mother] and report to the Court." No treatment plan or report is contained in the record.[10]

The appendix record reveals that the Mother entered an inpatient treatment facility on November 14, 2013. According to a letter dated January 3, 2014, from the Mother's attorney to DHHR, the Mother successfully completed Prestera's Addictions Recovery Center Program on December 7, 2013. Included with the letter was a treatment narrative indicating that she successfully completed the short-term residential program.

[9]Both the DHHR and the guardian ad litem represented in their respective briefs that by order dated September 26, 2013, the circuit court granted the Mother a requested extension of her improvement period. Contrary to this representation, according to the November 19, 2013, order, the requested extension was not granted. The circuit court only took it under advisement.

The circuit court conducted another hearing on January 10, 2014. By order entered March 5, 2014,[11] as a result of the January hearing, the circuit court indicated that it "was advised that Respondent Mother is enrolled in the Oxford House in Huntington, WV, but the Department and Guardian ad Litem do not believe this facility is appropriate for her and that there is a bed at Storm Haven in Beckley, WV."[12] The case was continued status quo and another review hearing was scheduled for April 10, 2014. According to the April 30, 2014, order entered by the circuit court, "[a]nother identified problem with Oxford [H]ouse was that it was clearly not an appropriate place for children. This prevented the Department from beginning to reunite the children through overnight visitation and longer unsupervised visits."[13] The only reason given for this determination was found in the DHHR's brief wherein the following statement was made: "The facility was not considered to be an appropriate place for child visitation because it was apparently tended and staffed by recovering addicts." Notwithstanding this representation, there is no evidence in the record before the Court regarding why the DHHR and the guardian ad litem "believed" that the Oxford House was not appropriate for the Mother. Similarly, there is no evidence regarding why the Oxford House "was clearly not an appropriate place for children."

[12]The Mother indicated in her brief before the Court that the reason she chose the treatment program in Huntington was because she "felt she could be most successful in recovery to remove herself from the Beckley area where she had previously used and relapsed."

Also contained within the appendix record is a March 7, 2014, letter from Tara R. Henry, BA, a case manager with Prestera Center for Mental Health Services, Inc. Ms. Henry reports that the Mother is enrolled in Co-Occurring Intensive Outpatient Program that she started on January 16, 2014. Ms. Henry also indicates that the Mother is participating in "individual and group therapy, individual and group supportive intervention, as well as 12-step groups." Ms. Henry states that once the Mother graduates, she will be referred to the Substance Abuse Outpatient program to continue her recovery.

Further, the appendix record contains a letter, dated April 7, 2014, from Terry Johnson, an assistant outreach worker at the Oxford House. Ms. Johnson advises that the Mother > has met all the requirements associated with membership and is in good standing. She is drug screened randomly and has passed them all. She has successfully found employment and is actively fulfilling her agreement with Oxford House West Washington by getting a sponsor, working steps and attending her choice of recovery meetings regularly.

A second undated letter in the record from Natalie Roe of the Oxford House indicates that the Mother "has become an amazing leader and accepted the responsibility of the house president. She has continued to gain employment and grow in her recovery." According to this letter, the Mother was scheduled to graduate on April 16, 2014, and she "maintains actively in the program through follow up therapy[,]" attending Alcoholics Anonymous ("AA") and Narcotics Anonymous ("NA") meetings. She was also employed.

On April 10, 2014, the circuit court held a hearing[14] "on a motion to terminate the improvement periods of both parents, and for disposition of both parents." While the record contains a motion filed by the DHHR to terminate the father's parental rights, there is no motion filed by the DHHR seeking a termination of the Mother's parental rights.[15] The only mention in the record that disposition for the Mother might occur at this hearing was found in the March 5, 2014, order wherein the court sets "[a]n improvement period review hearing or dispositional hearing on . . . [the Mother]" for April 10, 2014. The April 30, 2014, order regarding this hearing indicates that the circuit court heard testimony that the Mother had signed a case plan on October 4, 2013, agreeing to attend an inpatient rehabilitation facility. According to the order, she > filled out intake forms for four (4) rehab facilities and was contacted by John D. Good Recovery Center for a phone interview and she stated she did not need detox and was removed from the waiting list. Respondent Mother was later admitted to Prestera's twenty eight (28) day Addictions Recovery Center on November 14, 2013, but left the program.[16] The Department had asked the Respondent Mother to move to a facility in Beckley, WV, so that the Mother could spend more time with her children because of the difficulty of transporting the children to Huntington and because Oxford House is not appropriate for any children's visitation.[17]

[14]Notwithstanding the parties' failure to submit an appendix record that comports with West Virginia Rule of Appellate Procedure 7, which is applicable to abuse and neglect appeals, see note four supra, the parties also elected to proceed in this matter without transcripts of the hearings below as permitted by Rule 11 of the West Virginia Rules of Appellate Procedure concerning abuse and neglect appeals. See W. Va. R. App. P. 11 (i) ("In order to provide an inexpensive and expeditious method of appeal, the petitioner is encouraged to perfect an appeal under this Rule without the transcript of testimony taken in the lower court. In lieu of filing all or part of the transcript of testimony, the petitioner shall set out in the petitioner's brief a statement of all facts pertinent to the assignments of error.") (Emphasis added). The parties, however, failed to include in their briefs "all the facts pertinent to the assignment of error." See id. The parties' respective factual recitations contained in the briefs lack any discussion of the evidence that was introduced at the dispositional hearing that resulted in the termination of the Mother's rights.

[17]As previously mentioned, there is no evidence in the record as to why Oxford House was not appropriate for children's visitation, only the DHHR's representation that the facility is "apparently tended and staffed by recovering addicts." Counsel for the Mother represented to the Court during oral argument that the treatment facility the DHHR recommended that the Mother go to in Beckley was similar to the Oxford House that the Mother enrolled in in Huntington. According to the website for Storm Haven, located in Beckley, like the Oxford House, it too is a "sober living environment"founded by Doug Stanley, who "was in recovery from alcohol addiction[.]" Storm Haven Recovery Home, http://stormhavenrecoveryhome.org (last visited March 2, 2015).

Following the April 10 hearing, but before the circuit court entered the April 30, 2014, order concerning that hearing, the Mother submitted a letter dated April 28, 2014, from Prestera Center indicating that the Mother "has completed 8 of the 9 interventions for her substance abuse treatment goal[,]" and had also "completed 3 of the 7 interventions of the goal for depression." The appendix record also contains a "certificate of completion" of "Prestera's Co-Occurring Intensive Outpatient Program" dated June 22, 2014, as well as log sheets showing that the Mother was attending AA/NA meetings.

By order entered April 30, 2014,[18] the circuit court found that: 1) the children had been in the custody of the DHHR for nineteen of the last twenty-two months; 2) the Mother had not substantially complied with the case plan she signed; 3) the Mother had not made sufficient progress towards reunification with her children; 4) the Mother was unwilling to make the reunification of her family her first priority; and 5) the Mother deliberately ignored reasonable directives of DHHR and recommendations contained in the treatment plan that she signed and agreed to follow. As the circuit court stated in its order, the Mother "refused to enter a long term intensive rehabilitation program, refused to move to a facility in Beckley where she could spend more time with her children, and failed to make any substantial progress toward reunification with her children in a timely manner."

Further, the order provided that the Mother "failed to show this Court by clear and convincing evidence that she will be able to comply with a future improvement period and further she has failed to prove by clear and convincing evidence that she is motivated to put her children's best interests ahead of her own personal pursuits." Based upon the foregoing, the circuit court terminated the Mother's parental rights to her two children, determined that "the infant children shall remain in the temporary legal and physical custody of the Department of Health and Human Resources with placement of the infant children to be in the discretion of the Department[,]" and found that "[t]he permanency has not been achieved but the Department has made reasonable efforts to achieve the same and that this hearing meets the requirements for foster care review . . . ." It is this ruling that forms the basis for the instant appeal.

II. Standard of Review

> > "[f]or appeals resulting from abuse and neglect proceedings, such as the case sub judice, we employ a compound standard of review: conclusions of law are subject to a de novo review, while findings of fact are weighed against a clearly erroneous standard." In re Emily, 208 W. Va. 325, 332, 540 S.E.2d 542, 549 (2000).

In re J.S., 233 W. Va. 394, 400, 758 S.E.2d 747, 753 (2014). We have also applied the following standard of review to cases involving abuse and neglect proceedings:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court

> are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

Syl. Pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996); accord In re B. H., 233 W. Va. 57, 754 S.E.2d 743 (2014)(applying same standard of review in abuse and neglect proceeding where mother admitted to neglect, circuit court adjudicated the children abused and neglected, and issue before Court concerned whether mother had substantially complied with terms of her post-adjudicatory improvement period). We are also ever mindful of our strong precedence in abuse and neglect cases that "the best interests of the child is the polar star by which decisions must be made which affect children." Michael K.T. v. Tina L.T., 182 W. Va. 399, 405, 387 S.E.2d 866, 872 (1989) (citation omitted); see Syl. Pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996) ("Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children."). Guided by these standards of review, we turn to the arguments before us.

III. Discussion

A. Termination of the Mother's parental rights.

The Mother argues that the circuit court erred in terminating her parental rights. More precisely, the Mother contends that the circuit court erred in finding that she left Prestera's Addictions Recovery Center early and that she had not made sufficient progress towards reunification with her children and had not substantially complied with the family case plan. Conversely, the DHHR argues that the circuit court properly terminated the Mother's parental rights because she failed to demonstrate a reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect could be corrected. The DHHR maintains that she "failed to comply with her improvement period or to consider recommendations that would result in her timely reunification with her children," because she ignored the DHHR's recommendations regarding where to enroll in treatment for her addiction thereby frustrating reunification with her children.

This Court has held that

> [a]t the conclusion of the improvement period, the court shall review the performance of the parents in attempting to attain the goals of the improvement period and shall, in the court's discretion, determine whether the conditions of the improvement period have been satisfied and whether sufficient improvement has been made in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child.

Syl. Pt. 6, In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991). Moreover, we have held

that

> [a]s a general rule the least restrictive alternative regarding parental rights to custody of a child under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] will be employed; however, courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and this is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illness, need consistent close interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by numerous placements.

Syl. Pt. 1, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980). Finally,

> [t]ermination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected.

In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. at 496, 266 S.E.2d at 114, Syl. Pt. 2.

The undisputed evidence before the circuit court clearly demonstrated that the Mother successfully completed the twenty-eight-day inpatient rehabilitation at the Prestera Center. The record is completely devoid of any evidence that supports the finding that the Mother left this program. Moreover, completion of an inpatient treatment program was the requirement of her case plan and the record shows that she did complete such a program. Again, there is no evidence in the record, or in the circuit court's order, that supports any finding that the Mother was directed by the circuit court to obtain treatment only where the DHHR recommended. Rather, the requirement placed on the Mother was that she had to undergo treatment. The Mother successfully completed both inpatient and long-term outpatient treatment programs for her addiction. She has also been participating in individual and group therapy, individual and group supportive intervention, as well as twelve-step groups. According to the Mother's brief, she has attended AA and NA meetings on a daily basis since January 10, 2014. Additionally, the Mother removed herself from the abusive relationship with the children's father. She remains sober, she is employed, she is going to attend college, and, according to her status update, she has obtained housing.[19]

The circuit court focused solely upon the Mother's failure to complete the treatment program in Beckley recommended by the DHHR. The DHHR maintained, and the circuit court found, that because of this, the Mother frustrated the goal of reunification with her children and failed to make her children her first priority.[20]

[19]In her status update filed with the Court pursuant to West Virginia Rule of Appellate Procedure 11(j), the Mother is currently living in Vienna, West Virginia, in an apartment with a one-year lease. She has been working at Red Lobster since October 20, 2014. She was previously employed by SRBI, a telemarketer, from March 2014 to October 2014. She was supposed to start school at WVU-Parkersburg on January 12, 2015, with the goal of becoming a surgical technician. She will attend classes on Mondays and Wednesdays. She continues to screen weekly for drugs and her results have been negative.

[20]Visitation between parent and child during an out-of-custody improvement period is important in evaluating whether a parent is making strides towards reunification with the child. As we stated in In re Carlita B., "[a] parent's level of interest in visiting with his or

The Mother's choice of undergoing treatment for her addiction in Huntington as opposed to Beckley may have made it more difficult to visit her children. Despite the representations by the DHHR and the guardian ad litem regarding the difficulty with visitation caused by the Mother undergoing treatment in Huntington, there is no evidence

her child during an out-of-home improvement period is an extremely significant factor for the circuit court to review. A parent who consistently demonstrates a desire to be with his child obviously has far more potential for being a nurturant and committed parent than one whose interest in being with his child is erratic." 185 W. Va. at 628, 408 S.E.2d at 380. In the instant case, the Mother enunciated a sound reason for choosing the Huntington treatment program. Moreover, her interest in visiting her children was not at issue, rather the logistics of arranging visitations with the Mother was made more difficult due to her decision to enter a treatment program that was further away from her children. That decision was necessitated by her desire to remedy the thing that made her a neglectful mother – her addiction to drugs and alcohol. The DHHR, and the circuit court, therefore, lost sight of the purpose of the improvement period We also discussed the purpose of improvement periods in In re Carlita B. as follows:

> The goal should be the development of a program designed to assist the parent(s) in dealing with any problems which interfere with his ability to be an effective parent and to foster an improved relationship between parent and child with an eventual restoration of full parental rights a hoped-for result. The improvement period and family case plans must establish specific measures for the achievement of these goals, as an improvement period must be more than a mere passage of time. It is a period in which the . . . [DHHR] and the court should attempt to facilitate the parent's success, but wherein the parent must understand that he bears a responsibility to demonstrate sufficient progress and improvement to justify return to him of the child.

regarding how visitation was made more difficult or, more importantly, how the Mother was purposely trying to thwart reunification with her children by obtaining treatment from one facility instead of the other. Likewise, despite statements in the DHHR's brief that the Oxford House in Huntington "was not considered to be an appropriate place for child visitation [including overnight visitation] because it was apparently tended and staffed by recovering addicts[,]" there was no evidence in the record to support this assertion. Nor was there any evidence in the record to indicate that Storm Haven in Beckley, which was the treatment facility recommended by the DHHR, was an appropriate venue for visitation, including overnight visitation. There is, however, evidence in the appendix record that demonstrates that the Mother maintained consistent visitation with her children during her improvement period. The record further demonstrates that during visitation with her children, the Mother was very nurturing and loving with them. She gave each child equal amounts of her time, prepared their meals, and played with them.

There is also a lack of evidence to support the circuit court's determination that "the Respondent Mother has shown that she is unwilling to make the reunification of her family her first priority." The record is devoid of evidence to support the circuit court's finding that "the Respondent Mother has deliberately ignored reasonable directives of the DHHR and recommendations contained in the treatment plan that she signed and agreed to follow." Neither does the record support the circuit court's finding that the Mother "failed to make any substantial progress towards reunification with her children in a timely manner." Rather, the appendix record demonstrates that the Mother successfully completed multiple treatment programs, obtained housing and employment, enrolled in college, and participated in successful visitations with her children. Thus, based upon our review of both the record below and the appendix record, we find the Mother was making steady progress during the post-adjudicatory improvement period. The circuit court erred in its findings to the contrary, including its determination that there was "no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future. . . ." See W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6). Having found that the circuit court's findings supporting termination were clearly erroneous, see In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. at 223, 470 S.E.2d at 177, we reverse the circuit court's decision.[21]

[21]West Virginia Code § 49-6-5 clearly establishes that termination of a parent's rights is the last resort. In this case, given the great strides made by the Mother, who by all accounts was and continues to be pursuing a path toward recovery from her addiction, there were other options short of termination of rights that the circuit court should have employed. According to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5:

> The court shall give precedence to dispositions in the following sequence:
> (1) Dismiss the petition;
> (2) Refer the child, the abusing parent, the battered parent or other family members to a community agency for needed assistance and dismiss the petition;
> (3) Return the child to his or her own home under supervision of the department;

B. Transition Period

Because termination of the Mother's parental rights is not warranted in this case, the priority now is to reunify the Mother with her children. Our concern in this case, and every case involving children, is the welfare of the children. The two boys in this case have been in the care and custody of the DHHR and the paternal aunt for the majority of their lives. Consequently, this case calls for a gradual transition period of custody to the Mother in a manner that will cause the least amount of trauma and stress for the two children involved. As this Court first held in syllabus point three of James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991):

> custodian which prescribe the manner of supervision and care of the child and which are within the ability of any parent or parents or custodian to perform;
>
> (5) Upon a finding that the abusing parent or battered parent or parents are presently unwilling or unable to provide adequately for the child's needs, commit the child temporarily to the custody of the state department, a licensed private child welfare agency or a suitable person who may be appointed guardian by the court. . . .
> (6) Upon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future and, when necessary for the welfare of the child, terminate the parental, custodial and guardianship rights and responsibilities of the abusing parent and commit the child to the permanent sole custody of the nonabusing parent, if there be one, or, if not, to either the permanent guardianship of the department or a licensed child welfare agency. The court may award sole custody of the child to a nonabusing battered parent. . . .

> It is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians. Lower courts in cases such as these should provide, whenever possible, for a gradual transition period, especially where young children are involved. Further, such gradual transition periods should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment of the children to this change and to maintain as much stability as possible in their lives.

> [a]s this Court stated in In re George Glen B., Jr., 207 W. Va. 346, 355, 532 S.E.2d 64, 73 (2000), "[e]xplicit in both Honaker v. Burnside and James M. v. Maynard is the principle that the circuit court, and not the Department or a private agency, bears the burden of crafting a plan for the gradual transition of custody." Moreover, "[w]hen a circuit court determines that a gradual change in permanent custodians is necessary, the circuit court may not delegate to a private institution its duty to develop and monitor any plan for the gradual transition of custody of the child(ren)." Syllabus Point 7, In re George Glen B., Jr.

Kristoper O. v. Mazzone, 227 W. Va. 184, 195, 706 S.E.2d 381, 392 (2011).

Upon remand, we direct the circuit court to expeditiously set this matter for a hearing to establish a clear gradual transition period plan for reunification of the children with their Mother. Even though the length of a gradual transition period is within the circuit court's discretion, due to the length of time that the children have been with their paternal aunt, a transition period of several months similar to the one we discussed in Honaker would be reasonable. See 182 W. Va. at 453, 388 S.E.2d at 326. As in Honaker, > visitation for the natural . . . [Mother] so as to lead to a natural progression to full custody. Such transition plan should give due consideration to both . . . [the Mother's and the paternal aunt's] work and home schedules and to the parameters of the . . . [children's] daily school and home life, and should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment of these children to this change while not unduly disrupting the lives of the parties or the children.

> [f]or the transition period to be effective in accomplishing this purpose, it should provide for ever-increasing amounts of

Id. Additionally, the circuit court must impose specific conditions upon the Mother, such as attending regular AA /NA meetings, and must continue to closely monitor those conditions beginning with bi-monthly reviews for a reasonable period of time in order to be certain that the Mother continues her path to recovery.[22] On remand, the Mother also needs to demonstrate that she is able to care for her children, that her current residence is suitable for the children, that she is able to provide for the children and that she has childcare for the children when she is working and attending school. Lastly, it is in the best interests of the children for the circuit court to provide for the continued reasonable visitation between the children and their paternal aunt. The paternal aunt and these children undoubtedly have bonded and the close relationship formed as a result must be allowed to continue.[23]

[22]The circuit court can gradually increase the time period between reviews as it deems appropriate.

to the Mother is no small feat, both logistically and emotionally, for all involved. As we recognized in Honaker, "[n]o matter how artfully or deliberately the trial court judge draws the plan for these coming months, however, its success and indeed the chances for . . . [the children's] future happiness and emotional security will rely heavily on the efforts . . . [of the Mother and the paternal aunt]. The work that lies ahead for both of them is not without inconvenience and sacrifice on both sides." Id. We are optimistic that the Mother and the paternal aunt will work together for the sake of the children to show them that they are loved and to give them security and stability they need in their lives.

IV. Conclusion

Based upon the foregoing, we reverse the decision of the circuit court and remand the matter for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. The Clerk of this Court is directed to issue the mandate in this case forthwith.

Reversed and remanded
with directions.

No. 14-0533 - In Re: C.M and C.M.

FILED
March 2, 2015
RORY L. PERRY II, CLERK
SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS
OF WEST VIRGINIA

LOUGHRY, Justice, dissenting:

In this tragic case, the Court reverses the fully-warranted termination of the mother's parental rights and orders that she be reunified with her two-young children despite the fact that they have been in the DHHR's custody twenty-nine of the last thirty-two months. Given that the mother has never successfully completed the terms of her improvement period, the majority's decision to order reunification contravenes this Court's longstanding recognition that the children's best interest is the compass by which these decisions are to be governed. See Syl. Pt. 1, State ex rel. Cash v. Lively, 155 W.Va. 801, 187 S.E.2d 601 (1972) ("'In a contest involving the custody of an infant the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided.'"). Had the majority felt compelled to give the mother additional time to demonstrate her fitness as a parent, the most generous procedural relief warranted under the circumstances of this case would have been to remand the case to the circuit court for the purpose of extending the previous improvement period.[1] Instead, the majority literally ignores the sound judgment of the circuit court, the DHHR, the members of the Multi-Disciplinary team, the guardian ad litem, the entire record below, and then unwisely chooses the interests of an abusive and neglectful mother over the best interests of two innocent victims. As grounds for its decision that reunification is justified, the majority imprudently relies upon the mother's self-serving assertions. For these reasons, I dissent from the majority's decision in this case.

The record below fully demonstrates why these young children have yet to achieve any permanency in their lives. When the subject abuse and neglect proceedings began in August of 2012, the mother admitted both to illegally ingesting a daily dose of Oxycontin for the last eight years and drinking in the presence of her children.[2] After stipulating to the abuse and neglect of her two children, who were then two years old and less than two months old, respectively, the mother signed a case plan whereby she agreed to attend an in-patient rehabilitation facility. Deciding against the inpatient, long-term intensive rehabilitation program in Raleigh County where her children live, as was recommended by the DHHR, the mother entered an outpatient, short term twenty-eight-day program at an addiction recovery center located two hours away in Cabell County. Four days shy of the completion date, she left the program.

As the basis for its termination ruling, the trial court found that the mother:

[2]Assuming that the mother was telling the truth when she admitted to ingesting Oxycontin on a daily basis, an obvious conclusion can be drawn that she was doing so during her pregnancies with both children.

- showed that she was unwilling to make the reunification of her family her first priority;
- deliberately ignored the DHHR's reasonable directives and recommendations as contained in the treatment plan that she signed and agreed to follow;
- refused to enter a long-term rehabilitation program;
- refused to move to a facility in Beckley which would allow her to spend more time with her children; and
- failed to make any substantial progress towards reunification with her children in a timely manner.

The trial court's ruling that the mother failed to establish that reunification with her family was her first priority is demonstrated by her repeated choices in treatment and living options that were several hours from where her children were residing with their paternal aunt. As indicated above, she chose to participate in a program outside the Beckley area where her young children were living. The DHHR continually voiced its frustration with the logistical difficulties presented by the distance between where the children were living and where the mother was residing. The mother acknowledged that although she is allowed to see her children on a weekly basis, she only sees them "at least once per month." From the record submitted in this case, it is clear that the mother's paramount concern was not the pursuit of treatment and living options in close proximity to her children. If visiting and maintaining frequent contact with her children was her first priority, it seems logical to conclude that the mother would have sought treatment as near to them as possible. Instead, she bypassed the inpatient treatment plan she had originally agreed to complete, moved to Huntington, West Virginia, and later to Vienna, West Virginia.

Critically, since August of 2012, this mother has not built any meaningful relationship or bond with her two children and, according to the most recent report to the DHHR by the administrative service provider dated January 4, 2015, the mother currently has myriad unresolved parenting deficiencies including:

> Lack of knowledge and competence in providing safety for children, lack of appropriate supervision, hygiene, budgeting, obtaining and maintaining housing, obtaining and maintaining gainful employment, use of appropriate coping and problem solving skills, communication skills, basic home management skills, social and/or emotional support networks developed.

Nonetheless, in spite of the fact that there is nothing in the record to show that the mother is even remotely capable of caring for her young children, the majority blindly orders their reunification with her.

"[A] circuit court's substantive determinations in abuse and neglect cases on adjudicative and dispositional matters–such as whether neglect or abuse is proven, or whether termination is necessary–is entitled to substantial deference in the appellate context." In re Rebecca K.C., 213 W.Va. 230, 235, 579 S.E.2d 718, 723 (2003) (internal citations omitted).[3]

[3]This Court has explained that:

As this Court stressed in In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), "a judgment regarding the success of an improvement period is within the court's discretion . . ." Further, "'courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement . . . where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened . . . .' Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980)." Syl. Pt. 4, in part, In re Cecil T., 228 W.Va. 89, 717 S.E.2d 873 (2011).[4] This Court has also

> "[a]lthough parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syl. Pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996).

> whenever a child appears in court, he is a ward of that court. W.Va. Code § 49-5-4 (1996); Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W.Va. 341, 438 S.E.2d 521 (1992). Courts are thus statutorily reposed with a strong obligation to oversee and protect each child who comes before them. As Justices Cleckley and Albright stated in West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ex. rel. Wright v. Brenda C., 197 W.Va. 468, 475 S.E.2d 560 (1996), "[a]bove all else, child abuse and neglect proceedings relate to the rights of an infant." Id. at 477, 475 S.E.2d at 569.

State v. Julie G., 201 W.Va. 764, 776, 500 S.E.2d 877, 889 (1997) (J. Workman, dissenting). Moreover, as we stated in Timber M., 231 W.Va. 44, 743 S.E.2d 352,

> [I]t is clear from our [child abuse and neglect] procedural rules, as well as our prior case law, that "[t]here cannot be too much advocacy for children." State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 200 W.Va. 555, 570, 490 S.E.2d 642, 657 (1997) (Workman, C.J., concurring). Indeed, if one thing is firmly fixed in our

Thus, "'[t]he assessment of the overall success of the improvement period lies within the discretion of the circuit court . . . . "regardless of whether . . . the individual has completed all suggestions or goals set forth in family case plans."' In Interest of Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 626, 408 S.E.2d 365, 378 (1991)." In re Jonathan Michael D., 194 W.Va. at 27, 459 S.E.2d at 138.[5]

In this same regard, this Court has previously observed that "[t]he question at the dispositional phase of a child abuse and neglect proceeding is not simply whether the

In this case, the trial court, after years of involvement in this matter, determined that the mother was not moving towards a successful reunification with her children. Usurping the trial court's function, the majority wholly discarded the lower court's findings and rulings and, instead, declared that "the Mother was making steady progress during the post-adjudicatory improvement period." I strongly disagree.[7]

[6]This Court has also said:

> [a]t the conclusion of the improvement period, the court shall review the performance of the parents in attempting to attain the goals of the improvement period and shall, in the court's discretion, determine whether the conditions of the improvement period have been satisfied and whether sufficient improvement has been made in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child.

Syl. Pt. 6, In Interest of Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991) (emphasis added).

As indicated from the most recent reports submitted by the guardian ad litem to this Court, it appears that the mother has been seeing the biological father of the children and has spent several nights with him. This is alarming for innumerable reasons. The father's parental rights to these children were previously terminated due to his failure to complete a psychological evaluation, his positive test results on multiple drug screens, and later his failure to report for any further drug screens. He failed to complete the BIPPS program, failed to complete a substance abuse program, and did not participate in any of the parenting skills classes with the service providers. The DHHR's initial petition for termination of the father's rights was stayed due to his March 19, 2013, incarceration (which lasted for approximately one year) as a result of selling illicit drugs out of his home. This is the same man from whom the mother previously hid in the woods with one of the infant children because she feared for their safety. She was found with substantial injuries to her body, including bruises, bloody lacerations, and an inability to move her left arm. Because the father's rights were terminated and because the mother initially viewed herself as the statement that she "enrolled in college" the only "proof" is the assertion by her counsel that she intended to take classes to be a surgical technician in Parkersburg, West Virginia. There is no actual evidence that she started such a program. Furthermore, as far as the fact that the mother has apparently signed a lease for an apartment in Vienna, the DHHR points out that it is unknown whether such housing is suitable for these children. The DHHR maintains that the mother has not been available for home visits, which is further frustrated by the fact that she refuses to have direct contact with the DHHR and only communicates through her legal counsel. The DHHR contends that all of the mother's goals, including work and college classes, could have been achieved in Raleigh County where her children are currently living.

victim of his drug-related habits and life-style, there is obvious renewed concern that the mother may be sliding into an old pattern of behavior that is not indicative of someone seeking to stay away from environments where drug usage may be occurring. While no negative drug or alcohol screens have yet surfaced, the guardian ad litem notes several instances where required drug screens did not take place.[8] All of this adds further support to the trial court's conclusion that there was "no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future."

This Court strives to attain permanent custodial arrangements for children determined to be abused and/or neglected with as much alacrity as possible. See In Re Beth Ann B., 204 W.Va. 424, 429, 513 S.E.2d 472, 477 (1998) (recognizing need for circuit court to "act with great dispatch to bring safety, stability, security, and permanency" to lives of abused and or neglected children"). As previously discussed, the underlying abuse and neglect proceeding has been pending for nearly three years and the permanency plan for the children will once again be in a state of turmoil. See W.Va. R.P. Child Abuse & Neglect Proceed. 43 ("Permanent placement of each child shall be achieved within twelve (12) months of the final disposition order, unless the court specifically finds on the record extraordinary reasons sufficient to justify the delay."). With regard to the time frame in which final disposition of abuse and neglect cases should be made, this Court has recognized that "[a]lthough it is sometimes a difficult task, the trial court must accept the fact that the statutory limits on improvement periods (as well as our case law limiting the right to improvement periods) dictate that there comes a time for decision, because a child deserves resolution and permanency in his or her life. . . ." Amy M., 196 W.Va. at 260, 470 S.E.2d at 214. Indeed, improvement periods are "regulated, both in their allowance and in their duration, by the West Virginia Legislature, which has assumed the responsibility of implementing guidelines for child abuse and neglect proceedings generally." In re Emily, 208 W.Va. at 334-35, 540 S.E.2d at 551-52. The circuit court understood this and acted in a manner that allowed these children to remain in the stable environment in which they had lived with their paternal aunt for the past two-and-one-half years. It is unfortunate that the majority of this Court has now destroyed that stability.

[8]The guardian ad litem states that during the month of October 2014, the mother did not have drug screens for three weeks and, on January 6, 2015, the same day as her visit with her children, she missed her drug screen in Parkersburg. She informed her provider that she would test either in Parkersburg or Beckley that same day; however, she did not make arrangements to test until several days later. The guardian ad litem maintains: "As the history with [the mother] in the record before the Circuit Court was that [the mother] abused both prescription drugs and alcohol which remain in an individual's system for just a period of a few days and a missed drug screen as late as last week, the Guardian is left to speculate as to whether she is abusing drugs or alcohol again. The mere fact that [the mother] failed to make arrangements at either of the drug screening locations on the day of her visit and after telling her provider that she would [take the] test suggests a failure to act as a responsible and stable adult."

This is not a case where the mother has not had time to demonstrate her fitness as a parent. She simply has not stepped up to the plate with regard to the reunification aspect of her improvement plan. She may have had early success with her drug-related issues, but as previously stated, she ignored the long-term drug and alcohol treatment program and, according to the DHHR, she still denies having any such dependency issues.

These children deserve a safe and stable environment and that environment has been continually provided by the paternal aunt in whose home the children have been residing since the inception of this matter. For the majority now to decide it knows better than the trial court what these children need–especially in light of the trial court's finding that it would not be in the best interests of the children to be returned to their mother–is both misguided and violative of the trial court's discretion in this matter. See Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. at 239, 470 S.E.2d at 193 ("[A] reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.").

For the foregoing reasons, I respectfully dissent.

Roger D. Curry, Fairmont, for appellants.

Jay Montgomery Brown, Asst. Pros. Atty., Fairmont, for appellee.

McGRAW, Justice:

This is a child neglect case emanating from the Circuit Court of Marion County. By order entered September 21, 1983, the circuit court permanently terminated the parental rights of the appellants, D.E.S. and J.N.S., over their four children. On appeal the appellants contend that evidence does not support the termination of parental rights and that the circuit court erred in denying the appellants' motion for an improvement period prior to the entry of the order. We disagree, and we affirm the judgment of the circuit court.

These proceedings were instituted on November 5, 1982, upon the filing of a verified petition in the Circuit Court of Marion County by representatives of the West Virginia Department of Welfare. The Department sought immediate temporary custody of the appellants' four infant daughters, then ranging in age from 2 months to 3 1/2 years, on the ground that they were neglected children within the meaning of W.Va.Code § 49-1-3 (1980 Replacement Vol.).

The petition specified that the family had been referred to the Department's protective services in December 1981, and alleged a tendency on the part of the appellants to leave the jurisdiction during past investigations. By order entered the same day, the circuit court awarded the Department temporary legal custody of the children, with physical custody retained by the appellants, and appointed a guardian ad litem to represent the interests of the children.

The charge of neglect stemmed from the appellants' "inability to accept the responsibility involved in caring for their children." Exhibits attached to the petition and testimony adduced at preliminary hearings conducted on November 10, 1982 and December 9, 1982 showed that the children's father, D.E.S., then age 27, was totally disabled as a result of mental retardation and epilepsy of organic origin. D.E.S.' father, who also lived with the family, was characterized as an alcoholic and the dominant influence in the family.

The evidence also indicated that the children's mother and primary caretaker, J.N.S., then age 24, lacked fundamental parenting skills. Improper feeding habits had resulted in the hospitalization of the children for dehydration and for "failure to thrive", a condition characterized by failure to maintain normal weight gain. The youngest child had been hospitalized when she was less than a month old for choking after feeding, and the appellants' first child had died at the age of ten months after choking on a hot dog.

The Department also put on evidence to show that the appellants did not supervise or discipline the children. The older girls were allowed to roam about at will and to pick up and carry the babies. The children were often dirty and suffered from scabies and conjunctivitis. In addition, the appellants often delayed seeking necessary medical treatment for the children and frequently failed to keep the children's medical appointments. The appellants also demonstrated difficulty showing affection toward the children, and the two older girls had been classified as developmentally delayed.

Finally the evidence showed that the family had repeatedly failed to take advantage of support services, such as day care, parenting classes, homemaker services, family counseling and infant stimulation, which had been offered by the Department. Their failure to keep appointments made by the Department had resulted in the termination of the family's food stamps, AFDC benefits, and WIC coupons, which were used to buy formula for the babies.

On the basis of this evidence the Department originally recommended a three- month improvement period during which physical custody of the children would remain with the parents. In the interim between the preliminary hearings, however, the appellants' 2 1/2 year-old child was hospitalized after an injury in the home. On November 19, 1982, the Department filed an amended petition seeking immediate temporary physical custody of all four children.

A hearing was conducted that same day at which the appellants put on evidence showing that the child, in an unsupervised moment, had caught her arm in the wringer mechanism of a washing machine when she attempted to put a piece of clothing through the wringer. Although the evidence showed that the injury was serious enough to require indefinite hospitalization and possible future skin grafts, no attempt was made to call an ambulance, and the child was not transported to the hospital for approximately an hour and a half. Upon admission to the hospital, the child was dirty, had scratches, scabs and bruises on her face and had head lice. The protective services worker who investigated the incident found the home disordered, dirty and infested with cockroaches on the day of the injury. At the conclusion of the hearing, the circuit court ordered all four children removed from the home and placed in the legal and physical custody of the Department for a period not to exceed thirty days pending completion of the preliminary hearing.

When the preliminary hearing was resumed on December 9, 1982, testimony was offered to show that the appellants had improved the physical condition of the home. The evidence showed that they had fumigated the residence, painted the walls, installed carpeting and improved general housekeeping to the extent that the home provided an adequate physical environment for the children. Witnesses for the State noted, however, that the appellants continued to exhibit a general lack of knowledge about how to care for children and rarely followed up on Department recommendations for improving their parenting abilities.

At the conclusion of the preliminary hearing, the circuit court denied the appellants' motion for an improvement period for the purpose of correcting the conditions of neglect and ordered the Department's legal and physical custody to continue for a period not to exceed thirty days. The court further ordered the appellants to accept family counseling, to attend parenting and adult education classes and to submit to a psychological evaluation during this period.

Final hearings were conducted on January 7, 1983, and January 20, 1983. Testimony was offered to show the efforts of the appellants to maintain the improved physical condition of the home. It was also shown that they had complied with the conditions of the circuit court's order relating to counseling, education classes and psychological evaluations. On the witness stand, however, D.E.S. admitted that he had no idea why the Department had instituted proceedings for custody of the children, while J.N.S. explained that the proceedings were the result of their failure to keep appointments, to schedule regular meals and to spend more time with the children.

The psychologist who tested and interviewed the appellants expressed serious reservations as to the intellectual capacity of either parent to learn adequate child-rearing behavior or to acquire and maintain the parenting skills necessary to provide for the well-being of the children. He testified that both parents suffered from impaired short-term memory and had demonstrated an inability to follow instructions requiring timing and sequential skills. He also testified that the appellants' primary motivation in submitting to the circuit court's orders was their desire to have the children returned, rather than a desire to make a better home for them. He concluded from his experience in similar cases that, absent intensive training and direct supervision in the home, the appellants would revert to their former inadequate child-rearing practices once the children were returned to their custody. Department social services workers agreed with this assessment of the appellants' parenting capabilities and testified that the Department was unable to offer the type of intensive in-home training and supervision necessary to teach the appellants the proper skills.

On February 28, 1983, the guardian ad litem submitted to the court his written report of findings and recommendations. The guardian ad litem found no evidence of abuse and concluded that while the father, D.E.S., was unable to supply the children with the necessities of life, the mother, J.N.S., was capable of learning appropriate parenting behaviors. The guardian concluded, however, that neither parent would be able to provide the children with the kind of care they were receiving in the foster homes and recommended termination of the appellants' parental rights. Additional exhibits were submitted by both sides. On March 16, 1983, closing arguments were heard and the circuit court took the matter under advisement.

By letter dated September 6, 1983, the circuit court notified the appellants of his decision to terminate their parental rights. The court incorporated the findings of the guardian ad litem with the exception of the guardian's conclusion that the mother was capable of supplying the children with the necessities of life. The circuit court made a separate finding that the mother lacked the necessary basic parenting skills and concluded that the children would continue to be neglected so long as they remained in the custody of their parents.

By order dated September 21, 1983, the circuit court found that the children were neglected within the meaning of Chapter 49, Article 6 of the Code and that there was no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect could be substantially corrected in the near future. The court concluded that it was necessary for the welfare of the children to terminate the appellants' parental rights and ordered the children committed to the permanent guardianship of the Department of Human Services, See footnote 1 with full power and authority to provide for their adoption. It is from this order that the appellants appeal.

The appellants' first contention is that the circuit court erred in refusing to return the children to their custody for an improvement period for the purpose of correcting the conditions of neglect giving rise to the petition. W.Va.Code § 49-6-2(b) (1980 Replacement Vol.) permits a parent in a neglect proceeding to request, at any time prior to final hearing, an improvement period of from three to twelve months duration. The statute further provides that "[t]he court shall allow such an improvement period unless it finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial thereof, but may require temporary custody in the state department of another agency during the improvement period." The court's failure to state on the record the compelling circumstances warranting the denial of an improvement period under this section constitutes reversible error. State v. Scritchfield, W.Va., 280 S.E.2d 315 (1981). The appellants contend that there were no compelling circumstances specified by the circuit court which would justify the ruling.

The motion for an improvement period was made at the conclusion of the preliminary hearing conducted on December 9, 1982. The circuit court predicated its denial of the motion on the living conditions in the home and the appellants' total disregard, prior to the removal of the children from their physical custody, of the efforts of social service agencies to improve the conditions of neglect. The circuit court also expressed on the record strong feelings that recent efforts at ameliorating the conditions in the home would cease once the children were returned to the appellants' custody and noted the past propensity of the family to change residences and to leave the jurisdiction to avoid neglect charges.

We believe the circuit court demonstrated on the record sufficient justification for refusing to allow the appellants an improvement period. The evidence supports the conclusion that a potential danger existed to the welfare of the children if they were returned to the home. "In a case such as this where return of the child to the parents might result in their absconding the jurisdiction and removing the child from effective supervision, there are certainly compelling reasons to justify the denial of an improvement period." In re R.J.M., W.Va., 266 S.E.2d 114, 117 (1980).

The appellants' second contention is that the circuit court abused its discretion in ordering the termination of their parental rights. They assert that the court did not follow the procedures set out in W.Va.Code § 49-6-1 et seq. (1980 Replacement Vol.) and that the evidence did not warrant imposition of the most extreme disposition under the statute.

We have long recognized that the fundamental right of a natural parent to custody of his or her minor children, though constitutionally protected, is not absolute and may be terminated by the State if the parent is shown to be unfit to care for the children. In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973). The statutory procedure for terminating parental rights in child abuse and neglect cases is essentially a two-step process. In the initial phase, the circuit court is required by W.Va.Code § 49-6-2 to determine whether the child has been abused or neglected. State v. T.C., W.Va., 303 S.E.2d 685 (1983). "W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], requires the State Department of Welfare, in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove 'conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition ... by clear and convincing proof.' " Syllabus Point 1, in part, In the Interest of S.C., W.Va., 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981).

Once there has been a proper finding of abuse or neglect, the proceedings move into the dispositional phase, which is governed by W.Va.Code § 49-6-5. The statute provides a number of dispositional alternatives which the court may consider, giving precedence to the least restrictive alternative appropriate to the circumstances. Termination of parental rights, the most restrictive alternative, is authorized only "[u]pon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future, and when necessary for the welfare of the child." W.Va.Code § 49-6-5(a)(6). The State must produce clear and convincing evidence to support this finding before the court may sever the custodial rights of the natural parents. State v. Carl B., W.Va., 301 S.E.2d 864 (1983); In re Willis, supra.

The appellants do not seriously contend that the circuit court erred in finding that the children were neglected within the meaning of the statute. The petition in this case was predicated upon the appellants' apparent intellectual inability to provide basic child care. In State v. Scritchfield, supra at 321, we stated:

> We do not question that the definition of "neglected child" contained in W.Va.Code § 49-1-3 includes those children whose well-being is endangered or impaired by the inability of the parent, as the result of a mental condition, to perform the most fundamental and essential of the parental obligations--to feed, clothe, shelter, supervise, educate and provide medical care. Under such circumstances, neglect may be proved upon a showing of an ongoing condition or course of conduct which has been or is likely to be detrimental to the physical or mental well-being of the child and which the parent has been unwilling or unable to correct.

The State here presented clear and convincing evidence of "an on going condition or course of conduct" amounting to neglect on the part of the appellants at the time the petition was filed and ample evidence of their failure up to that time to correct their conduct.

The appellants do assert error, however, at the dispositional stage of the proceedings. They contend that the circuit court's order violated W.Va.Code § 49-6-5 in that no consideration was given to any less restrictive dispositional alternative than severance of the parental rights and that the State did not meet its burden of showing "no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected."

In In re R.J.M., supra, we noted that although W.Va.Code § 49-6-5 requires the court to give precedence to the least restrictive dispositional alternative, "courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened...." Syllabus Point 1, in part. We held at Syllabus Point 2:

> Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected.

Consequently the determination of whether the circuit court here properly ordered the most restrictive disposition turns on the propriety of its finding that there was no reasonable likelihood of correcting the conditions of neglect found to exist at the time the petition was filed.

As we implied in In re R.J.M., supra, to support a finding of "no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected", the circuit court must find the existence of one or more of the statutory grounds enumerated in W.Va.Code § 49-6-5(b). See footnote 2 The court here found that the appellants "have not responded to or followed through with reasonable rehabilitation efforts of social, medical, mental health, or other rehabilitative agencys [sic]", as provided by W.Va.Code § 49-6-5(b)(3).

We believe the evidence presented by the State clearly supports this finding. It is uncontroverted that for almost a year prior to the filing of the petition the appellants had repeatedly failed to avail themselves of numerous support services offered by the Department. During this period the Department prepared no less than six comprehensive rehabilitative plans to assist the parents in improving the quality of their child care, none of which was completed. Social service workers testified that although the appellants appeared receptive to their suggestions, they rarely followed up on them. Moreover, the evidence shows that the appellants' pattern of disregarding Department recommendations for improving their parenting skills continued even after the petition was filed and the children were removed from the home.

The appellants point out that they did make efforts to improve and maintain the physical condition of the home and attended family counseling sessions and adult education classes. We agree that to this extent they responded to the Department's rehabilitative efforts. The evidence also shows, however, that the appellants did not take these steps until ordered to do so by the circuit court.

In addition, the State's evidence indicated that the appellants' failure to respond to the recommendations of the Department resulted from a limited ability to comprehend the necessity to improve the quality of their child care. The psychologist testified that neither parent really understood why the Department had instituted neglect proceedings, and the appellants themselves were unable to articulate with clarity the conditions which had ultimately resulted in the removal of the children from the home. The expert testimony also indicated that the intellectual capacity of both parents was such that the services available through the Department would be ineffectual in teaching them to modify their behavior so as to provide adequate parenting for the children.

In short, the State produced clear and convincing evidence to show that not only had the appellants failed to respond to or follow through with Department efforts to correct the conditions of neglect in the past, but also that they were intellectually incapable of doing so in the future. In view of the evidence indicating a substantial probability that the conditions of neglect would recur if the children were returned to the custody of the parents, we cannot say that the circuit court abused its discretion in finding "no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect can be substantially corrected" and in terminating the appellants' parental rights pursuant to the provisions of W.Va.Code § 49-6-5.

As a final matter we note that the truly tragic aspect of this case is that the evidence indicates that the appellants bear genuine love and affection for their children. There was no evidence of any deliberate misconduct or malicious neglect. Much as we might sympathize with the appellants' feelings of loss, however, we cannot ignore the fact that they simply do not have the ability to function adequately as parents. Consequently we conclude that the State was justified in intervening in this case to protect the welfare of the children.

Accordingly, we affirm the judgment of the Circuit Court of Marion County permanently terminating the parental rights of the appellants and placing the four infant children in the permanent custody of the Department of Human Services.

Affirmed.

Footnote: 2 W.Va.Code § 49-6-5(b) states:
As used in this section, "no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected" shall mean that: (1) the parent or parents have habitually abused or are addicted to intoxicating liquors, narcotics or other dangerous drugs to the extent that proper parenting ability has been seriously impaired and the parent has not responded to or followed through with recommended and appropriate treatment which could have improved the capacity for adequate parental functioning; (2) the parent or parents have willfully refused or are presently unwilling to cooperate in the development of a reasonable foster care plan designed to lead to the child's return to the parent or parents; (3) the parent or parents have not responded to or followed through with reasonable rehabilitative efforts of social, medical, mental health or other rehabilitative agencies designed to reduce or prevent the neglect or abuse of the child, as evidenced by the continuation of substantial or repeated acts of neglect or abuse after the provision of such services; (4) the parent or parents have abandoned the child; or (5) the parent or parents have repeatedly or seriously physically abused the child.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

"W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], requires the State Department of Welfare, in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove 'conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition ... by clear and convincing proof.' The statute, however, does not specify any particular manner or mode of testimony or evidence by which the State Department of Welfare is obligated to meet this burden." Syllabus point 1, In Interest of S.C., 168 W.Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981).

Mary Beth Kershner, Asst. Atty. Gen., Charleston, for appellee.

P. Lee Clay, Fairmont, for appellants.

PER CURIAM:
This is a child neglect case emanating from the Circuit Court of Marion County. The circuit court permanently terminated the appellant's parental rights over two of her children, Carl B. and Teekonia C. On appeal the appellant contends that the court's ruling was not supported by the evidence and that the court failed to conduct the proceedings in a manner sufficient to protect her legal rights. We disagree, and we affirm the decision of the Circuit Court of Marion County.

In 1976, prior to the enactment of our present Child Welfare Act, W.Va.Code, 49-6-1, et seq. [1977], the West Virginia Department of Welfare petitioned for the temporary custody of the appellant's two children, Carl B. and Teekonia C. Hearings were held at which it was established that the appellant had neglected Teekonia C. by leaving her in the custody of an inappropriate caretaker. It was also shown that the appellant was not taking proper care of Carl B. It was ordered that the two children be committed to the temporary custody of the Department of Welfare. See footnote 1 The appellant was, however, granted court-approved improvement periods with the understanding that if she corrected certain deficiencies the children would be returned to her. See footnote 2 During the improvement periods the Department of Welfare extended extensive financial, counselling and homemaker aid to the appellant. After a time Carl B. was returned to the appellant's care, and visits by Teekonia C. were arranged with the thought of gradually returning her to the appellant's care.

Approximately two years after the Department of Welfare first became involved with Teekonia C. and Carl B., on October 27, 1978, Diana Walker, an employee of the Department of Welfare, filed a petition with the circuit court praying that the Department be granted permanent custody of Teekonia C. The petition alleged that:

> "[T]he mother took the child out of the home in the middle of the night without proper clothing and the mother has failed to maintain the home in a healthful condition; that the condition of the home is so deplorable in that she allows garbage and food to build up in the home and upon the floors and furniture and that the condition of the home with said food attracted rats and roaches which effect the health and welfare of the infant child; ..."

The petition also noted that Carl B. was in the appellant's care and that the caring and supervision of him was beyond the appellant's parenting abilities. Later in January, 1979, a social worker visited the appellant's home and found that there was no food in it suitable for Carl B. She thereupon petitioned that permanent custody of Carl B. be transferred to the Department of Welfare.

The proceedings for the termination of custody of the two children were consolidated, and hearings were held on February 8, 1979, April 3, 1979, and May 11, 1979. The appellant was represented by counsel at all the hearings, and guardians ad litem were appointed to represent the interests of the children. See footnote 3 At the conclusion of the hearings the court found:

> "As to the ultimate issue the Court is of the opinion that there is no reasonable likelihood that the neglect of the children by the parents can be substantially corrected in the near future and further the Court believes the welfare of the children demands that all parental rights be terminated and permanent custody be committed to the West Virginia Department of Welfare with the right to consent to their adoption by some responsible person or agency."

By way of assignment of error, counsel raises a number of rhetorical questions, which essentially present the question of whether the trial court's ruling was supported by the evidence. See footnote 4 The thrust of the argument of appellant's counsel is that the State failed to prove that there existed a situation of imminent danger to Carl B. and Teekonia C. at the time of the hearings. He argues that proof of such imminent danger was necessary before the court could properly terminate the appellant's parental rights. In taking that position he relies on the provisions of W.Va.Code, 49-6-3 [1977].

W.Va.Code, 49-6-3 [1977], authorizes the immediate, temporary taking of custody of a child by the Department of Welfare when there exists an imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child. In State ex rel. Miller v. Locke, 162 W.Va. 946, 253 S.E.2d 540 (1979), we recognized that it allows a taking only in an emergency situation in which the welfare or the life of the child is endangered. However, W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977], governs the final disposition of cases of child neglect or abuse. It provides, in relevant part:

> "(a) Following a determination pursuant to section two [§ 49-6-2] of this article, [That is, a finding that a child is abused or neglected] the court may request from the state department information about the history, physical condition and present situation of the child. The court shall forthwith proceed to disposition giving both the petitioner and respondents an opportunity to be heard....
> "(6) Upon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future, and when necessary for the welfare of the child, terminate the parental or custodial rights and responsibilities and commit the child to the permanent guardianship of the state department or a licensed child welfare agency...."

In the proceeding before us, which involved the question of permanent termination of parental rights W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977], rather than W.Va.Code, 49-6-3 [1977], governed. W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977], required that the court find that Carl B. and Teekonia C. had been neglected or abused and that there was no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse would be made in the near future. The court made the finding that the children had been neglected and that there was no reasonable likelihood that the conditions would be corrected in the near future. There was no requirement that the court find that the children were in imminent danger.

After carefully reviewing the transcripts of the hearings conducted by the circuit court and the other documents contained in the record, we conclude that the court's findings were supported by the evidence although a portion of the evidence was conflicting. The Department of Welfare's attention was first directed to the children in 1976 when the woman to whom the appellant had committed the care of Teekonia C. was observed changing her diapers on the floor of a public restroom. The woman had placed no padding under the six- week-old child who was observed to be dirty and afflicted with sores. An inspection of the appellant's home revealed generally unsanitary conditions. Teekonia C. and Carl B. were temporarily committed to the Department of Welfare. After that happened the appellant was granted improvement periods, and extensive financial homemaking, and counselling services were offered to her. In spite of the assistance of the Department of Welfare, the appellant was unable to improve the condition of her home on a consistent basis. One welfare worker, Diana Walker, described the home as follows:

> "She could have it appropriately clean or she could have it very bad, and unfortunately it was usua lly bad, until the end when she thought we were coming back to court and she would tr y to m ake im provements. Usually there were dirty dishes, garbage dum ped outside the door, roaches, garbage swept up on the floor and left for a week at a time. No sheets or blankets for the beds. Just generally dirty and I was surprised she didn' t even m ake an attempt to keep it up, try to make it better."

Another witness testified that the garbage that the appellant left in her house drew rats. One witness, Sandra Feorene, described the house more than two years after the Department of Welfare began assisting the appellant:

> "At the time I was there, it was pretty much in a mess. There were two dogs running around at the tim e and the fl oor area, the first level level, there was dog waste and scraps of food."

In addition to evidence that the appellant failed to keep her home in a sanitary condition Diana Walker testified:

> "Carl was im properly clothed for the wi nter. It would be a very cold morning where you would need a coat and he would have on a T-shirt, I don't feel he was properly fed all the tim e. She would be irresponsible in letting her assistance case be closed a nd food stam ps stopped. Carl didn' t have all of his immunizations. She would tend to put things off."

Carol Starkey, a woman acquainted with the appellant, testified that normally the appellant did not have much food after the 20th of the month. She ascribed the situation to the appellant's being good-hearted and having many friends, but "It seemed like whenever she would run out of food, everybody would get up and leave and her and the children would be without." Shortly before the final hearings in the case a welfare worker found that the appellant had no food in the house suitable for Carl B. and that she had no definite plans for getting any. As summarized by one welfare worker:

> "During the time I worked with J..., she wasn't really interested in helping herself or trying to im prove things for her children. She wasn' t able to provide proper care for Carl and visits with Teekie were pretty bad."

In Syllabus point 6 of In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973), we stated:

> "The standard of proof required to support a court order limiting or terminating parental rights to custody of minor children is clear, cogent and convincing proof."

That standard has been incorporated in our present Child Welfare Act, W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], which we recognized in Syllabus point 1 of In Interest of S.C., 168 W.Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981):

> "W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980] , requires the State Department of Welfare, in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove 'conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition ... by clear and convincing proof.' The statute, however, does not specify any particular manner or mode of testimony or evidence by which the State Department of Welfare is obligated to meet this burden."

We believe that in the case before us the State established by clear and convincing evidence that the appellant neglected Teekonia C. and Carl B.

In addition to asserting that the circuit court's conclusions were not supported by the evidence, the appellant claims that there were several procedural defects in the proceeding. First she claims that W.Va.Code, 49- 6-1(a) [1977], requires that the petition be verified by the oath of some credible person having knowledge of the situation and that that was not done. We have examined the petition instituting the proceeding to terminate the appellant's right over Teekonia C., and we note that it was verified by Diana Walker, a welfare worker who worked extensively with the appellant. The petition for change of the permanent custody of Carl B. is not in the record, but an earlier petition for the temporary custody of him was likewise verified by Diana Walker. Secondly, the appellant argues that the trial court failed to appoint her an attorney within the time period required by W.Va.Code, 49- 6-2(a) [1977], when Teekonia C. and Carl B. were first taken by the Department of Welfare in 1976. It appears that Teekonia C. and Carl B. were first taken in 1976 in an emergency situation.

In re Willis, supra, recognized that in such a situation the immediate appointment of counsel was not necessary. The record of the 1976 proceeding is not before us, but an order dated October 26, 1976, which related to the hearing following the emergency taking shows that the appellant was represented by a court-appointed attorney. We, therefore, find that the appellant's assertions regarding procedural defects are not supported factually.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment of the Circuit Court of Marion County is affirmed.

Affirmed.

Footnote: 1 Prior to enactment of the 1977 Child Welfare Act, In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973) delineated the standards for taking children in child-neglect situations.

Footnote: 2 It appears that the appellant was granted at least four improvement periods--under agreements entered into on September 27, 1976; June 17, 1977; June, 1978; and September 11, 1978.

Footnote: 3 At the times of the hearings, the whereabouts of the fathers of Teekonia C. and Carl B. were unknown. The representation of their interests is not an issue in the case.

Footnote: 4 Among the appellant's assignments of error are:
a. "Can the State take children from parents when it does not prove that the children are abused, neglected or in imminent danger?"
b. "Does the State have a right to keep children it has removed from parents on the basis of alleged neglect, abuse or imminent danger, when the alleged condition has been corrected?"
c. "Does the law and justice require that if a petitioner misrepresents the facts to the Court and causes the children to be removed that such children be returned to the parents once the true facts disprove the misrepresentation?"

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia
In the Interest of CARLITA B.
No. 19899
Submitted Feb. 5, 1991
Decided July 29, 1991
Concurring Opinion of Chief Justice Miller July 31, 1991

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security. Consequently, in order to assure that all entities are actively pursuing the goals of the child abuse and neglect statutes, the Administrative Director of this Court is hereby directed to work with the clerks of the circuit court to develop systems to monitor the status and progress of child neglect and abuse cases in the courts.

2. " ' "A parent has the natural right to the custody of his or her infant child, and, unless the parent is an unfit person because of misconduct, neglect, immorality, abandonment, or other dereliction of duty, or has waived such right, or by agreement or otherwise has permanently transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody, the right of the parent to the custody of his or her infant child will be recognized and enforced by the courts." Syllabus, State ex rel. Kiger v. Hancock, 153 W.Va. 404, 168 S.E.2d [798] (1969).' Syl. pt. 2, Hammack v. Wise, 158 W.Va. 343, 211 S.E.2d 118 (1975)." Syl. Pt. 1, Nancy Viola R. v. Randolph W., 177 W.Va. 710, 356 S.E.2d 464 (1987).

3. "Under W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), when an improvement period is authorized, then the court by order shall require the Department of Human Services to prepare a family case plan pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3 (1984)." Syl. Pt. 3, State ex rel. West Virginia Dept. of Human *616 368 Serv. v. Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987).

4. In formulating the improvement period and family case plans, courts and social service workers should cooperate to provide a workable approach for the resolution of family problems which have prevented the child or children from receiving appropriate care from their parents. The formulation of the improvement period and family case plans should therefore be a consolidated, multi-disciplinary effort among the court system, the parents, attorneys, social service agencies, and any other helping personnel involved in assisting the family.

5. The clear import of the statute [West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(d)] is that matters involving the abuse and neglect of children shall take precedence over almost every other matter with which a court deals on a daily basis, and it clearly reflects the goal that such proceedings must be resolved as expeditiously as possible.

6. At the conclusion of the improvement period, the court shall review the performance of the parents in attempting to attain the goals of the improvement period and shall, in the court's discretion, determine whether the conditions of the improvement period have been satisfied and whether sufficient improvement has been made in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child.

7. "As a general rule the least restrictive alternative regarding parental rights to custody of a child under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977] will be employed; however, courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened...." Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

8. Prior acts of violence, physical abuse, or emotional abuse toward other children are relevant in a termination of parental rights proceeding, are not violative of W.Va.R.Evid. 404(b), and a decision regarding the admissibility thereof shall be within the sound discretion of the trial court.

9. "In cases where there is a termination of parental rights, the circuit court should consider whether continued association with siblings in other placements is in the child's best interests, and if such continued association is in such child's best interests, the court should enter an appropriate order to preserve the rights of siblings to continued contact." Syl. Pt. 4, In re James M., 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991).

Barbara L. Baxter, West Virginia Legal Services, Wheeling, for appellant.

Mario J. Palumbo, Atty. Gen., Jeffrey K. Matherly, Asst. Atty. Gen., for State of W.Va.

WORKMAN, Justice:

Justina N. See footnote 1 appeals from an order of the Circuit Court of Ohio County which terminated her parental rights to her daughter, Carlita B. The circuit court found that the appellant was guilty of abuse and neglect of Carlita and that there was no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect could be corrected in the near future. The appellant contends that the circuit court erred in terminating her parental rights because 1) neither the Department of Human Services (hereinafter "D.H.S.") See footnote 2 nor the specific D.H.S. caseworker assigned to the case made a reasonable effort to reunify the family as required by W.Va.Code § 49-6-5 (1988); 2) the assigned D.H.S. caseworker failed to develop a realistic case plan for the appellant as required by W.Va.Code § 49-6D-3 (1984); 3) the circuit court erred in finding that the appellant suffered from erratic behavior and outbursts of anger to the extent that such behavior made her incapable of exercising proper parenting skills; and 4) the circuit court erred in finding that the appellant abused her children other than Carlita because such evidence was (a) not relevant to this proceeding and should have been excluded, and (b) in the alternative, was not established by clear and convincing evidence. We disagree with the contentions of the appellant and affirm the order of the Circuit Court of Ohio County.

I. FACTS

The appellant is the mother of four children. Her parental rights to her oldest child, Justin, were terminated when the child was approximately three years of age, based upon the appellant's abusive actions toward the child. She apparently beat him on the legs and back, pulled out large areas of his hair, and threatened, in the presence of a D.H.S. caseworker, to drown both the oldest child and her second child, Christopher. See footnote 3

At the initiation of this action regarding Carlita, born on October 22, 1985, the appellant was living with Robert B., Carlita's father. On March 27, 1987, Dixie Laudermilt, a caseworker for the D.H.S., filed a petition to have Carlita removed from the home. The petition was based upon the following: (1) an alleged March 25, 1986, incident in which Robert B. reported that the appellant had thrown five-month-old Carlita onto a bed in a violent manner; (2) a November 14, 1986, incident in which the Wheeling Police were called to the appellant's residence to investigate a domestic dispute and discovered a red hand print on Carlita's back See footnote 4 (Robert B. and the appellant both admitted that the appellant had slapped the child, then thirteen months old, subsequent to an argument between Robert B. and the appellant); (3) allegations that the appellant had taken the child to bars in the late night and early morning hours; (4) allegations that the appellant would occasionally fail to feed Carlita until Robert B. returned from work in the evening due to the appellant's lack of patience in feeding the young child (Once Robert B. returned from work, he would allegedly feed the child for the first time of the day); (5) allegations by neighbors that they had heard the appellant screaming at the child and had heard the child fall out of its crib.

The appellant contends that Ms. Laudermilt's decision to petition for termination of the appellant's parental rights to Carlita was also premised upon the deteriorating relationship between the appellant and Ms. Laudermilt. Ms. Laudermilt had become acquainted with the appellant's family while Justin and Christopher were both residing in the household. Ms. Laudermilt had been instrumental in removing Justin from the home and had been given the responsibility of attempting to reintegrate Christopher into the home. While Ms. Laudermilt had visited the appellant's home with Christopher, complete reintegration had not been accomplished. During a visit in January 1987, the appellant became angry with Ms. Laudermilt when Ms. Laudermilt indicated that the visitation period had expired. As Ms. Laudermilt attempted to remove Christopher from the appellant's arms, the appellant kicked Ms. Laudermilt in the stomach. Ms. Laudermilt filed assault charges, and the appellant was jailed for two to three hours. When the appellant explained that she was pregnant, she was released from jail, and Ms. Laudermilt signed a mental hygiene petition to have her involuntarily committed to a behavioral health center.

A hearing on the petition for termination of the appellant's parental rights to Carlita was held on April 23, 1987. Testimony was elicited from Ms. Laudermilt; Bea Lahita, a homemaker services worker who had assisted the appellant with such household tasks as planning meals and preparing budgets; Gloria Johnston, a D.H.S. worker who had previously worked with the appellant; and Wheeling Police Officer Raymond LaRue, the officer who saw the red hand print on Carlita's back. At the conclusion of the presentation of evidence, the appellant was granted a six-month improvement period pursuant to W.Va.Code § 49-6-2(b) (1984). See footnote 5 Physical and legal custody of Carlita was given to the D.H.S. with supervised visitation permitted. The D.H.S. prepared and submitted a family case plan as required by W.Va.Code § 49-6D-3. See footnote 6 Two plans, dated November 20, 1987, and August 25, 1988, were formulated. See footnote 6

II. RESULTS OF FIRST IMPROVEMENT PERIOD

A hearing on the success of the improvement period was held on November 10, 1987. Ms. Laudermilt testified for the D.H.S. and explained that she had been involved with Carlita and her family during the improvement period which was originally granted on April 28, 1987. Ms. Laudermilt explained that there had been daytime visitation between the child and her parents two to three times per month. Ms. Laudermilt stated that the D.H.S. had experienced no difficulty during the home visitation and explained that the appellant and Robert B. had taken Carlita to the playground and had hosted a birthday party for her. With regard to gradual reintegration back into parental custody, Ms. Laudermilt stated that the prior visits had been of two to three hours duration and suggested that subsequent visitation be increased to six to eight hours with D.H.S. workers present 50 to 60 percent of the time. Ms. Laudermilt testified that Carlita "takes a while to make up to [the appellant and Robert B.] and it will be an hour before she will even go to them and play, especially with Robert."

Ms. Laudermilt also discussed physical confrontations and arguments between the appellant and Robert B., with the appellant being physically aggressive toward Robert B. Ms. Laudermilt explained that she and Bea Lahita had both received telephone calls from the morning to late hours of the night during the previous six months in which Robert B. had complained that the appellant was fighting with him or locking him out of the house. Ms. Lahita expressed her opinion that the relationship between the parties had not significantly improved and that it would not be in the best interest of the child to return to the home at that time. At the conclusion of the hearing, the lower court stated that due to the lack of updated psychological reports and evaluations as a basis to determine whether Carlita would be safe in the home environment, the improvement period would be extended for an additional six months.

An evaluation of the appellant and Robert B. was conducted by social worker Laurie Taylor, and a report dated December 3, 1987, was submitted. Ms. Taylor found that the appellant and Robert B. lacked a clear understanding of the legal ramifications of Carlita's placement and that the appellant and Robert B. associated her placement with the ongoing personality problems between the appellant and Ms. Laudermilt. Ms. Taylor found the appellant and Robert B. to be angry, bitter, and disillusioned about the custody situation. The thrust of Ms. Taylor's report was that the parties' home was adequate for raising children and that they possessed all necessary furniture. Home visitation by Ms. Taylor was varied as to time and notice, and no problems were encountered with the couple or with neighbors. Ms. Taylor noted the conflict and adversarial relationship between the appellant and Ms. Laudermilt, recognized that such a relationship made appropriate work with the family difficult, and suggested a change of D.H.S. caseworkers.

Dr. Charles Hewitt, psychologist, also evaluated the appellant and Robert B. and submitted several reports to the D.H.S. Dr. Hewitt had been involved with the family through termination proceedings held on behalf of Justin and had previously evaluated the parties. He reported that the appellant was functioning in the borderline range with some indication of low average cognitive functioning, but stressed that she was not mentally retarded. Dr. Hewitt noted serious personality difficulties suffered by the appellant with noticeable abusiveness and insensitivity. He also stated that the appellant loves her children but has personality problems which interfere with her ability to manage their difficult behavior. He recognized the adversarial relationship between the appellant and Ms. Laudermilt and stated that such conflict may interfere with D.H.S. attempts to assist the family. Dr. Hewitt recommended the continuing use of homemaker services and suggested that an effort be made to reintegrate Christopher and Carlita into the household.

Dr. Dennis J. Maceiko, psychologist, also evaluated the appellant and submitted reports dated April 1986 and October 1988. See footnote 8 In his first report, Dr. Maceiko found that the appellant had a very low frustration level and was easily agitated. He felt uncomfortable allowing the appellant to have custody of Justin or Christopher and also felt that, due to the appellant's intense explosions, Carlita's safety was in jeopardy while she remained in the home. Dr. Maceiko's second report, dated October 5, 1988, was based upon a July 16, 1987, visit with the appellant and Robert B. Dr. Maceiko noted anger and poor impulse control in the appellant. He stated that she quickly varied from cooperative to quite irritable during the interview, that she had difficulty dealing with stress, and that her frustration tolerance level was very low.

III. RESULTS OF SECOND IMPROVEMENT PERIOD

A hearing marking the conclusion of the second improvement period was scheduled for June 17, 1988. Due to the nonappearance of the appellant, the hearing was continued to July 26, 1988. See footnote 9 At the July 26, 1988 hearing, Ms. Laudermilt again testified regarding the appellant's lack of cooperation and apparent inability to control her emotional outbursts. Specifically, Ms. Laudermilt testified that the appellant had been provided with counselling during home visitation regarding necessary care for Carlita. Ms. Laudermilt stated that the home visits continued until approximately December 1987, "when things became more anxious ..." for the appellant. Ms. Laudermilt described "more screaming and hollering during home visits. [The appellant] was with Bobby [Robert B.] in the evenings and would fight and physically assault him." Ms. Laudermilt also explained that the appellant declined to participate in parenting classes offered through Dr. Hewitt, Dr. Maceiko, or Northern Panhandle Behavioral Health Center. Ms. Laudermilt testified that in approximately March 1988, she accompanied the appellant to a mothers' group organized for children and family services, but that the appellant left during the session and refused to return for future sessions.

Ms. Laudermilt described typical home visits as consisting of very little physical or verbal contact between the child and the parents. Most contact which was accomplished had been initiated by the D.H.S. workers rather than the parents. With regard to cooperation with suggestions of the D.H.S., Ms. Laudermilt testified that she had "seen a decline in improvement on [the appellant's] part for the fact that there is no cooperation there." Ms. Laudermilt provided examples of several attempts at visitation where the parents had overslept or had been up late watching television the night before and failed to appear. Ms. Laudermilt explained that the parents had sufficient prior notice of scheduled visits and still failed to appear. Ms. Laudermilt testified that the appellant had only visited with her children twice from January 1988 through July 1988. With regard to visitation, Ms. Laudermilt explained:

> Whenever we go at 9:00 o' clock [sic] 9:30, they would not be out of bed. When it was in the afternoon, say like 1:00 o' clock [sic], they would be there, and that usually was the times where Tina would becom e irrational and start scream ing and hollering at B obby or the kids or m yself or the other worker or all of us, and the ch ildren would be taken from the home at that point, and Bobby would supervise or walk with us to the car to take the kids to the car.

When asked what precipitated the appellant's outbursts, Ms. Laudermilt explained that it could be small or inconsequential things (e.g. "it could be the fact that Carlita would not eat the rest of her cereal, that she would start becoming angry, and as things continued to go on, she would become more angry.")

Due to lack of time to present remaining witnesses during the July 26, 1988, hearing, the matter was continued to August 1, 1988. During the August 1, 1988, hearing, Bea Lahita testified that she began working with the appellant and Robert B. in January 1985 as a homemaker attempting to teach them cooking and budgeting skills. Ms. Lahita reported that she had experienced problems with the appellant or Robert B. calling her late at night once or twice a week with complaints of fighting with one another. Ms. Lahita also testified that she had attempted to schedule counselling for the appellant and Robert B., but that they had refused to participate. Ms. Lahita further stated that the appellant had refused to take medication which had been prescribed to control her anger. See footnote 10

Jamie Wharton, an outreach worker at the Florence Crittenton Home, also testified at the August 1, 1988, hearing regarding her involvement with the parties. The D.H.S. referred the parties to the Florence Crittenton Home for assistance in parenting skills, teaching basic skills such as interaction, diapering, feeding, and temperature taking. Ms. Wharton testified that the workers attempted home visits two to three times per month for such instruction. Although the parties cooperated with the workers immediately after Daniel's birth to receive assistance with his medical problems prior to his removal from the home, cooperation decreased significantly thereafter. From January 1985 through August 1988, the workers continued to attempt visitation with the parties in order to provide homemaker services, but frequently found no one at home.

At the conclusion of the August 1, 1988, hearing, the lower court indicated that it would render a decision after reading the files and the psychological evaluations. The court also ordered counsel for each party to submit a written argument stating their respective positions as to disposition of the matter. The court further stated that the matter would be taken under advisement pending the filing of written arguments.

On January 30, 1989, the lower court entered an order terminating the appellant's parental rights to Carlita. The court found that the appellant was guilty of abuse and neglect of Carlita and that there was no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect could be substantially corrected in the near future. See footnote 11 The court held that the appellant had failed to comply with the family case plan, had failed to appropriately participate in visitation, suffered from erratic behavior and outbursts of anger, and had a history of causing physical abuse to her infant children. Due to a delay in producing transcripts, the appeal period was extended for an additional four months by order dated September 25, 1989, and the final order from which the appellant now appeals was re-entered on January 24, 1990. The petition for appeal was filed on October 3, 1990, over eight months after the re-entry of the termination order. This Court accepted the appeal on December 5, 1990, and expedited oral argument to February 5, 1991.

IV. PROCEDURAL DELAY

Before addressing the merits of this case, we examine the long and tortured procedural history this matter has endured. The petition to terminate parental rights in this case was filed on March 27, 1987. The first hearing on the matter was held on April 23, 1987, wherein an improvement period was granted; another hearing was held on November 10, 1987, wherein the improvement period was extended six months and psychological reports were ordered updated; additional hearings were held on July 26, 1988, and August 1, 1988, and parental rights were finally terminated on January 30, 1989. Due to problems in acquiring a transcript, the final appealable order was re-entered almost a year later on January 24, 1990. Thus, even prior to the appeal to this Court, Carlita remained in limbo for almost three years during the most formative stages of her young life.

Although Carlita's brother Christopher's case is not presently before the Court, its procedural progression is even more egregious. He was removed from the home as an infant in 1984 based upon the appellant's abuse of his brother Justin. It took until November 20, 1987, for the lower court to determine that he should be reintegrated into the home. The last visit between Christopher and his parents occurred in March 1989, and no requests for visitation were received after that time. Christopher has resided with his present foster family from March 1987 to the present. A hearing on Christopher's disposition has been scheduled for August 16, 1991. This child has now been in foster care for almost seven years with no real resolution of his future.

Such protracted procedural histories are far too common a phenomenon in child abuse and neglect cases, as well as other child custody matters. Several cases with which we have dealt have involved similar extended periods of time without any real resolution for the child.

In our recent opinion in In the Matter of Scottie D., 185 W.Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214 (1991), the original allegation of abuse and neglect was filed on February 11, 1985. Following proceedings in the matter, an order was entered on March 17, 1989, concluding that the appellee had not abused his children. Thus, the final order, from which appeal was taken, was not entered until over four years after the neglect proceeding was initiated.

In Department of Human Services v. La Rea Ann C.L., 175 W.Va. 330, 332 S.E.2d 632 (1985), a child born in 1980 was voluntarily relinquished by her mother shortly after birth and resided in foster care for four years pending final resolution of a subsequent attempt to revoke the relinquishment of parental rights. We recognized in La Rea Ann, that "[c]hild custody cases certainly should be decided promptly. Regardless of who is responsible for the delay in this case, the child is the unfortunate victim." Id. 178 W.Va. at 337 n. 8, 332 S.E.2d at 638 n. 8.

In State v. Scritchfield, 167 W.Va. 683, 280 S.E.2d 315 (1981), the Department of Welfare had petitioned to remove three children from the custody of their mother in June 1976. The two older children were returned in 1977, but the youngest child remained in foster care in the temporary custody of the Department of Welfare. 167 W.Va. at 686, 280 S.E.2d at 318. On September 1, 1978, the Department of Welfare sought to have the youngest child declared a neglected child, citing the medical condition of the mother and the fact that the child had been in foster care since 1976. Id. 167 W.Va. at 684, 280 S.E.2d at 317. On June 6, 1979, the court finally entered an order finding the child to be neglected and terminating the parental rights of the parents. Id. 167 W.Va. at 687-688, at 319. Again, we find an approximate three-year period in which the child's disposition remained unresolved.

Certainly many delays are occasioned by the fact that troubled human relationships and aggravated parenting problems are not remedied overnight. The law properly recognizes that rights of natural parents enjoy a great deal of protection and that one of the primary goals of the social services network and the courts is to give aid to parents and children in an effort to reunite them.

The bulk of the most aggravated procedural delays, however, are occasioned less by the complexities of mending broken people and relationships than by the tendency of these types of cases to fall through the cracks in the system. The long procedural delays in this and most other abuse and neglect cases considered by this Court in the last decade indicate that neither the lawyers nor the courts are doing an adequate job of assuring that children--the most voiceless segment of our society--aren't left to languish in a limbo-like state during a time most crucial to their human development.

As explained in J. Goldstein, A. Freud & J. Solnit, Beyond the Best Interests of the Child 32-33 (1973), > Continuity of relationships, surroundi ngs and environm ental influence are essential for a child' s normal developm ent. Since they do not play the same role in later life, their im portance is often underrated by the adult world.

> Physical, emotional, intellectual, so cial, and m oral growth does not happen without causing the child inevitable intern al difficulties. The instability of all mental processes during the period of development needs to be offset by stability and uninterrupted support from ex ternal sources. Smooth growth > is arrested or disrupted when upheaval s and changes in the external world are added to the internal ones. See footnote 12

This is especially true during the first three years of life. Burton L. White, Ph.D., in his book, The First Three Years of Life (1985), begins his preface as follows:

> After seventeen years of research on how hum an beings acquire their abilities, I have become convinced that it is to the first three years of life that we should now turn most of our attention. My own studies, as well as the work of m any others, have clearly indicated that the experiences of those first years are far more important than we had previously thought. In their simple everyday activities, infa nts and toddlers form the foundations of all later development.

In the first chapter of her book, The Critical Years: A Guide for Dedicated Parents (1984), Doris E. Durrell, Ph.D., explains the following:

> Throughout my years of experience in raising children and treating children in a clinical setting, I have been c ontinually impressed with the degree to which personality has been formed by the time a child is three years old. By this time, certain positive behavior s will have been established which will continue to bring your child pos itive responses, or negative behaviors may be established which will cause your child problems with peers and adults.

Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security. Consequently, in order to assure that all entities are actively pursuing the goals of the child abuse and neglect statutes, the Administrative Director of this Court is hereby directed to work with the clerks of the circuit court to develop systems to monitor the status and progress of child neglect and abuse cases in the courts. Whether a simple tickler file system or an enhancement to a computerized case monitoring system, some means of systematic review of child neglect and abuse cases must be established. Otherwise, the statutory time frames that govern their processing and the mandatory, periodic status reports that must be filed with the court are too easily overlooked. If such safeguards are rendered meaningless by a failure or inability to monitor cases, neglected and abused children may become lost in the very system designed to rescue them.

V. THE PROCESS OF TERMINATION

The standard for determining the fitness of a parent to maintain custody of his child was recently reiterated in syllabus point 1 of Nancy Viola R. v. Randolph W., 177 W.Va. 710, 356 S.E.2d 464 (1987) (quoting Syl. Pt. 2, Hammack v. Wise, 158 W.Va. 343, 211 S.E.2d 118 (1975)). We stated the following:

> 'A parent has the natural right to the custody of his or her infant child, and, unless the parent is an unfit pers on because of m isconduct, neglect, immorality, abandonment, or other derelic tion of duty, or has waived such right, or by agreem ent or otherwis e has permanently transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody, the right of the parent to the custody of his or her infant child w ill be recognized and enforced by the courts. Syllabus, State ex rel. Kiger v. Hancock, 153 W.Va. 404, 168 S.E.2d [798] (1969).'

West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) (1988) governs the procedure for termination of parental rights and unequivocally states that a parent's rights may be terminated "[u]pon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future, and when necessary for the welfare of the child...."

The appellant contends that the D.H.S. failed to make a reasonable effort to reunify her family, pursuant to W.Va.Code § 49-6-5, and failed to develop a realistic family case plan as required by W.Va.Code § 49-6D-3. See footnote 13 The appellant requested and was granted a six-month improvement period, in accordance with W.Va.Code § 49-6-2(b). She was later granted a second six-month improvement period. As we stated in syllabus point 3 of State ex rel. West Virginia Dept. of Human Serv. v. Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987), "[u]nder W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), when an improvement period is authorized, then the court by order shall require the Department of Human Services to prepare a family case plan pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3 (1984)." Such plans were prepared for the appellant and filed with the circuit court in this case. The purpose of the family case plan "is to clearly set forth an organized, realistic method of identifying family problems and the logical steps to be used in resolving or lessening these problems." Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. at 693, 356 S.E.2d at 186 (quoting W.Va.Code § 49-6D-3(a)).

The D.H.S. certainly could have acted with greater dispatch in preparing the first family case plan, for it was not completed until some seven months after the beginning of the first improvement period. However, the appellant wasn't harmed as a result of this delay both because D.H.S. did take immediate steps to offer services and because the improvement period was extended an additional six months. Such delays do, however, always harm the child, as the significance of a six-month period in the first three years of life must once again be viewed as an extremely vital time in the course of a child's human development.

In formulating the improvement period and family case plans, courts and social service workers should cooperate to provide a workable approach for the resolution of family problems which have prevented the child or children from receiving appropriate care from their parents. The formulation of the improvement period and family case plans should therefore be a consolidated, multidisciplinary effort among the court system, the parents, attorneys, See footnote 14 social service agencies, and any other helping personnel involved in assisting the family. The goal should be the development of a program designed to assist the parent(s) in dealing with any problems which interfere with his ability to be an effective parent and to foster an improved relationship between parent and child with an eventual restoration of full parental rights a hoped-for result. The improvement period and family case plans must establish specific measures for the achievement of these goals, as an improvement period must be more than a mere passage of time. It is a period in which the D.H.S. and the court should attempt to facilitate the parent's success, but wherein the parent must understand that he bears a responsibility to demonstrate sufficient progress and improvement to justify return to him of the child.

Subsequent to the initial formulation of the improvement plan and family case plans, it is imperative that the progress of the parent(s) toward the achievement of enumerated goals be monitored closely. As provided in W.Va.Code § 49-6-2(d), proceedings filed under the child abuse or neglect provisions > shall, to the extent practicable, be gi ven priority over any other civil action before the court, except proceedings under article two-A [§ 48-2A-1 et seq.], chapter forty-eight of this C ode [prevention of domestic violence] and actions in which trial is in pr ogress. Any petition filed under the provisions of this article shall be docketed immediately upon filing. Any hearing to be held at the end of any im provement pe riod and any other hearing to be held during any proc eedings under the provisions of this article shall be held as nearly as pr acticable on successive days and, with respect to said hearing to be held at the end of an improvement period, shall be held as close in time as possibl e after the end of said im provement period.

The clear import of the statute is that matters involving the abuse and neglect of children shall take precedence over almost every other matter with which a court deals on a daily basis, and it clearly reflects the goal that such proceedings must be resolved as expeditiously as possible.

During the improvement period, the status of the child(ren) and the progress of the parent(s) in satisfying the conditions of the improvement period should be monitored by the circuit court on a monthly basis. To the extent possible, such review should also incorporate the multi-disciplinary approach, with social workers and other helping personnel present in the court with attorneys and parties to review progress and assure the program is being followed and improvement being made. See footnote 15 At the conclusion of the improvement period, the court shall review the performance of the parents in attempting to attain the goals of the improvement period and shall, in the court's discretion, determine whether the conditions of the improvement period have been satisfied and whether sufficient improvement has been made in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child.

As we explained in West Virginia Dept. of Human Serv. v. Peggy F., 184 W.Va. 60, 64, 399 S.E.2d 460, 464 (1990), it is possible for an individual to show "compliance with specific aspects of the case plan" while failing "to improve ... [the] overall attitude and approach to parenting." Thus, a judgment regarding the success of an improvement period is within the court's discretion regardless of whether or not the individual has completed all suggestions or goals set forth in family case plans.

> The improvement period is granted to allow the parent an opportunity to remedy the existing problems. The case plan simply provides an approach to solving them. As is clear from the language of the statute, ... the ultimate goal is restoration of a stable family environment, not simply meeting the requirements of the case plan.

In the present case, two family case plans, dated November 20, 1987, and August 25, 1988, were formulated to assist the appellant. The appellant contends that the plans were unrealistic and that the success of the plans was dependent upon Ms. Laudermilt, with whom the appellant maintained an adverse relationship. The appellant bases her contention that the plans were unrealistic on the fact that the two psychologists involved in this matter, Dr. Hewitt and Dr. Maceiko, made recommendations for treatment of the appellant which were not specifically included in the case plan. Dr. Maceiko, for instance, recommended in his April 10, 1986, report that the appellant receive psychotherapy and chemotherapy for control of her violent impulses. See footnote 16 He also stated that the appellant would not be a good candidate for parenting groups "simply because of the many problems that she has to contend with-- intellectual, poor impulse control, stress management problem, etc."

Dr. Hewitt, however, explained in his April 30, 1988, report that "psychotherapy or counselling per se is not likely to be useful to [the appellant]." Dr. Hewitt further noted that the conflict between the appellant and Ms. Laudermilt seriously interfered with the development of a meaningful plan to attempt to reintegrate the children back into the household. Dr. Hewitt further recommended in his April 30, 1988, report that meaningful attempts be made to reintegrate Christopher and Carlita into the household and to permit homemaker services to continue.

The appellant argues that the D.H.S., in formulating the family case plans, ignored the suggestions of the psychologists. Despite Dr. Maceiko's opinion that the appellant was not a good candidate for parenting groups, for instance, the case plan required the appellant to attend anger control group meetings, parental group classes, play therapy, and parenting assistance classes.

Upon review of the plans and the reports of the psychologists, we fail to discern any unfairness in the family case plans. They were realistic and appropriate in their attempts to address the particular needs of the family. Reports rendered by psychologists are certainly of assistance to a court in determining the psychological capacity of an individual to raise a child and of assistance to the D.H.S. in formulating the tactics to be employed in the attempt to remedy the familial problems. The family case plans, however, are not required to reflect the recommendations of a particular psychologist in every detail. On the issue of psychotherapy, for instance, the reports of Dr. Maceiko and Dr. Hewitt differed with regard to the potential efficacy of such treatment for the appellant. Thus, formulation of a family case plan in perfect congruity with both reports would have been difficult.

Furthermore, we find the appellant's argument that the success of the family case plans was dependent upon Ms. Laudermilt to be meritless. Ms. Laudermilt was not the only individual providing assistance to the appellant. Beatrice Lahita, a D.H.S. worker providing home services, was also involved in the framework of assistance to the appellant. Therapists at Northern Panhandle Behavioral Health Center and workers from the Florence Crittenton Home were also involved in attempting to provide parenting education and skills. All of these social work personnel found the appellant extremely difficult and not very receptive to accepting assistance.

In executing the improvement plan and the family case plans, the D.H.S. is also obligated to make reasonable efforts to reunify the family, and the "court shall consider the efforts made by the department to provide remedial and reunification services to the parent." W.Va.Code § 49-6-5(a)(6). Furthermore, the court's order is to specifically state "whether or not the state department made a reasonable effort to prevent the placement or that the emergency situation made such efforts unreasonable or impossible" and "whether or not the state department made a reasonable effort to reunify the family including a description of what efforts were made or that such efforts were unreasonable due to specific circumstances." Id.

The thrust of the appellant's argument with regard to lack of reasonable effort is that the uncooperative relationship between the appellant and Ms. Laudermilt rendered it impossible for the appellant to fully comply with the improvement period and family case plans. The appellant contends that the D.H.S. should have removed Ms. Laudermilt from the appellant's case as it became apparent that an adversarial relationship was developing between Ms. Laudermilt and the appellant. The appellant further argues that the D.H.S.'s failure to attempt to remedy the hostility and mistrust which existed between the appellant and Ms. Laudermilt constituted a lack of "reasonable effort." The appellant stresses that the D.H.S. failed to make such reassignment even after it was recommended by Dr. Hewitt and Ms. Taylor. See footnote 17

We agree that the deteriorating relationship between the appellant and Ms. Laudermilt rendered complete cooperation unlikely. The D.H.S. together with all other entities involved in a child abuse and neglect case must bear in mind always its obligation to provide a cooperative, encouraging, and supportive environment designed to foster the eventual reconciliation of parent and child. Such an environment is important not only because it is what the law requires, but also because--in the event improvement is inadequate and termination must eventually be sought--the record can better support a conclusion that all reasonable efforts were made by the D.H.S., the other helping personnel, and the court. We believe that certainly once a D.H.S. caseworker and client's relationship deteriorates to the degree evidenced in the present case by a physical altercation and subsequent assault charges and involuntary commitment, the D.H.S. has an obligation to consider changing assigned workers if at all possible, within the parameters of the agency's resources and obligations. However, we recognize that the steady erosion of child protective services resources has created an enormous unmet need and earnestly hope the Legislature and D.H.S. will address this crisis. See footnote 18

In ascertaining the degree of "reasonable effort" made by the D.H.S., however, we must also consider the appellant's role in the proceedings and her response to efforts made by the D.H.S. The appellant was provided with a variety of other caseworkers and therapists on whom she could have relied and to whom she could have demonstrated her willingness and desire to reunify her family. From review of the record, it appears that the appellant completely refused to cooperate with the D.H.S. during her improvement period. In an attempt by the D.H.S., for instance, to assist the appellant in controlling her violent mood swings, the D.H.S. scheduled several appointments for the appellant with Northern Panhandle Behavioral Health Center, a community mental health services provider. While the appellant finally attended an initial evaluation, she refused to return for subsequent appointments.

Furthermore, Ms. Laudermilt testified that the appellant often refused to visit her children or would be late for visitation. At visits specifically scheduled for three and one-half hour duration, for instance, the appellant would frequently appear for the visit one hour late. The appellant would also cancel visitation with Carlita, stating that if she could not see all of her children, she did not wish to see any of them.

A parent's level of interest in visiting with his or her child during an out- of-home improvement period is an extremely significant factor for the circuit court to review. A parent who consistently demonstrates a desire to be with his child obviously has far more potential for being a nurturant and committed parent than one whose interest in being with his child is erratic.

Outreach workers from Northern Panhandle Behavioral Health Center were scheduled to visit the appellant in an attempt to educate her regarding parenting and homemaking skills. When the workers would appear for the appointments, the appellant would not answer the door. Even after the workers left notes on the door with information regarding the scheduling of appointments, the appellant refused to participate in the program. Attempts by the D.H.S. to involve the appellant in a mothers' support group also failed. Ms. Laudermilt accompanied the appellant to the first meeting, but the appellant refused to return to additional meetings.

The D.H.S. also encouraged the appellant to participate in a variety of other activities designed to increase her ability to effectively care for her children. The appellant, however, refused to cooperate with such attempts. We do not believe that the lack of cooperation exhibited by the appellant is attributable in its entirety to the adverse relationship between the appellant and Ms. Laudermilt. The record reflects the appellant's almost complete disregard for and disinterest in the efforts of the D.H.S. to assist her in developing the control and skills necessary to regain her children. Whether the result of apathy, misunderstanding, or ignorance on the part of the appellant, the ultimate termination of her parental rights was attributable to her behavior rather than to any lack of reasonable effort by the D.H.S.

Despite the responsibility of the D.H.S. and the court to provide interventive resources and to aid the parents, the rehabilitation envisioned by an improvement period is not a task which anyone can accomplish for the parent. The natural parental instinct is to do the work necessary to regain full custody of the child. Evidence of that instinct and the concomitant energy required to achieve that goal is missing from this case.

In the difficult balance which must be fashioned between the rights of the parent and the welfare of the child, we have consistently emphasized that the paramount and controlling factor must be the child's welfare. "[A]ll parental rights in child custody matters," we have stressed, "are subordinate to the interests of the innocent child." David M., 182 W.Va. at 60, 385 S.E.2d at 916. Syllabus point 1 of In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980), in part, states the following:

> As a general rule the least restrictive alternative regarding parental rights to custody of a child under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977] will be employed; however, courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened....

We therefore conclude the improvement periods and the family case plans were more than adequately developed and implemented to assist the mother in the steps needed to remedy the problems which gave rise to these proceedings, and we find no merit to her assignment of error related thereto.

VI. EMOTIONAL INSTABILITY

The appellant also contends that the lower court erred by finding, as part of its determination that her parental rights should be terminated, that she suffered an emotional illness of such duration or nature as to render her incapable of exercising proper parenting skills or sufficiently improving the adequacy of such skills. See W.Va.Code § 49-6- 5(b)(6). See footnote 19 The appellant argues that only one alleged incident of physical abuse, the hand print on the child caused by a slap, occurred during the one and one-half year period during which the appellant had exclusive care of Carlita. The appellant further contends that the reports of Dr. Maceiko and Dr. Hewitt do not prove, by clear and convincing evidence, that she suffers an emotional illness of such nature or duration as to render her incapable of exercising proper parenting skills or sufficiently improving the adequacy of such skills.

Dr. Maceiko indicated in his October 5, 1988, report that Carlita should not be returned to the appellant due to the appellant's unstable psychological and emotional condition, exacerbated by her limited intelligence. Dr. Hewitt, however, recommended in his final report that Carlita be reintegrated into the household. The appellant encourages us to rely more heavily upon the report of Dr. Hewitt and argues that Dr. Hewitt's report is more thorough and exhaustive than the report of Dr. Maceiko. See footnote 20

The evidence reflects that the appellant suffers violent mood swings which have manifested themselves in both verbal and physical abuse. The appellant kicked the D.H.S. worker in the stomach, was incarcerated for assaulting her own mother, threw Carlita on a bed when the child was five months of age, slapped Carlita, causing a red hand print, when the child was thirteen months of age, has allegedly hit Robert B. on several occasions and has such a turbulent domestic situation that frequent calls to law enforcement authorities are necessary. The record also reflects several instances in which the appellant demonstrated her unwillingness to seek treatment or therapy for her condition.

Dr. Hewitt explained in his April 30, 1988, report that the appellant suffers from "serious personality difficulties with noticeable abusiveness and insensitivity." In his October 5, 1988, report, Dr. Maceiko noted the appellant's anger, poor impulse control, difficulty dealing with stress, and a low frustration tolerance level. Based upon these reports and the testimony contained in the record, we cannot conclude that the lower court erred in finding that the appellant suffers from an emotional disorder of such nature as to render her incapable of exercising proper parenting skills or sufficiently improving the adequacy of such skills.

VII. PREVIOUS ABUSIVE ACTS TOWARD OTHER CHILDREN

The appellant contends that the circuit court erred in admitting evidence of prior allegations of abuse involving children other than Carlita. Throughout the proceedings, the social service workers, having worked with the family even prior to Carlita's birth, testified with regard to the appellant's treatment of Justin and Christopher. With regard to the appellant's contention that her violent acts toward her other children are irrelevant to the abuse and neglect proceedings regarding Carlita, we disagree with the proposition that acts of abuse and neglect toward other children are inadmissible.

We find that evidence regarding the appellant's previous abuse of Justin was appropriately introduced to serve the broad, legitimate purpose of providing the court with an understanding of the appellant's home environment and of the appellant's propensity toward abusive and/or neglectful treatment of children. We further find that introduction of evidence of this nature in a parental rights termination case is not violative of W.Va.R.Evid. 404(b). See footnote 21 While we recognize that the probative value of such evidence may, at some point, be substantially outweighed by its unfair prejudicial impact, that balancing is within the sound discretion of the trial court, and its decision will be reversed only upon a clear abuse of discretion.

We therefore hold that prior acts of violence, physical abuse, or emotional abuse toward other children are relevant in a termination of parental rights proceeding, are not violative of W.Va.R.Evid. 404(b), and a decision regarding the admissibility thereof shall be within the sound discretion of the trial court. While evidence of past acts is a relevant factor to be considered, it is not necessarily dispositive and will not necessarily preclude a finding of fitness. Our holding permitting evidence of prior abusive acts is consistent with our previous decisions regarding the admissibility of evidence of prior acts of parents under inquiry in a termination proceeding. For instance, in Nancy Viola R., we encountered a situation wherein the child's father had been convicted of first degree murder of the child's mother. In discussing the admissibility of the father's repeated acts of abuse and violence toward the mother, culminating in her death, we stated that such acts were relevant to the determination of parental fitness and should have resulted in a finding that the father was an unfit custodian for his five-year-old son. 177 W.Va. at 710, 356 S.E.2d at 464. We recognized that spousal abuse is a factor to be considered in determining parental fitness for child custody in Nancy Viola R., as well as in Collins v. Collins, 171 W.Va. 126, 297 S.E.2d 901 (1982). We have not, however, prior to this time, had the opportunity to directly address the impact that prior abuse of children other than the one presently under consideration may have upon a determination of parental fitness. However, since prior spousal abuse is an appropriate factor in determining parental fitness, then clearly prior child abuse must be considered even more probative.

In pertinent part of syllabus part 2 of State v. Edward Charles L., 183W.Va. 641, 398 S.E.2d 123 (1990), a criminal case, we held the following:

> Collateral acts or crimes may be introduced in cases involving child sexual assault or sexual abuse victims to show the perpetrator had a lustful disposition towards the victim, a lustful disposition towards children generally, or a lustful disposition to specific other children provided such evidence relates to incidents reasonably close in time to the incident(s) giving rise to the indictment....

Thus, even within the more stringent requirements of the criminal context, we found that certain prior acts are "so intrinsically related to the alleged offenses that they may be considered as part of the transactions with the children and so interwoven with ... [a] pattern of conduct ... that they are part of the res gestae of the crimes charged." 183 W.Va. at 649 , 398 S.E.2d at 131. See footnote 22 This approach is certainly equally applicable in the noncriminal context of a child neglect or abuse case.

Other jurisdictions have also resolved this issue by permitting introduction of evidence regarding prior acts of abuse or neglect against children other than the one whose termination is presently being contemplated. See footnote 23 For instance, records of prior neglect cases against the parent were permitted as evidence pursuant to a statute providing for their admissibility in In re Maria Anthony, 81 Misc.2d 342, 366 N.Y.S.2d 333 (1975). In response to the parent's objection to the receipt of the prior records as evidence, the court explained that prior records of neglect or abuse will not, standing alone, determine the present condition of the parent. Id. 366 N.Y.S.2d at 335. However, pursuant to statute, proof of previous abuse or neglect is admissible on the issue of present abuse or neglect. Id.

The principle underlying the Maria Anthony decision was expressed succinctly in § 1046(a)(1) of the New York Family Court Act. The same principle, however, is equally applicable even in the absence of such a clear statute. See footnote 24 In In re S.G., 153 Vt. 466, 571 A.2d 677 (1990), for instance, the Supreme Court of Vermont held that evidence of similar prior abuse of a sibling was admissible as relevant to the nature of the home environment directly impacting the well-being of the infant in question. 571 A.2d at 681.

In S.G., the testimony of a former social worker indicating that the appellant had abused her other child four years earlier was admitted over objection in the lower court. Id. 571 A.2d at 681. The appellant argued that such evidence of a prior bad act was barred by Vermont Rule of Evidence 404(b), See footnote 25 or, in the alternative, that its prejudicial effect outweighed its probative value. The appellant's defense in S.G. had been based upon the premise that the injury to the child then under consideration, a fracture of the right tibia of a two-month old infant, was caused by an accident. The social worker's testimony was presented to counter that defense and to prove that the mother's other child had suffered an unexplained fracture to her right arm four years earlier. Id.

In holding that Vt.R.Evid. 404(b) did not preclude such evidence, the court cited its previous holding in In re R.M., 150 Vt. 59, 549 A.2d 1050 (1988), and explained that evidence of previous abuse of other children was admissible in In re R.M. because it was " 'indicative of a broad pattern of abuse and neglect generally pervasive in this household and clearly relevant to R.M.,' " Id. 571 A.2d at 680, (quoting R.M., 549 A.2d at 1056). The prior bad act evidence was also admitted in R.M. to provide insight into the home environment rather than to demonstrate that the mother acted in conformity with any particular character trait. Id. "[T]he issue in juvenile proceedings is not whether the parent did a particular act or acted in conformity with a particular character trait but instead whether the child has proper care and his or her well-being is protected." Id. 571 A.2d at 681. Permitting evidence of prior bad acts in abuse and neglect proceedings, the court held, was "unique to juvenile proceedings because of the breadth of the inquiry and focus on the child." Id.

In the present case, the appellant's propensity toward violence and emotional instability, as revealed throughout the record and particularly with regard to her relationship with her other children, is relevant to a determination of her fitness and is probative of her present ability to provide a stable and permanent home for Carlita. We fail to perceive any error by the circuit court in allowing the introduction of evidence regarding the appellant's prior acts of physical and emotional abuse.

Based upon the foregoing, we affirm the decision of the Circuit Court of Ohio County. With regard to future disposition of Carlita and her siblings, the record is unclear as to whether Carlita enjoys any continued association with her siblings, Justin, Christopher, and Daniel. In syllabus point 4 of In re James M., No. 19948 --- 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991), we explained the following:

> In cases where there is a termination of parental rights, the circuit court should consider whether continued association with siblings in other placements is in the child' s best interests, and if such continued association > is in such child' s best interests, th e court should enter an appropriate order to preserve the rights of siblings to continued contact.

Consequently, we encourage the D.H.S. to work with any temporary or permanent foster families or adoption placements involved in the custody of these siblings to endeavor to facilitate the children's continued association with one another.

Affirmed.

MILLER, Chief Justice, concurring:

My colleague, Justice Workman, has authored a comprehensive and superb opinion in regard to the handling of termination of parental rights cases. Hopefully, it will become the bible not only for our circuit courts, but for all who are involved in this sensitive and difficult field.

I have in the past been critical of this Court's broadening of the use of Rule 404(b) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence in criminal cases, as outlined in Part II of my dissent in State v. Edward Charles L., 183 W.Va. 641, 398 S.E.2d 123, 143 (1990). However, I join in Syllabus Point 8 of the majority opinion in this case, which states:

> "Prior acts of violence, physical abus e, or em otional abuse toward other children are relevant in a termination of parental rights proceeding, are not violative of W.Va.R.Evid. 404(b), and a decision regarding the admissibility thereof shall be within the sound discretion of the trial court."

In addition to the reasons set out in the majority's opinion justifying the use of Rule 404(b) evidence, I would point out that termination of parental rights cases are heard only by the judge. Consequently, there is not the same possibility of unfair prejudice as when Rule 404(b) evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts are paraded before the jury in a criminal case. Certainly, the penal consequences are not as severe in a parental rights termination case as in a criminal case. Therefore, the general balancing test under Rule 403 of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence, which applies to Rule 404(b) evidence, see State v. Hanna, 180 W.Va. 598, 378 S.E.2d 640 (1989), is less strict.

Footnote: 1 We adhere to our traditional practice in domestic relations and other sensitive cases and do not use the last names of the parties. See e.g., Nancy Viola R. v. Randolph W., 178 W.Va. 710, 356 S.E.2d 464, 465 n. 1 (1987), West Virginia Dept. of Human Serv. v. La Rea Ann C.L., 175 W.Va. 330, 332 S.E.2d 632 (1985).

Footnote: 2 The Department of Human Services is now known as the Division of Human Services, and is now a part of the Department of Health and Human Resources. See W.Va.Code § 5F-2-1(d)(2) (1990); W.Va.Code § 5F-2- 1(j) (1990); W.Va.Code § 9-2-1a (1985).

Footnote: 3 While only Carlita is the subject of this action, it is worthwhile to note that both Justin and Christopher were removed from the home in 1984 based upon the appellant's abuse of Justin. In 1987, the Circuit Court of Ohio County ordered that Christopher be reintegrated into the home. By January 1990, only daytime visitation had been accomplished between the appellant and Christopher, and no overnight visitation had been scheduled. The D.H.S. contends that this lack of complete integration is due to the appellant's refusal to cooperate with the D.H.S. The appellant's fourth child, Daniel, was born with severe medical problems and was placed in a foster home to facilitate thorough medical care. Although it is not entirely clear from the record before us, it appears that Daniel was removed from the custody of his parents with their consent due to the necessity for constant medical attention. Neither Justin, Christopher, nor Daniel is involved in the present termination action.

Footnote: 4 According to the testimony of Raymond LaRue, the Wheeling Police had been summoned to the appellant's residence to investigate domestic disputes on three occasions during November 1986.

Footnote: 5 West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(b) provides as follows:
In any proceeding under this article, the parents or custodians may, prior to final hearing, move to be allowed an improvement period of three to twelve months in order to remedy the circumstances or alleged circumstances upon which the proceeding is based. The court shall allow one such improvement period unless it finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial thereof, but may require temporary custody in the state department or other agency during the improvement period. An order granting such improvement period shall require the department to prepare and submit to the court a family case plan in accordance with the provisions of section three [§ 49-6D-3], article six-D of this chapter. (emphasis added)
West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(c) (1988) also provides for a postdispositional improvement period as follows:
The court may as an alternative disposition allow to the parents or custodians an improvement period not to exceed twelve months. During this period the parental rights shall not be permanently terminated and the court shall require the parent to rectify the conditions upon which the determination was based. No more than one such postdispositional improvement period may be granted. The court may order the child to be placed with the parents, a relative, the state department or other appropriate placement during the period. At the end of the period the court shall hold a hearing to determine whether the conditions have been adequately improved, and at the conclusion of such hearing, shall make a further dispositional order in accordance with this section.
No specific guidelines or goals were included within the improvement period order entered in the present case. While the lack of specific goals in the improvement order certainly does not invalidate such order, a better practice would entail the inclusion of distinct goals formulated by the court within the improvement period order. The family case plan and improvement period order could then be interrelated to provide a detailed guide to the achievement of the court-specified goals.

Footnote: 6 West Virginia Code § 49-6D-3(a) (1986), in pertinent part, provides as follows:
(a) Within the limits of funds available, the department of human services shall develop a family case plan for every family wherein a person has been referred to the department after being allowed an improvement period under the provisions of subsection (b), section two, or subsection (c), section five [§ 49-6-2(b) or § 49-6-5(c)], article six of this chapter, and for each family referred to the department for supervision and treatment following a determination by a court that a parent, guardian, or custodian in such family has abused or neglected a child.... The family case plan is to clearly set forth an organized, realistic method of identifying family problems and the logical steps to be used in resolving or lessening those problems. Every family case plan prepared by the department shall contain the following:
(1) A listing of specific, measurable, realistic goals to be achieved;
(2) An arrangement of goals into an order of priority;
(3) A listing of the problems that will be addressed by each goal;
(4) A specific description of how the assigned caseworker or caseworkers and the abusing parent, guardian or custodian will achieve each goal;
(5) A description of the departmental and community resources to be used in implementing the proposed actions and services;
(6) A list of the services which will be provided;
(7) Time targets for the achievement of goals or portions of goals;
(8) An assignment of tasks to the abusing or neglecting parent, guardian or custodian, to the caseworker or caseworkers, and to other participants in the planning process; and
(9) A designation of when and how often tasks will be performed.

Footnote: 7 The November 20, 1987, plan provided the following criteria for goal assessment:
1) Justina and Robert should go to Northern Panhandle Behavioral Health Center 2-3 times per month to learn positive parenting skills 90% of scheduled visits with therapist.
2) Justina and Robert be ready for home visits and have positive interactions with Carlita 95% of the time.
3) Justina and Robert prepare appropriate meals for Carlita.
4) Justina and Robert follow suggestions of West Virginia Department of Human Services' workers for parenting skills and proper meals 90% of the time.
The August 25, 1988, plan provided the following criteria for goal assessment:
1. Justina needs to attend 95% of her Anger Control Group meetings and only miss if medically proven by a doctor's note.

2. Justina and Robert go to therapy sessions with Mary Lou Petrisko 95% of the time. 3. Justina & Robert will follow through with homemaking and parenting suggestions given by WV Depart. of Human Ser. workers and go to scheduled Outreach meetings 95% of the time.
4. Justina & Robert will be up waiting for Christopher, prepare meals & follow suggestions of WV Depart. of Human Services staff 95% of the time. 5. Court will reunite family or terminate parental rights after 6 months on intervention.

Footnote: 8 It appears that Dr. Maceiko submitted his psychological reports on behalf of the D.H.S. and that Dr. Hewett submitted his report on behalf of the appellant and Robert B.

Footnote: 9 The appellant was apparently present prior to the beginning of the proceedings on June 17, 1988, but left before the proceedings actually began. Based upon her absence, the hearing was continued to July 26, 1988. Even at that July 26, 1988, hearing, the appellant did not appear, and the court proceeded in her absence.

Footnote: 10 The appellant had been prescribed an anger control medication by a Dr. Mendoza at Northern Panhandle Behavioral Health Center, but the appellant refused to take the medication on a consistent basis.

Footnote: 11 This finding by the lower court is specifically required by W.Va.Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) as a prerequisite to termination of parental rights.

Footnote: 12 The Goldstein, et al. presentation has previously been cited by this Court in other cases involving child matters. See David M. v. Margaret M., 182 W.Va. 57, 62, 385 S.E.2d 912, 917 n. 10 (1989); J.E.I. v. L.M.I., 173 W.Va. 194, 199-200 n. 2, 314 S.E.2d 67, 73 n. 2 (1984).

Footnote: 13 Although the appellant presents these interrelated issues as two separate assignments of error, we have combined them for purposes of discussion on appeal.

Footnote: 14 With regard to the appointment of attorneys to represent children in such actions, it is a better practice for courts to attempt to appoint attorneys who have demonstrated interest in such sensitive matters and who will be committed to achieving a result which will serve the best interest of the child. Furthermore, effectively representing children in abuse and neglect cases frequently requires far more than just legal ability. As courts have increasingly been thrust into the arena of social issues, it has become clear that lawyers and judges must deal with the human dimension of such problems. This requires the willingness and ability to communicate with parents, social workers, physicians, psychiatrists, psychologists and counselors, teachers, and--most importantly--children.

Footnote: 15 At the outset of an improvement period, the attorneys for the parents should apprise the court if their clients foresee any obstacles to compliance with the plan of improvement, and the court should make any directives necessary to obliterate such obstacles. For instance, if the parent indicates he is unable to attend a specified program due to lack of transportation or conflict with hours of employment, the circuit court can direct the D.H.S. to assist with transportation or arrange a program which does not conflict with the parent's work schedule. The court bears an obligation, at the initiation of an improvement period, to facilitate communication amongst the parties so that there is no mistake as to what is expected of the parents and the department. In addition, the court should ascertain that someone is communicating with the children to assure they have some grasp of why their lives have turned so topsy-turvy, and to assure they are receiving counselling, tutoring, or any other services needed to provide them with as much stability and continuity as possible under the circumstances.

Footnote: 16 As mentioned earlier, appellant has indeed been prescribed an anger control medication, but refused to take it on a consistent basis.

Footnote: 17 The appellant also contends that the D.H.S. failed to make a reasonable effort to provide the appellant with a thorough understanding of the legal status of each of her children. It is clear, however, that the appellant did have legal representation throughout these proceedings.

Footnote: 18 In the present case, Ms. Laudermilt testified that she suggested such a reassignment, but that her supervisor declined to effect it, stating that he knew the appellant and that she would not change. Furthermore, the reality of the situation is that some counties in this state have almost no child protective services. According to the May 1991 Child Protective Services Report prepared by the Program Specialist for Child Protective Services in the Office of Social Services for Secretary Miller and Commissioner Panepinto, Region I employs 55 child protective service workers for the 16 county region, Region II employs 41 child protective service workers for the 11 county region, Region III employs 16 child protective service workers for the 15 county region, and Region IV employs 35 child protective service workers for the 13 county region. In a letter dated January 14, 1991, to personnel working in the child protective services field, Harry Burgess, Director, Office of Social Services of the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources explained that interim measures for case prioritization had been established in response to what he termed "the crises in child protective services." The interim measures were effectuated in response to a steady increase in referrals of child abuse and neglect cases and a corresponding reduction in staff which has occurred over the past ten years.

The interim measures recognized that the department had inadequate resources to adequately meet the needs of its clients and established a system for setting priorities as to which child abuse and neglect reports would be fully investigated and followed up. According to a memorandum dated July 5, 1991, to the Social Service Management Team, Kathie King, Program Specialist in Child Protective Services, indicated that the number of pending referrals is climbing (3,724 as of April 1991). Many of that backlog have not yet been investigated. The department is currently receiving approximately 993 reports of suspected child abuse and neglect each month.

Footnote: 19 West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(b) provides the criteria for determining when there is " 'no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected.' " Pursuant to § 49- 6-5(b)(6), such conditions shall be deemed to exist when "[t]he abusing parent or parents have incurred emotional illness, mental illness or mental deficiency of such duration or nature as to render such parent or parents incapable of exercising proper parenting skills or sufficiently improving the adequacy of such skills."

Footnote: 20 Dr. Maceiko prepared a three-page report on April 10, 1986, and a two-page report on October 5, 1988. Dr. Hewitt examined the appellant on June 24, 1986, July 10, 1986, and December 3, 1987. His entire report consists of thirty-five pages.

Footnote: 21 Pursuant to W.Va.R.Evid. 404(b), "[e]vidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show that he acted in conformity therewith." However, W.Va.R.Evid. 404(b) specifically allows evidence of prior bad acts admitted "for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident." While W.Va.R.Evid. 404(b) has not typically been employed in the civil context, several jurisdictions, as subsequently discussed in detail in this section, have encountered situations in which parents or guardians accused of abuse or neglect have raised Rule 404(b) as an issue. Those courts have resolved the issue by permitting evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts to be admissible for other purposes as referred to in Rule 404(b) "such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident." A rather permissive approach has been taken toward evidence challenged under Rule 404(b) within the child abuse or neglect context.

Footnote: 22 As explained by the Fourth Circuit in United States v. Masters, 622 F.2d 83 (4th Cir.1980), past bad acts may be admissible to provide a full presentation of a case, to provide a setting or environment, or to provide an immediate context or "res gestae," where the "uncharged offense is 'so linked together in point of time and circumstances with the crime charged that one cannot be fully shown without proving the other ...' [and is thus] part of the res gestae of the crime charged." Id. at 86 (citing United States v. Beechum, 582 F.2d 898, 912 n. 15 (5th Cir.1978), cert denied, 440 U.S. 920, 99 S.Ct. 1244, 59 L.Ed.2d 472 (1979)).

Footnote: 23 See e.g. S.C. v. State, 471 So.2d 1326 (Fla.Dist.Ct.App.1985) (parent's past conduct with respect to other children relevant); In re Schmeltzer, 175 Mich.App. 666, 438 N.W.2d 866 (1989) (manner of parental treatment of one child probative of how parent will treat another); In re S., 66 Misc.2d 683, 322 N.Y.S.2d 170 (1971) (evidence of previous child abuse case properly admitted in proceeding initiated to remove a newborn from its parents); In re A.M.A., 439 N.W.2d 535 (N.D.1989) (evidence of prior abuse may be considered on whether abuse will continue); In re R.W.B., 241 N.W.2d 546 (N.D.1976) (evidence of prior termination proceedings relating to earlier child of same parents relevant and admissible).

Footnote: 24 By way of comparison, in regard to other children of the accused parent, guardian or custodian, W.Va.Code § 49-6-3(a) (1986) provides the following, in pertinent part: In a case where there is more than one child in the home, the petition shall so state, and notwithstanding the fact that the allegations of abuse or neglect may pertain to less than all of such children, each child in the home for whom relief is sought shall be made a party to the proceeding. Even though the acts of abuse or neglect alleged in the petition were not directed against a specific child who is named in the petition, the court shall order the removal of such child, pending final disposition, if it finds that there exists imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child and a lack of reasonably available alternatives to removal.
This section was amended in 1988 without change to the portion quoted above. Clearly, the tenor of this statute is that abuse or neglect of one child may indicate similar conduct toward another child.

Footnote: 25 West Virginia Rule of Evidence 404(b), Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b) and Vermont Rule of Evidence 404(b) are virtually identical.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Once a court exercising proper jurisdiction has made a determination upon sufficient proof that a child has been neglected and his natural parents were so derelict in their duties as to be unfit, the welfare of the infant is the polar star by which the discretion of the court is to be guided in making its award of legal custody. Even then, the legal rights of the parents, being founded in nature and wisdom, will be respected unless they have been transferred or abandoned." Syllabus Point 8, In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973).

2. " 'In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions.' Syllabus Point 1, In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973)." Syllabus Point 1, State ex rel. W.Va. Dep't of Human Serv. v. Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987).

3. " 'Though constitutionally protected, the right of the natural parent to the custody of minor children is not absolute and it may be limited or terminated by the State, as parens patriae, if the parent is proved unfit to be entrusted with child care.' Annette Fantasia, Parkersburg, for Carolyn Jean T. and Terry Jo T., appellees.

Don Hall, Charleston, Joseph T. Santer, Robert W. Friend, Parkersburg, for Kathryn T., appellant.

PER CURIAM:
Kathryn T. See footnote 1 appeals from the final order of the Circuit Court of Wood County which terminated her parental rights to her infant children, Carolyn Jean T. and Terry Jo T. She asserts that there is a reasonable likelihood that the alleged conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected, that she was denied the full improvement period set by the court, that the circuit court erred in refusing to grant an additional improvement period, and that the "Improvement Period Plan" (Plan) did not meet statutory requirements.

Kathryn T. is the natural parent of Carolyn Jean T., born September 17, 1985, and Terry Jo T., born July 7, 1984. See footnote 2 A child abuse petition was filed on April 7, 1986, after an x-ray showed that Carolyn Jean, then six and one- half months old, had sustained a skull fracture and bruises upon her face and body. The petition also alleged that both children were neglected. The West Virginia Department of Human Services (DHS) requested temporary custody of both children until Kathryn's parental rights could be permanently terminated and the children placed for adoption.

The circuit court granted DHS temporary custody and, after an adjudicatory hearing held on June 3, 1986, found that Kathryn inflicted or allowed the infliction of physical abuse upon Carolyn Jean, that Kathryn's explanation of the injuries was inconsistent with medical testimony, and that both children were neglected within the meaning of W.Va.Code, 49-1-3. On August 5, 1986, during a dispositional hearing, the circuit court granted Kathryn an improvement period lasting for a term of twelve months. The circuit court incorporated in its order a Plan agreed to and signed by the parties, their counsel, and counsel for the infant children.

The court closely monitored the improvement period, setting several hearings to determine what progress had been made. The improvement period was extended for an additional six months, with review scheduled for February 19, 1988.

The matter came on to be heard on January 28, 1988, by Special Judge George M. Scott. The circuit court found that there was no reasonable likelihood of substantial improvement in the reasonably foreseeable future as demonstrated by the "terrible lapse of time" which had transpired between the taking of the children and the final hearing and the "unfortunately weak response that has been forthcoming."

The adjudication of abuse and neglect is not contested in this appeal. Disposition of neglected or abused children proceeds, as this Court explained in Syllabus Point 8 of In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973):

> "Once a court exercising proper jurisdiction has made a determination upon sufficient proof that a child has been neglected and his natural parents were so derelict in their duties as to be unfit, the welfare of the infant is the polar star by which the discretion of the court is to be guided in making its award of legal custody. Even then, the legal rights of the parents, being founded in nature and wisdom, will be respected unless they have been transferred or abandoned."

We described the constitutional dimension of the parental right in Syllabus Point 1 of State ex rel. W.Va. Dep't of Human Serv. v. Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987):

> " 'In the law concerning cu stody of m inor children, no rule is m ore firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is param ount to that of any other person; it is a fundam ental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitu tions.' Syllabus Point 1, In Re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973)."

There are limits to parental rights. We stated in Syllabus Point 1 of State v. C.N.S., 173 W.Va. 651, 319 S.E.2d 775 (1984):

> " 'Though constitutionally protected, the ri ght of the natural parent to the custody of m inor children is not ab solute and it m ay be lim ited or terminated by the State, as parens patriae, if the pa rent is proved unfit to be entrusted with child care.' Syllabus Point 5, In Re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973)."

W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(c) (1984), provides that "[t]he court may as an alternative disposition allow to the parents or custodians an improvement period not to exceed twelve months.... At the end of the period the court shall hold a hearing to determine whether the conditions have been adequately improved, and at the conclusion of such hearing, shall make a further dispositional order in accordance with this section."

The circuit court, at the close of the dispositional hearing, granted Kathryn a twelve-month improvement period. She contends that she substantially complied with the terms and conditions of the improvement period, although the Plan did not meet the requirements of W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3 (1984). See footnote 3 The Plan set out nine terms which had to be completed before the children might be returned to their mother for a trial period. The goal of the Plan was to provide a safe, stable home for the children. The terms included obtaining a permanent residence with adequate facilities, seeking employment, attending parenting classes, obtaining psychological treatment if suggested by psychological evaluation, applying for Housing and Urban Development (HUD) housing, and generally cooperating with DHS. The Plan also set terms to be implemented after the children were returned to their mother.

The Plan in this case, while not called a "family case plan," substantially met the requirements of W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3, by "clearly setting forth an organized, realistic method of identifying family problems and the logical steps to be used in resolving or lessening these problems." State ex rel. W.Va. Dep't of Human Serv. v. Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. at 693, 356 S.E.2d at 186.

The Plan's main deficiency, i.e., no indicated order of priority for the terms of the Plan, underlies Kathryn's argument that she substantially complied with the Plan. See footnote 4 Kathryn points out, and DHS's periodic reports to the court substantiate, that she complied with some of the terms of the Plan. DHS contends that while she completed parenting classes and fully cooperated with DHS by allowing visits in her home, she did not have a genuine desire to change herself, as evidenced by the lack of cooperation with counselors at the Western District Guidance Center.

In this case, any written deficiencies were remedied by the circuit court's clear articulation to Kathryn of its priority that in order to retain custody of her children she would be required to undergo counseling to appreciate the seriousness of the threat to her children's safety posed by the original conditions of abuse and neglect. The circuit court assisted Kathryn in obtaining counseling, held hearings every few months to monitor her progress, and on September 1, 1987, extended the improvement period an additional six months to give her an opportunity to continue with the counseling. The circuit court saw practically no effort by Kathryn to improve, but afforded her a last opportunity to demonstrate her compliance with the terms of the improvement period.

At the final dispositional hearing, the testimony as to her counseling did not show sufficient progress. The circuit court concluded that Kathryn was still markedly lacking in awareness of her responsibility to provide for the needs of her children and that, as a result, there was no reasonable likelihood of substantial improvement in the foreseeable future. We find that Kathryn had a meaningful improvement period and that the record supports the circuit court's termination of her parental rights.

We find no merit in Kathryn's argument that she was improperly denied a full improvement period because the final dispositional hearing was held three weeks early. This argument ignores the fact that Kathryn received not only the full twelve-month improvement period, but an additional five-and-one-half month extension. For this reason, we also find no error in the denial of an additional improvement period.

For the foregoing reasons, we affirm the order of the Circuit Court of Wood County terminating Kathryn T.'s parental rights in her children Carolyn Jean T. and Terry Jo T.

Affirmed.

Footnote: 2 This proceeding did not address or resolve any paternal parental rights.

Footnote: 3 W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3 (1984), provides, in pertinent part:
"Every family case plan prepared by the department shall contain the following:
"(1) A listing of specific, measurable, realistic goals to be achieved;
"(2) An arrangement of goals into an order of priority;
"(3) A listing of the problems that will be addressed by each goal;
"(4) A specific description of how the assigned caseworker or caseworkers and the abusing parent, guardian or custodian will achieve each goal;
"(5) A description of the departmental and community resources to be used in implementing the proposed actions and services;
"(6) A list of the services which will be provided;
"(7) Time targets for the achievement of goals or portions of goals;
"(8) An assignment of tasks to the abusing or neglecting parent, guardian or custodian, to the caseworker or caseworkers, and to other participants in the planning process; and
"(9) A designation of when and how often tasks will be performed."

Footnote: 4 Certain terms of the Plan give the appearance of not meeting the "realistic" standard in W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3. For example, Kathryn was not eligible for HUD benefits while her children were not in her custody. Yet, to show she was progressing towards providing a stable home and complying with the Plan, Kathryn had to apply for HUD benefits once a month.

Supreme Court Of Appeals Of West Virginia

v.

LONNIE ELMER CARTER, Defendant Below, Appellee

No. 22904

Submitted: January 10, 1996

Filed: March 21, 1996

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. In reviewing the findings of fact and conclusions of law of a circuit court supporting a civil contempt order, we apply a three-pronged standard of review. We review the contempt order under an abuse of discretion standard; the underlying factual findings are reviewed under a clearly erroneous standard; and questions of law and statutory interpretations are subject to a de novo review.

2. W. Va. Code 48-2-15 (1993) grants the circuit court in a divorce proceeding plenary power to order and enforce a noncustodial parent's visitation rights with his or her children. W. Va. Code 48-2-15(b)(1)(1993), the subsection specifically dealing with visitation, provides, in pertinent part:

The court may provide for the custody of minor children of the parties, subject to such rights of visitation, both in and out of the residence of the custodial parent or other person or persons having custody, as may be appropriate under the circumstances. In every action where visitation is awarded, the court shall specify a schedule for visitation by the noncustodial parent. . . .

3. Because of the extraordinary nature of supervised visitation, such visitation should be ordered when necessary to protect the best interests of the children. In determining the best interests of the children when there are allegations of sexual or child abuse, the circuit court should weigh the risk of harm of supervised visitation or the deprivation of any visitation to the parent who allegedly committed the abuse if the allegations are false against the risk of harm of unsupervised visitation to the child if the allegations are true.

4. If the protection of the children provided by supervised visitation is no longer necessary, either because the allegations that necessitated the supervision are determined to be without "credible evidence" (Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W. Va. 341, 348, 438 S.E.2d 521, 528 (1992)) or because the noncustodial parent had demonstrated a clear ability to control the propensities which necessitated the supervision, the circuit court should gradually diminish the degree of supervision required with the ultimate goal of providing unsupervised visitation. The best interests of the children should determine the pace of any visitation modification to assure that the children's emotional and physical well being is not harmed.

5. In visitation as well as custody matters, we have traditionally held paramount the best interests of the child.

Andrew A. Raptis, Esq., Charleston, West Virginia, Attorney for the Appellant

Thomas E. Esposito, Esq., Esposito & Esposito, Logan, West Virginia, Attorney for the Appellee

Recht, J.:
Diana Lynn Spears Carter appeals the order of the Circuit Court of Logan County finding her in contempt for failing to permit agreed visitation by Lonnie Elmer Carter, her former husband, with their minor children and ordering unsupervised overnight visitation for the children with Mr. Carter. On appeal, Ms. Carter maintains that supervised visitation should be continued because Mr. Carter abused his daughter and failed to establish a meaningful relationship with his daughter during supervised visitation. The parties have a daughter and a son, who were four and one and a half years old, respectively, when the parties' divorce was filed on August 8, 1990. Mr. Carter maintains that Ms. Carter lacks justification for insisting on supervised visitation and refusing to allow overnight visitation with his children. Based on our examination of the record, we find no error with the circuit court's finding that Ms. Carter's denial of unsupervised visitation was wrong and therefore, affirm the civil contempt order. Although we uphold the circuit court's civil contempt order, because of the lapse of about two years since Mr. Carter's last known visit with his children, he needs to reestablish his relationship with his children; accordingly, we remand this case to the circuit court to hold a hearing to determine the most effective way to enforce its previous order so as to address the children's trauma concerning the unsupervised overnight visitation and to protect the physical and emotional well being of the children.

I.
FACTUAL BACKGROUND

After almost five years of marriage Mr. and Ms. Carter were divorced on August 8, 1990 on the grounds of irreconcilable differences. The divorce order provided for a further hearing on visitation after evaluations of the daughter, then four and a half (4 1/2) years old, and the parties were completed. The visitation determination was delayed because of Ms. Carter's allegations that Mr. Carter had abused their daughter. In an order entered on March 30, 1992, the circuit court found that Ms. Carter "failed to prove by a preponderance of the evidence, that the Defendant had committed . . . those acts of sexual abuse and child abuse." See footnote 1 The March 30, 1992 order also found that the "children would not be harmed by supervised visitation" and ordered supervised visitation. By order entered October 30, 1992, the supervised visitation was to be held at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Russell Spears, the children's maternal grandparents. The supervised visitation arrangement was continued in 1993 by order entered June 10, 1993. Based on an October 7, 1993 hearing before the family law master (the order was entered May 23, 1994), the supervised visitation was to continue for six months until April 1, 1994, and thereafter, Mr. Carter was to have unsupervised overnight visitation. The May 23, 1994 order provided that "prior to April 1, 1994, either party can file a motion before the Court if they have serious concerns that the children are not prepared for such overnight visitation." In the May 23, 1994 order, both parties expressly waived their rights to appeal the family law master's recommendations, and neither filed a motion to alter the implementation of the overnight visitation schedule.

According to Mr. Spears, Ms. Carter's father and the supervisor of the visitations, at the last visitation in February or March 1994, Mr. Carter said for the next visit "he'd come and get them (the children) whether they kicked and screamed or whatever, that he would take them." See footnote 2 Mr. Spears also testified that he heard Mr. Carter tell his daughter "that he'd have it out of her and in 30 days she'd be a different girl," which upset the little girl. Because of this visit, Mr. Spears testified that he did not want Mr. Carter visiting in his house. Ms. Carter testified that "both of the children were scared" and she did not know if either was ready for overnight visitation or would ever be ready for such visitation.

After the April 1, 1994 overnight visitation deadline passed without any additional visitation See footnote 3, on May 16, 1994, Mr. Carter filed his first contempt petition. By order entered September 8, 1994, the circuit court found Ms. Carter in contempt because she had not shown good cause for violating the visitation order. The circuit court ordered overnight visitation and fined Ms. Carter $300, which she paid. On the ordered overnight visitation of September 2, 1994, Ms. Carter testified that although she was attempting to comply with the court's visitation order by preparing to take the children to the visitation, she did not take the children to the Spears' house where Mr. Carter was supposed to pick up the children. Mr. Carter testified that after he waited about one and a half (1 1/2) hours at the Spears' house, he went to Ms. Carter's house but was told by a neighbor she was not there. At the next scheduled visitation, Mr. Carter again went to the Spears' house, where he waited about an hour to no avail.

Ms. Carter testified that shortly before the scheduled visitation, she ran a number of errands and that it must have been a few minutes before the visitation time when Mr. Carter came to her house. Ms. Carter said that when she saw Mr. Carter's car outside her house, she "got scared and I got the babies and got down at the bottom of the bed." Ms. Carter had no explanation why she was scared except that Mr. Carter was not supposed to come to her house. See footnote 4 Ms. Carter alleged that several persons told her that Mr. Carter had a gun with him when he came for the visitation; however, Ms. Carter testified that she did not see any weapon and did not even see Mr. Carter. Ms. Carter provided no information concerning her failure to permit the second post contempt petition visitation of September 16, 1994.

At a hearing (date unknown), LaRee D. Naviaux, Ph.D., a psychologist who treated the daughter from 1990 until early 1994, testified that the daughter had been traumatized. See footnote 5 However, the record indicates that Dr. Naviaux was not treating the daughter at the time of the cancelled September 1994 visits and had not treated her since about February 1994. See footnote 6

After the hearing, the circuit court, by order entered on December 15, 1994, found that overnight visitation with Mr. Carter should occur and that Ms. Carter was to pay reasonable attorneys' fees and costs associated with the contempt proceeding. The circuit court noted that Mr. Carter had participated in the supervised visitation and that Ms. Carter had "continually failed to deliver the children on any regular basis citing various illnesses, mechanical difficulties and confusion" to avoid the court ordered visitation. Ms. Carter appealed to this Court and a stay of the circuit court's order was entered by this Court on November 4, 1994.

II.
STANDARD OF REVIEW

In reviewing the findings of fact and conclusions of law of a circuit court supporting a civil contempt order, we apply a three-pronged standard of review. We review the contempt order under an abuse of discretion standard; the underlying factual findings are reviewed under a clearly erroneous standard; and questions of law and statutory interpretations are subject to a de novo review. See Syl. pt. 1, Burnside v. Burnside, 194 W. Va. 263, 460 S.E.2d 264 (1995) and Syl. pt. 1, Dept. of Health and Human Services v. Morris, ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (No. 22916 Dec. 15, 1996)(applying a similar three-pronged standard of review to findings made by a family law master that were adopted by a circuit court); Syl. pt. 4, Burgess v. Porterfield, ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d. ___ (No. 22956 Mar. 11, 1996)(applying a similar three-pronged standard of review in a civil action).

We have long applied an abuse of discretion standard to questions relating to the maintenance and custody of the children. Syllabus, Nichols v. Nichols, 160 W. Va. 514, 236 S.E.2d 36 (1977), states:

> Questions relating to alimony and to the maintenance and custody of the children are within the sound discretion of the court and its > action with respect to such matters will not be disturbed on appeal unless it clearly appears that such discretion has been abused.

In accord Syl. pt. 2, Wood v. Wood, 190 W. Va. 445, 438 S.E.2d 788 (1993); Syl. pt. 8, Wyant v. Wyant, 184 W. Va. 434, 400 S.E.2d 869 (1990); Syl., Luff v. Luff, 174 W. Va. 734, 329 S.E.2d 100 (1985).

Because the central issue of the case sub judice concerns a civil contempt order requiring unsupervised visitation by the children's father, we review the circuit court's decision under an abuse of discretion standard.

III.
DISCUSSION

W. Va. Code 48-2-15 (1993) grants the circuit court in a divorce proceeding plenary power to order and enforce a noncustodial parent's visitation rights with his or her children. W. Va. Code 48-2-15(b)(1)(1993), the subsection specifically dealing with visitation, provides, in pertinent part:

> The court may provide for the custody of minor children of the parties, subject to such rights of visitation, both in and out of the residence of the custodial parent or other person or persons having custody, as may be appropriate under the circumstances. In every action where visitation is awarded, the court shall specify a schedule for visitation by the noncustodial parent. . . .

See Syl., Belinda Kay C. v. John David C., 193 W. Va. 196, 455 S.E.2d 565 (1995)(per curiam)(quoting W. Va. Code 48-2-15(b)(1), in part).

In Mary D. v. Watt, supra note 1, 190 W. Va. at 348, 438 S.E.2d at 528, we found W. Va. Code 48-1-15(b)(1) sufficiently broad to allow and in fact "contemplates . . . supervised visitation if there is evidence that one of the parents has sexually abused a child involved. [Footnote omitted.]" Syl. pt. 3 of Mary D. v. Watt, states:

Where supervised visitation is ordered pursuant to W. Va. Code, 48-2-15(b)(1) [1991], the best interests of a child include determining that the child is safe from the fear of emotional and psychological trauma which he or she may experience. The person(s) appointed to supervise the visitation should have had some prior contact with the child so that the child is sufficiently familiar with and trusting of that person in order for the child to have secure feelings and so that the visitation is not harmful to his or her emotional well being. Such a determination should be incorporated as a finding of the family law master or circuit court.

Although the case sub judice, similar to Mary D. v. Watt, contains allegations of sexual abuse, in this case, these allegations were not proven to the circuit court's satisfaction and that order was never appealed. However, thereafter the supervised visitation was ordered and it continued without significant problems for two years until February/March 1994. According to the agreed order, unless objected to, regular overnight visitation would begin on April 1, 1994. However, without following the agreed procedure for protesting the visitation order, Ms. Carter refused to allow the visitation. Ms. Carter's denial was based on the following: (1) Ms. Carter's ongoing fear of Mr. Carter because of his alleged history of sexual and child abuse; (2) stale allegations of sexual and child abuse that had previously been rejected by the circuit court; and (3) Mr. Carter's statements about preparing the children for the upcoming visitation to Mr. Spears, the supervisor of the visitation who had no knowledge of the agreed visitation changes. See footnote 7

After a hearing and a court order requiring visitation, because Ms. Carter still refused to comply, she was held in contempt again. On appeal, Ms. Carter seeks relief from this second contempt order. Given the agreed order, Ms. Carter's failure to protest timely the change in visitation, and Ms. Carter's refusal to obey an order directing her to allow regular overnight visitation, we find that the circuit court did not abuse its discretion in finding Ms. Carter in contempt and ordering visitation, and therefore, we affirm the order of the circuit court.

Recently in Belinda Kay C. v. John David C., 193 W. Va. at 199, 455 S.E.2d at 568, we discussed visitation with a noncustodial parent by stating:

> Implicit in what the Court has said in this opinion is its belief that child visitation with a noncustodial parent is a circumstance which normally will promote the welfare of a child. . . . If after a period of time there is evidence of bonding, and if the noncustodial parent demonstrates a clear ability to control the propensities which necessitated supervision then it would be appropriate for the trial court to diminish gradually the degree of supervision required with the ultimate goal of providing unsupervised visitation.

Because of the extraordinary nature of supervised visitation, such visitation should be ordered when necessary to protect the best interests of children. In determining the best interests of the children when there are allegations of sexual or child abuse, the circuit court should weigh the risk of harm of supervised visitation or the deprivation of any visitation to the parent who allegedly committed the abuse if the allegations are false against the risk of harm of unsupervised visitation to the child if the allegations are true. In In Interest of Carlita B., supra note 7, 185 W. Va. at 629, 408 S.E.2d at 381, we stated:

> In the difficult balance which must be fashioned between the rights of the parent and the welfare of the child, we have consistently emphasized that the paramount and controlling factor must be the child's welfare. "[A]ll parental right in child custody matters," we have stressed, "are subordinate to the interest of the innocent child." David M. [v. Margaret M.], [182 W. Va. 57, 60,] 385 S.E.2d [912] at 916 [(1989)].

If the protection of the children provided by supervised visitation is no longer necessary, either because the allegations that necessitated the supervision are determined to be without "credible evidence" (Mary D. v. Watt, supra note 1, 190 W. Va. at 348, 438 S.E.2d at 528) or because the noncustodial parent had demonstrated a clear ability to control the propensities which necessitated the supervision, the circuit court should gradually diminish the degree of supervision required with the ultimate goal of providing unsupervised visitation. The best interests of the children should determine the pace of any visitation modification to assure that the children's emotional and physical well being is not harmed.

Although we find ample justification for the circuit court's contempt order, we are not unmindful of the passage of time and our lack of knowledge about recent events especially after our stay of the circuit court's order. In visitation as well as custody matters, we have traditionally held paramount the best interests of the child, a position from which we will not deviate. See Syl. pt. 3, Mary D. v. Watt; State ex rel. David Allen B. v. Sommerville, 194 W. Va. 86, 90, 459 S.E.2d 363, 367 (1995). In Syl. pt. 1, Holstein v. Holstein, 152 W. Va. 119, 160 S.E.2d 177 (1968), we stated:

> In a contest involving the custody of an infant the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided.

In accord Syl., Taylor v. Taylor, 168 W. Va. 519, 285 S.E.2d 150 (1981). Given these concerns, we find that the circuit court, rather than merely implementing its previous order requiring regular overnight visitation, should conduct a hearing to determine what arrangements are necessary, first, to assure that the children are "safe from the fear of emotional and psychological trauma which he or she may experience" (Syl. pt. 3, in part, Mary D. v. Watt), and second, to assure Mr. Carter's visitation rights with his children.

Child visitation and custody cases involve sensitive issues that must be resolved in a timely fashion in order to minimize the trauma to innocent children. See supra note 7 discussing the need for prompt resolution of child custody and visitation cases. In this case, delays continued the visitation battleground and created new problems. Finally, after almost six years of visitation problems, the case arrived at this Court and today's decision cannot change those years. In addition to the delays, the record indicates that the custodial parent was reluctant to grant visitation and various excuses were given for the missed visitations. There are indications that the custodial parent may have attempted to sabotage the relationship between the noncustodial parent and the children. The visitation problems in this case are not unique and other jurisdictions have tried different approaches. See footnote 8 We believe it would be instructive to the bench and the bar to discuss the approaches taken by other jurisdictions.

In addition to the traditional court petition requesting a visitation order for a specific time and place, which was sought in this case, several jurisdictions have sought to discourage visitation interference by requiring family counseling, See footnote 9 mediation See footnote 10 or make up visitation time. A recent study conducted in two counties in California reported that the initial hostility between the spouses at the time of the divorce correlated with conflicting parenting patterns which in turn correlated with additional conflict in visitation and custody matters. See footnote 11 However the study found that negotiations during the divorce process helped resolve "nearly all of these disputes" and less than two (2) percent of these disputes required formal adjudication. See footnote 12 A portion of the successful negotiations in the study were stimulated by court-annexed mediation or a court-ordered evaluation. See footnote 13 Although there is substantial criticism of the use of mediation in cases in which the parties do not have equal bargaining power See footnote 14, most research indicates that mediation can reduce the initial level of conflict, which can in turn reduce the long term level of conflict.

In West Virginia, mediation is available in other civil matters, and the State Bar maintains a list of trained mediators. Although the State Bar does not currently have a list of trained domestic relations mediators See footnote 15, there are other mediators available, such as, family counseling specialists who have special training in domestic relationship mediation and are knowledgeable in the area of marriage, family and conflict reduction. See footnote 16

Although our Code does not specifically require mediation in family law matters, under W. Va. Code 48-2-15(b)(1) (1993), a circuit court or a family law master in an appropriate situation may require the parties to attempt mediation of their visitation differences. Optimally, the mediator should be mutually selected and have appropriate training. See supra note 15 for a discussion of qualifications for a mediator. When mediation is required by the circuit court or family law master, the process might follow the two-session model used by most states with mandatory mediation. In that model during the initial session, the mediator evaluates the parties' situation to determine the appropriateness of mediation (see supra pp. 15-16 for a discussion of the lack of equal bargaining power caused by family violence) and whether the parties are willing to participate in good faith. During the initial session, the mediator usually discusses the process and the substantive issues See footnote 17 and develops a plan for dealing with the issues. During the second session the parties should try to reach an agreement. After the second session, the mediation process is evaluated by the parties and mediator and, when appropriate, terminated. Any agreement by the parties is reduced to writing and submitted to the court, for approval. Attendance and good faith participation at these sessions is generally sufficient to meet any mandatory requirement. See Christy L. Hendricks, The Trend Toward Mandatory Mediation in Custody and Visitation Disputes of Minor Children: An Overview, 32 U. Louisville J.Fam.L. 491, 499-501 (1994).

Another option that a circuit court or family law master might use to encourage visitation cooperation is a make-up visitation plan. Under a make-up visitation plan, all missed or exceeded visitations are made up at a later date with the made up visitation mirroring the missed or exceeded visitation. Thus a missed holiday visitation is made up with visitation at the next holiday, or a weekend visitation stretched into a week is made up by withholding visitation for the time exceeded. See W. Va. Code 48A-5-7 (1993), repealed (1995) for a description of a make-up visitation policy. See footnote 18 The make-up visitation policy suggested is similar to programs used by other jurisdictions. See Mich. Comp. Laws Ann. 552.642 (1986); Michael G. Slaughter, Suspension of Child Support for Visitation Interference and the New Friend of the Court Acts, 3 Cooley L.R. 119, 129 (1985)(noting that the make-up visitation policy offers a circuit judge an additional option for enforcement of visitation rights, an option that does not interrupt "the flow of support to the child"); Nev. Rev. Stat. 125A.300 (1985)(additional visits to compensate for wrongful deprivation of right to visit); 750 ILCS 5/607.1(c)(3) (1994)(court may order "[m]ake up visitation of the same time period, such as weekend for weekend, holiday for holiday"); Colo. Rev. Stat. Ann. 14-10-129.5(2)(d) (1987).

When dealing with relatively minor visitation problems or when visitation problems are anticipated, a circuit court or a family law master may require family therapy or mediation See footnote 19 or may order a make-up visitation policy. Both options have shown to be successful in some cases and are easy to implement. See footnote 20 Thus the circuit court and the family law master should consider some of the above discussed approaches when resolution of a visitation dispute is not readily accomplished by traditional means. These approaches include: (1) referral to a mediator for an informal resolution; (2) referral to family counseling; (3) application of a visitation make-up policy; and (4) treatment of the matter as a criminal contempt proceeding under W. Va. Code 48-2-22 (1984). See supra note 20 for a discussion of W. Va. Code 48-2-22

(1984). We are not suggesting by this opinion that a circuit court or family law master is required to use any of these options or that these options are appropriate in every case. Certainly, if mediation is required, no sanctions should be imposed on parties who are unable, even with the help of mediation, to reach an agreement. See footnote 21

When, as in this case, the circuit court finds that a parent has committed a visitation violation and is in contempt, the circuit court has the option of requiring mediation or family counseling or imposing a make-up visitation plan, as well as the criminal contempt proceedings outlined in W. Va. Code 48-2-22 (1984).

On remand, the circuit court should consider the four options discussed in the preceding paragraph because of the intransigence of the visitation problems in this case. Although we agree that Ms. Carter violated a direct court order, the visitation problem was not solved by merely holding her in contempt. In addition, because of the stay ordered by this Court, the children may again require a brief period of supervised visitation before they are comfortable with regular unsupervised overnight visitation See footnote 22 or the children may require other arrangements to ease their trauma and to protect their physical and emotional well being.

We realize that such arrangements may further delay the overnight visitation to which Mr. Carter has a right, but the interests of the children may require such delay. If the circuit court determines that supervised visitation is necessary, the circuit court might adopt a visitation make-up policy to assure the supervised visitation occurs and that Mr. Carter's visitation rights are upheld. The circuit court might also require the parties to try to mediate their differences or attend family counseling in order to assure the interests of the children are protected. See footnote 23

Child custody and visitation cases are never easy, but the interests of the children continue to demand and, therefore, to receive special and unique attention in our judicial system. In this case, we find that the circuit court did not abuse its discretion in finding Ms. Carter in contempt; however, the immediate implementation of the two-year old order requiring unsupervised overnight visitation is an abuse of discretion. Due to the passage of time that has already occurred in this case, the circuit court, on remand, should ensure this matter receives an expedited hearing to resolve the issues raised in this opinion.

We, therefore, affirm the decision of the Circuit Court of Logan County finding Ms. Carter in contempt and remand this case for additional proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Affirmed and remanded.

Footnote: 1 In Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W. Va. 341, 348, 438 S.E.2d 521, 528 (1992), we stated that "credible evidence of . . . sexual abuse allegations . . . [was] necessary for a family law master or circuit court to order supervised visitation." Because the March 30, 1992 order was not appealed to this Court, we do not address the question of whether "credible evidence" supported the order requiring supervised visitation.

Footnote: 2 Mr. Spears gave the following testimony concerning the February or March 1994 visitation:
Mr. Spears: Well yes, ah, he went to the car and nothing was ever said to me, he went to the car then he come back, and he told me to tell Diana to prepare them children for visitation. That he would be after them. That he was tired of him go [sic] through court and to have them prepared so he'd be back after them on Easter Sunday.
Mr. Raptis (Ms. Carter's lawyer): What do you mean by be back after them, what do you think he meant?
Mr. Spears: Well he said he'd come and get them whether they kicked and screamed or whatever, that he would take them.
Mr. Raptis: Take them to his home?
Mr. Spears: Thats [sic] right [sic]
* * *
Mr. Raptis: Did that upset you?
Mr. Spears: Well yes [sic] it did, and I didn't think he'd do that [sic]
* * *
Mr. Raptis: Ok, but now, because of that incident, you didn't want Mr. Lonnie Carter to come back to your house?
Mr. Spears: Never [sic]

Footnote: 3 Apparently, Ms. Carter's lawyer had personal health problems beginning on March 23, 1994 and continuing through May 1994 that caused him to remain out of his office.

Footnote: 4 Ms. Carter testified that both she and her children continue to fear abuse. However the record contains no direct evidence from the children concerning their relationship with their father. In State v. Edward Charles L., 183 W. Va. 641, 659, 398 S.E.2d 123, 141 (1990), we found the uncorroborated testimony of the children who were victims of sexual abuse very persuasive. See Mary Ann P. v. William R.P., Jr., ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (No. 22959 Feb. 29, 1996)(per curiam) for examples of evidence of the children's feelings in a case involving domestic violence.

Footnote: 5 The record indicates that the circuit court excluded Dr. Naviaux's testimony; however, Dr. Naviaux's testimony was part of the record as an avowal.

Footnote: 6 Dr. Naviaux repeated testimony previously considered by the circuit court. In addition some photographs referred to by Dr. Naviaux were incorrectly dated. Ms. Carter said, "I put the wrong date on em. [sic]"

Footnote: 7 Many of the problems in this case come from excessive delays. Supervised visitation is an extraordinary measure which should be used to safeguard a child's physical or emotional health or to assure a child's physical or emotional development. In this case, supervised visitation should have been a short term arrangement pending resolution of the abuse charges. However, it took one and a half years to determine the charges were not proven, a long time for young children not to visit their parent. After the abuse charges were dismissed, a brief transitional period of supervised visitation to ease the children into regular overnight visitation would have been appropriate. Two years of supervised visitation is not a brief transitional period. In this case, delay has hurt all the parties, but especially the children.

We have repeatedly emphasized the need for a prompt determination of matters involving custody and visitation. In In Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 624, 408 S.E.2d 365, 376 (1991), we recognized the "[u]njustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security." Similarly, we have expressed our frustration at the inordinate delay in child abuse cases in In Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (No. 23198 Mar. 20, 1996). See Mary Ann P. v. William R.P., Jr., supra note 4, requiring an expedited hearing in a visitation case.

Footnote: 8 The serious problem of parental kidnapping led the federal government to enact the Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act of 1980, Pub. L. 96-611, 94 Stat. 3569 (1980), 28 U.S.C 1738A (full faith and credit given to child custody determinations), and to ratify The Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction, done at The Hague on October 25, 1980 (see 18 U.S.C. 1204 (1993)). Subsequently the federal government enacted the International Child Abduction Act, Pub. L. 100-300, 102 Stat. 437 (1988), 42 U.S.C. 11601.

At least one state has determined that substantial interference with visitation by the custodial parent may constitute a substantial change of circumstance justifying a change in custody. See Pirrong v. Pirrong, 552 P.2d 383 (Okla. 1976) (insufficient evidence to conclude interference, but if mother continued to interfere with father's visitation, the court would approve a change of custody); Hoog v. Hoog, 460 P.2d 946 (Okla. 1969)(custodial parent's prevention of communication with noncustodial parent required change of custody).

Footnote: 9 This Court has encouraged the circuit court to consider counseling in appropriate cases. See White v. Williamson, 192 W. Va. 683, 694, 453 S.E.2d 666, 677 (1994); Belinda Kay C. v. John David C., supra; Mary Ann P. v. William R.P., Jr., supra note 4.

Footnote: 10 Mediation is a "process by which a neutral mediator. . . assists the parties in reaching a mutually acceptable agreement as to issues of child custody and visitation. The role of the mediator is to aid the parties in identifying the issues, reducing misunderstanding, clarifying priorities, exploring areas of compromise and finding points of agreement." Kan. Stat. Ann. 23-601 (1995). The Wisconsin Code requires the mediator to "be guided by the best interest of the child and may . . . [i]nclude the counsel of any party or any appointed guardian ad litem." Wis. Stat. Ann. 767.11 (10)(West 1995).

Footnote: 13 In 1981, California was the first state to adopt mandatory mediation in custody disputes. See Cal. Fam. Code 3170-3177 (West 1994). Similar requirements exist in Arizona (through local rules of practice), Delaware (Del. Fam. Ct. R. 16(b)(1)(1994)), Florida (Fla. Stat. 44.102(2)(b) (1994), Kentucky (Jefferson Fam. Ct. R. Prac. 612), Maine (Me. Rev. Stat. Ann. tit. 19, 752 (4) (West 1995), Nevada (Nev. Rev. Stat. 3.500 (1991), North Carolina (N.C. Gen. Stat. 50-13.1 (1995) and 7A-494 (1995)), Oregon (Or. Rev. Stat. 107.765(1)(1993), Utah (Utah Code Ann. 30-3-21 (1992)) and Wisconsin (Wis. Stat. Ann. 767.11(5)(West 1995).
Other jurisdictions allow, but do not require, mediation at the trial court's discretion. See Alaska Stat. 25.24.060 (1992); Colo. Rev. Stat. Ann. 14-10-129.5 (West 1987); 750 ILCS 5/607.1(c)(4) (1994); Iowa Code Ann. 598.41 (West 1996); Kan. Stat. Ann. 23-602 (1995); La. Rev. Stat. Ann. 9:351(a) (West 1996); Minn. Stat. Footnote: 15 Most jurisdictions require a mediator to have at least a college degree with certified mediation training. Some of the most stringent requirements include specialized training in domestic violence (N. H. Rev. Stat. Ann. 328-C:5 (1992)), a license in psychology, social work, marriage and family therapy or law plus forty hours of mediation training (Utah Code Ann. 30-3-27 (1992) and N. C. Gen. Stat. 7a-494 (1989)), or a master degree in a behavioral science related to marriage and family and two years experience in counseling or psychotherapy (Cal. Fam. Code 3164 (West 1993)).

Footnote: 16 According to the Administrative Office of this Court, a parental education and mediation pilot project on custody and visitation is being planned for Family Law Master Region 17, which includes Berkeley, Jefferson and Morgan Counties. It is anticipated that the pilot project will be operational later this year. We note that at this time, no expansion into Logan County, where the parties in this case live, is planned.
Planning on the pilot project calls for a three part program emphasizing conflict reduction in divorce cases involving children through parental education and mediation. In the project, all divorcing parents would be required to attend parental education classes designed to focus on the special needs of children in the divorce process. If the parents are unable to reach an agreement concerning custody and visitation, mediation would be the next step for appropriately situated parents. If mediation does not produce an agreement or if mediation is inappropriate, an independent evaluation is made and the evaluation is submitted to the family law master.

Footnote: 17 The Cal. Fam. Code 20038 (West 1994) (formerly Cal. Civ. Code 4788) notes that at the initial meeting mediator may also discuss "the effect of separation and dissolution on children and parents, the developmental and emotional needs of children in those circumstances, time sharing considerations and various options concerning legal and physical custody of children, [and] the effect of exposure to domestic violence. . . ."

Footnote: 18 W. Va. Code 48A-5-7(c) and (d) (1993), repealed (1995), provided:
(c) Each family law master may formulate a visitation adjustment policy which may be implemented by the family law master after it is approved by the chief judge of the circuit. Such policy shall be applied to the following visitation violations:
(1) Where a noncustodial parent has been wrongfully denied visitation; or

(2) Where a custodial parent has had his or her right to custody infringed upon by the actions of a noncustodial parent who has abused or exceeded his or her right of visitation.
(d) A visitation adjustment policy formulated and approved under the provisions of this section shall include all of the following:
(1) An adjustment of visitation shall be applied of the same type and duration as the visitation that was denied by the custodial parent or exceeded by the noncustodial parent, including, but not limited to, weekend visitation for weekend visitation, holiday visitation for holiday visitation, weekday visitation for weekday visitation and summer visitation for summer visitation.
(2) An adjustment of visitation shall be scheduled to occur within thirteen months after the visitation violation occurred.
(3) The time of the visitation adjustment shall be chosen by the parent whose right of visitation or custody was violated.

Footnote: 19 Although the studies conducted by Professors Maccoby and Mnookin indicate that mediation is effective at reducing the initial level of parental conflict, nothing in their research suggests that mediation is limited to the initial stage. Maccoby, supra note 11. Even in a situation, such as the present case, involving a long term dispute, we do not discount that mediation might help these parents focus on their children's best interests. See Jessica Pearson & Jean Anhalt, Enforcing Visitation Rights, 33 Judges' J. 3, 39 (1994) (hereinafter Pearson)(discussing five state programs using mediation in visitation disputes, which resulted in some improvement for about half of the parents who previously had rare or no visitation before mediation; however, there was a decline in visitation after mediation for about half the parents exercising regular visitation). The record indicates that both Mr. and Ms. Carter are interested in their children and their children's well being, and therefore, if appropriate, the circuit court might consider whether mediation offers a viable option. We are not suggesting that on remand the circuit court require the Carters to attend mediation; rather, we are offering the option for the circuit court's consideration.

Footnote: 20 There is a correlation between child support and visitation. As a circuit judge the most frequently cited reason for nonpayment of child support that I heard was a lack of visitation with the children. Social science researchers have documented the interconnection between child support and visitation. See Pearson, supra note 19, 41. Although practically connected, the two issues are generally legally separated and considered. However, some courts link visitation and the payment of support to encourage the custodial parent to permit and encourage visitation. See Chazen v. Chazen, 107 Mich. App. 485, 309 N.W.2d 612 (1981)(per curiam)(allows suspension of child support payments unless such suspension adversely affects the children); Barker v. Barker, 366 Mich. 624, 115

N.W.2d 367 (1962)(termination of child support allowed because mother could adequately provide for the children).

Most jurisdictions have rejected this linkage as repugnant to the children's interests and have considered these issues separately. See Uniform Reciprocal Child Support Act, 42 U.S.C. 651 (1984)(intentional interference with visitation is not a defense for nonpayment of support); In re Marriage of Harper, 235 Mont. 41, 764 P.2d 1283 (1986)(child support cannot be conditioned on non-interference with visitation); County of Hennepin on Behalf of Johnson v. Boyle, 450 N.W.2d 187 (Minn. App. 1990)(interference with visitation not a factor in a modification of child support proceeding); Cuccia v. Cuccia, 773 S.W.2d 928 (Tenn. App. 1989); Syl. pt. 1, Wood v. Wood, 184 W. Va. 744, 403 S.E.2d 761 (1991) (per curiam) and Syl. pt. 1, Henderson v. Henderson, 183 W. Va. 627, 397 S.E.2d 916 (1990) (per curiam)(child support guidelines must be used to determine the amount of child support and the reason(s) for any deviation from the guidelines must set forth in writing).

Other jurisdictions have recognized the tort of interference with visitation. See Ruffalo v. United States, 590 F.Supp. 706 (W.D.Mo. 1984)(federal witness protection program interfered with mother's visitation rights); Sheltra v. Smith, 136 Vt. 472, 392 A.2d 431 (1978)(claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress allowed for a noncustodial mother who suffered distress because she was unable to visit or communicate with her child); but see, Hixon v. Buchberger, 306 Md. 72, 507 A.2d 607 (1986); Polittee v. Polittee, 727 S.W.2d 198, 201 (Mo. App. 1987)("Disarmament is needed to limit post-marital warfare, not additional armament to increase it"). Because the resolution of the case sub judice does not require us to address whether this Court would recognize such a tort, we decline to address that question in this context.

Some jurisdictions have criminalized intentional interference with visitation. See Alaska Stat. 11.51.125 (Michie 1978); Ark. Code Ann. 5-26.501 (1993); Mont. Code Ann. 45-5-631 (1995). Others, including West Virginia (W. Va. Code 61-2-14d (1984)), have incorporated intentional interference with visitation rights within the criminalized interference with custody rights' statutes. See Cal. Penal Code 278.5 (West 1996); Colo. Rev. Stat. Ann. 14-10-129.5 (West 1987); D.C. Code Ann. 16-1022 (1989); Ga. Code Ann. 16-5-45 (Michie 1987); Idaho Code 18-4506 (1995); Utah Code Ann. 76-5-303 (1995). W. Va. Code 61-2-14d (1984) criminalizes the concealment or removal of a minor child from his or her custodian or from the person entitled to visitation. Subsections (a) and (b) of the W. Va. Code 61-2-14d (1984) state:

(a) Any person who conceals, takes or removes a minor child in violation of any court order and with the intent to deprive another person of lawful custody or visitation rights shall be guilty of a felony, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than five years, or in the discretion of the court, shall be imprisoned in the county jail not more than one year or fined not more than one thousand dollars, or both fined and imprisoned.

(b) Any person who violates this section and in so doing removes the minor child from this State or conceals the minor child in another state shall be guilty of a felony, and, upon conviction there, shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than five years or fined not more than one thousand dollars, or both fined and imprisoned.

A criminal contempt proceeding (the contempt proceeding in this case is civil), is available to compel a person to follow a circuit court's order in a domestic relations matter. W. Va. Code 48-2-22 (1984) allows the circuit court to consider an allegation of "criminal contempt" and permits, upon proof thereof, a commitment of "such person to the county jail for a determinate period not to exceed six months." W. Va. 48-2-22(a) (1984) Subsection (b) allows consideration of an allegation of "criminal contempt" as civil contempt and permits a "contemnor a reasonable time and method whereby he may purge himself of contempt." Failure or refusal to purge the contempt is punishable by confinement in "the county jail for an indeterminate period not to exceed six months or until such time as the contemnor has purged himself, whichever shall first occur." W. Va. 48-2-22(b) (1984). Subsection (e) allows the circuit court to "enter an order to attach forthwith the body of, and take into custody, any person who refuses or fails to respond to the lawful process of the court or to comply with an order of the court." W. Va. 48-2-22 (e) (1984). Subsections (c) and (d) address the failure of a defendant "to pay alimony, child support or separate maintenance."

Footnote: 21 This Court is mindful that the resources and costs necessary to implement either the mediation or the family counseling options are scarce. Until the Legislature would speak to these areas, of necessity, all costs must be assessed against one or both of the parties, in the discretion of the circuit judge or the recommendation of the family law master.

Footnote: 22 Professors Maccoby and Mnookin noted that generally when a father initially had only daytime visits, with no overnight visits, the contact between the father and his child declined over time. The professors note that "this arrangement [only daytime visits] proved quite unstable[, and]. . . it often evolved either to no regular visitation at all, or (less commonly) to overnight visitation." Maccoby, supra note 11, 274. See Maccoby, id., 170-77 noting that the number of overnight visitations between parents and children did not decline over their three-year study.

Footnote: 23 In this case, no guardian ad litem was appointed to represent the interests of the children. We suggest that when a case involves the unrepresented interests of a child, such as this case, the circuit court appoint a guardian ad litem to assure protection of the children's interest. See Rule 17 (c) (1978) of the W.Va.R.Civ.P; In the Matter of Lindsey C., ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (No. 23065 Dec. 14, 1995) (requiring appointment of a guardian ad litem for a parent in an abuse and neglect proceeding who was involuntarily hospitalized for mental illness).

JUSTICE MCHUGH delivered the Opinion of the Court.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syl. Pt. 1, In Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

2. "A biological parent of an infant child does not forfeit his or her parental right to the custody of the child merely by reason of having been convicted of one or more charges of criminal offenses." Syl. Pt. 2, State ex rel. Acton v. Flowers, 154 W.Va. 209, 174 S.E.2d 742 (1970).

3. When no factors and circumstances other than incarceration are raised at a disposition hearing in a child abuse and neglect proceeding with regard to a parent's ability to remedy the condition of abuse and neglect in the near future, the circuit court shall evaluate whether the best interests of a child are served by terminating the rights of the biological parent in light of the evidence before it. This would necessarily include but not be limited to consideration of the nature of the offense for which the parent is incarcerated, the terms of the confinement, and the length of the incarceration in light of the abused or neglected child's best interests and paramount need for permanency, security, stability and continuity.

4. "[C]ourts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement . . . where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and this is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illness, need consistent close interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by numerous placements." Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

5. "Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syl. Pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996).

6. The eighteen-month period provided in Rule 43 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedures for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings for permanent placement of an abused and neglected child following the final dispositional order must be strictly followed except in the most extraordinary circumstances which are fully substantiated in the record.

McHugh, Justice:

This matter involves the petition for appeal of Brett and Susan B.[1] [hereinafter "Appellants"] of the January 29, 2010, order of the Circuit Court of Logan County, as intervenors[2] and foster parents in the underlying abuse and neglect proceeding regarding the infant Cecil T. II [hereinafter "Cecil T."].[3] In that order, the circuit court denied the motion to terminate the parental rights of Cecil T. I [hereinafter "father" or "Appellee"] made by the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources [hereinafter "DHHR"], in which Appellants and the guardian ad litem of Cecil T. had joined. Appellants maintain that the lower court erred by not promoting the best interests of Cecil T. when it failed to terminate the father's parental rights and thereby delayed the establishment of a permanent placement plan for the child.[4] Having completed a thorough review of the arguments, including the

I. Factual and Procedural Background

Cecil T. was born on September 6, 2008. On September 9, 2008, DHHR filed the first abuse and neglect petition[5] with the circuit court seeking immediate legal and physical custody of the infant. It is uncontested that the original removal petition stated that the child was in imminent danger of abuse and neglect because: the parental rights of the biological mother had been involuntarily terminated with regard to two other children she had birthed; the baby was found presumptively positive for benzodiazepines, methadone and barbituates; and the father had admitted to use of a drug while felony drug charges were pending against him in magistrate court.[6] The petition related that no willing or physically

[6]Appellee indicated in his brief that the felony charges against him were dismissed. However, the transcript of the dispositional hearing reveals that the State dismissed the criminal complaint for cultivation of marihuana in magistrate court so that it could pursue bringing the charge by grand jury indictment. According to the transcript, Appellee ultimately pled guilty to this charge for which he received a sentence of one to five years to serve concurrently with a federal possession of firearms charge explained in more able relatives were found to care for the child. The resulting emergency order placed legal custody of Cecil T. with DHHR and physical custody with Appellants.

At a hearing in November 2008, Appellee was awarded a pre-adjudicatory improvement period after he advised the court that he and the mother were no longer living together as a couple. The mother's parental rights were terminated[7] at an adjudication hearing held on December 9, 2008, but the custody of the child remained unchanged with DHHR continuing to have legal custody and Appellants retaining physical custody.

At a February 9, 2009, hearing, the lower court determined that Appellee had substantially complied with the terms of his improvement period and that the conditions which led to the filing of the first abuse and neglect petition had abated. As a result, the court returned legal and physical custody of the then 5-month-old Cecil T. to his father on that date. Appellants represent that this decision was reached despite Appellee's admission to the court at the December 2008 adjudication hearing that he violated the terms of the improvement period by co-habitating for a short time with the baby's mother. Appellants also said that the guardian ad litem expressed concern during the February 9, 2009 hearing not only about the continuing relationship between Cecil T.'s parents, but also about the father's abnormal drug screens which occurred on days when the baby was in the father's physical custody, and the lack of alternative care givers if Appellee were to be placed in jail as a result of the indictment pending against him.[8]

On March 6, 2009, Appellee was arrested in his home for selling firearms to undercover agents in violation of federal law barring possession of firearms by a convicted felon.[9] The indictment contains a list of six firearms which Appellee had in his possession. Cecil T. was present in the home at the time of the sale and arrest. While it is not entirely clear how it occurred, the child apparently was taken to the home of Appellee's mother, Verna M. when Appellee was arrested, and the child remained there for three days.

According to DHHR's March 9, 2009, "Petition for Immediate Custody of Minor Children in Imminent Danger," a DHHR child protective service worker [hereinafter "CPS"] responded on that date to a call from the grandmother's home where upon arrival at the home she found Cecil T. The conditions discovered in the home related by the CPS worker in this second abuse and neglect petition included that the grandmother had no appropriate bedding for the infant and the child was found lying in a playpen wearing a urine soaked diaper. It was further noted in the petition that the grandmother herself appeared to be in respiratory distress, but she refused the offer of the worker to call 911.[10] The petition also related that the father had assumed physical and legal custody of the child following the successful completion of an improvement period in a prior abuse and neglect proceeding, but that the father was no longer available to care for the child due to the father's arrest and incarceration on March 6, 2009, for federal firearms charges.

By the court's March 9, 2009, "Emergency Order for Removal of Children in Imminent Danger," the legal and physical custody of Cecil T. was returned to DHHR. On July 24, 2009, DHHR submitted an "Amended Petition," in which the agency reasserted all of the points of the March 9, 2009, petition for immediate custody, and further stated that the father had been indicted in federal court for sale of firearms and had entered into a plea agreement regarding the federal charges.

An adjudication hearing was held on July 27, 2009. As a result, the lower court entered an order on August 11, 2009, in which it found that Appellee "knowingly participated in illegal activities while the child was present which led to his arrest and subsequent plea" to federal criminal charges and that his "actions placed the child at a substantial risk and in imminent danger. His choices placed the child in a very risky situation." The order further states that "by his own actions, [the father] has been incarcerated and is unable to care for the child." The order then reflects the lower court's ultimate determination that clear and convincing evidence was presented to establish that Cecil T. was a neglected child. The order goes on to relate that DHHR was unable to employ reasonable efforts to reunify the infant with his father due to the father's incarceration, and that custody of the infant would continue with DHHR.[11]

Appellants' motion to intervene was filed in the court on August 24, 2009. In their motion, Appellants advised the court that they were Cecil T.'s foster parents and had served as such for all but three weeks of the life of the then 11-month-old infant. They also represented that they were prepared to offer testimony regarding the child's demeanor during and following visitation with Cecil T, as well as provide information regarding the baby's development and general state of health and well-being. Additionally, they requested to be considered as potential adoptive parents for Cecil T.

A dispositional hearing was held on October 28, 2009, at which Appellants' motion to intervene was granted. A motion for termination of the father's rights made by DHHR, and joined in by the guardian ad litem of Cecil T. and Appellants, was entertained. The motion was made on the basis that the conditions necessitating emergency removal of the legal and physical custody of the child from the father could not be corrected in the near future. The facts asserted in support of termination included the father's history of criminal activity and pending incarceration, the father's failure to protect the child and provide him with the care necessary to ensure his health and well-being while Cecil T. was in the father's physical care, and the father's past failure in complying with the goals of an improvement period. The father countered by arguing that the sole allegation against him was his incarceration which is an insufficient basis for terminating parental rights pursuant to In re Brian James D., 209 W.Va. 537, 550 S.E.2d 73 (2001).

At the conclusion of the hearing, the lower court denied the motion to terminate, with the court inferentially agreeing with the father's argument that parental rights could not be terminated on the sole basis of incarceration. In its January 29, 2010 order, the lower court concluded:

> The WVDHHR has failed to establish by clear and convincing evidence elements for termination. Additionally, the WVDHHR [h]as failed to prove by clear and convincing evidence that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions that led to the finding of neglect could be corrected after . . . [the father] is released from prison. . . . At the time of . . . [the father's] release from prison, should he wish to make a record that he is fit to resume exercising his parental rights, the appropriate forum to make such a record is in Family Court.

The order further assigned Appellants as the legal guardians of Cecil T., and provided that the child remain in the physical custody of Appellants while DHHR retain his legal custody.

Finally, the order reflects the finding that the best interests of the child would not be served by visitation with the father while he was incarcerated.

It is from the January 29, 2010, order that Appellants petitioned this Court for review, and for which appeal was granted by order dated June 22, 2010.

II. Standard of Review

A compound standard of review is applied in appeals resulting from abuse and neglect proceedings. In re Emily, 208 W.Va. 325, 332, 540 S.E.2d 542, 549 (2000). That compound standard is summarized in syllabus point one of In Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), in the following manner:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

It is with these considerations in mind that we approach the issues raised in this appeal.

III. Discussion

Appellants maintain that the lower court erred by not terminating the parental rights of Appellee pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) because the failure to terminate does not provide a meaningful permanency plan for Cecil T., and wrongly places the father's parental rights above that of the best interests of the child. They point to the lower court's order which they maintain essentially places the child's permanency plan on hold until the father is released from prison and the father determines if he wants "to make a record that he is fit to resume exercising his parental rights."

Appellee argues the lower court was correct in its decision because the sole ground proposed for terminating his parental rights was his incarceration. He claims that the lower court simply followed the law as stated in syllabus point two of State ex rel. Acton v. Flowers, 154 W.Va. 209, 174 S.E.2d 742 (1970), that "[a] natural parent of an infant child does not forfeit his or her parental right to the custody of the child merely by reason of having been convicted of one or more charges of criminal offenses." According to Appellee, this holding as stated in In re Brian James D., 209 W.Va. 537, 550 S.E.2d 73 (2001), means that "incarceration, per se, does not warrant the termination of an incarcerated parent's parental rights . . . [although it] may be considered along with other factors and circumstances impacting the ability of the parent to remedy the conditions of abuse and neglect." Id. at 540-41, 550 S.E.2d at 76-77. Appellee further maintains that a meaningful permanency plan exists for Cecil T. in that he has been placed in the guardianship of Appellants in accord with West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(5) which provides that upon a finding that the abusing parent or parents are presently unwilling or unable to provide for the child's needs, commit the child temporarily to the custody of the state department, a licensed child welfare agency, or a suitable person who may be appointed guardian by the Court.

The dispositional phase of child abuse and neglect proceedings is governed by West Virginia Code § 49-6-5 (2006), which provides a number of alternatives the court may consider, with precedence given to the least restrictive alternative appropriate to the circumstances of a case. The disposition as ordered in this case is reflected in West Virginia Code § 49-6-5 (a)(5), which provides in pertinent part:

> Upon a finding that the abusing parent or battered parent or parents are presently unwilling or unable to provide adequately for the child's needs, commit the child temporarily to the custody of the state department, a licensed private child welfare agency or a suitable person who may be appointed guardian by the court.

The more restrictive alternative disposition of termination of parental rights sequentially follows this provision in the statute at West Virginia Code § 49-6-5 (a)(6), which states in part:

> Upon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected > in the near future and, when necessary for the welfare of the child, terminate the parental, custodial and guardianship rights and responsibilities of the abusing parent and commit the child to the permanent sole custody of the nonabusing parent, if there be one, or, if not, to either the permanent guardianship of the department or a licensed child welfare agency.

The phrase "no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected" is defined later in subsection (b) of the statute as meaning that "based upon the evidence before the court, the abusing adult or adults have demonstrated an inadequate capacity to solve the problems of abuse or neglect on their own or with help." Thereafter the statute contains a non-exclusive list of examples where no reasonable likelihood for correction is deemed to exist.

The following excerpt from the transcript of the dispositional hearing on which the January 29, 2010, dispositional order is based reflects the lower courts' express reasoning for not terminating the father's parental rights.

> The grounds for removal of course are serious in that the Adult Respondent was a convicted felon and was selling guns out of the home where he had custody of the child. That child had only been there for a short period of time and I don't find any strong emotional bond that existed based upon solely the age of the child. He was less than a year old when the removal took place I believe.
> The Department has failed to establish by clear and convincing evidence grounds for termination. I believe the appropriate finding to be made at this time is under 49-6-5 where the parents are unable to provide adequately for the child's needs, the child can be assigned a guardian and I will > name the Intervener's [sic] as guardians for the child, to make all relevant decisions about the child's welfare.

> The Department has failed to prove by clear and convincing evidence that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions that led to the finding of neglect could be corrected after [the father] is released from prison. If he stops selling guns out of his house then he may otherwise be able to establish himself as a person to visit and/or resume custody of this child. But that is for another day and another time. This limbo period in between is not contemplated by the statu[t]e, recognized by the Court in these cases involving where one or both parents are incarcerated.
> So I believe not [the] disposition as defined in 49-6-5 but the Order in this case should be that [Cecil T.] be made the ward of the Intervener's [sic] and at the time of [the father's] release, should he wish to make a record that he is fit to resume exercising his parental rights, that he could do so in the appropriate Family Court.

Appellants maintain that the denial of the motion to terminate was based on an incorrect application of the statutory time period in which correction to the conditions of neglect or abuse had to occur. The standard for termination under the statute is proof that the conditions of neglect or abuse could not be "substantially corrected in the near future." W.Va. Code § 49-6-5 (a)(6). Essentially, Appellants argue that the lower court wrongly determined that "in the near future" for a person who is incarcerated is not until after the person is released from incarceration. Id.

It appears that the ruling of the lower court in question is influenced by Appellee's reasoning. Appellee correctly states the law as set forth in State ex rel. Acton v. Flowers: conviction of a criminal offense or offenses, standing alone, is not a sufficient basis upon which parental rights may be terminated. However, Appellee relies on the following statement appearing in the per curiam opinion of In re Brian James D., seemingly restating the Acton holding as: "In other words, incarceration, per se, does not warrant the termination of an incarcerated parent's parental rights." 209 W.Va. at 540, 550 S.E.2d at 76. Incarceration was not at issue in Acton.[12] Additionally, incarceration is not a synonym for conviction, and this Court has never held that incarceration can not be the sole basis for terminating parental rights. We deem this dicta in Brian James D. to be unsound, not only [12]The mother in Acton was not incarcerated when she sought to regain physical custody of the child, and it was never alleged that she had abused or neglected her child. The child was born to the unwed mother while she was serving a prison sentence and the mother chose to place the child with what is now DHHR on a temporary basis so that the needs of the child would be properly attended to while she completed her prison term. The temporary transfer of the physical custody was memorialized in a written agreement between the agency and the mother. When the mother was released from prison, she sought to have the child returned, but the foster parents who had separately contracted with DHHR to provide care for the child refused to relinquish the child to the agency. The mother then sought relief by petitioning the court for a writ of habeas corpus. Among the matters raised by the foster parents challenging the fitness of the birth mother to have the child returned to her was that she had been arrested a number of times in various states with four of these arrests involving convictions for felony offenses. The Court in Acton relied on the premise that a natural mother who has not been proven to be an unfit parent is entitled to custody of her child unless the right to custody had been validly transferred in a manner recognized by law. Rather than finding the mother as unfit due to her numerous arrests and convictions, the Court found that the mother in Acton had not forfeited her "parental right to the custody of the child merely by reason of having been convicted of one or more charges of criminal offenses." Syl. Pt. 2, in part, Acton.

because incarceration had no bearing on the facts under consideration in that case,[13] but also because a later reference in the opinion to the same premise correctly reflects "our case law holding that a criminal conviction per se does not warrant the termination of parental rights." Id. at 541, 550 S.E.2d at 77.

This Court has addressed incarceration as a consideration in deciding termination of parental rights in the case of In re Emily, wherein we stated that:

> [this Court has] been reluctant to find that incarceration, per se, warrants the termination of an imprisoned parent's parental rights. . . . Instead, we have cautiously acknowledged that while certain incidences of incarceration certainly are more egregious than others and should be considered when contemplating the termination of parental rights, "[a] natural parent of an infant child does not forfeit his or her parental right to the custody of the child merely by reason of having been convicted of one or more charges of criminal offenses." Syl. pt. 2, State ex rel. Acton v. Flowers, 154 W.Va. 209, 174 S.E.2d 742 (1970) (emphasis added).
> Thus, while an individual's incarceration may be a criterion in determining whether his/her parental rights should be terminated, other factors and circumstances impacting his/her ability to remedy the conditions of abuse and neglect should also be considered when making such a disposition.

208 W.Va. at 341-42, 540 S.E.2d at 558-59.

[13]The parental rights in Brian James D. had been terminated solely because of the father's arrest for delivery of marihuana, not because he was or even would be incarcerated.

Although we have not adopted a per se rule regarding the impact incarceration has on a termination of parental rights decision, we have likewise not said that the facts surrounding a parent's incarceration may never form the basis for terminating parental rights. Because incarceration does not automatically result in termination of a person's parental rights does not mean it may not affect the decision regarding permanent placement of a child. The reasons underlying the incarceration as well as the terms and conditions of incarceration can vary greatly. In some cases, a parent who is incarcerated may under the circumstances still be able to correct conditions of abuse and neglect "in the near future" through participation in an improvement period or otherwise. In other cases, incarceration may unreasonably delay the permanent placement of the child deemed abused or neglected, and the best interests of the child would be served by terminating the incarcerated person's parental rights. Thus while the mere fact that someone is incarcerated will not result in automatic termination of parental rights, the parental rights of an incarcerated person may be terminated. Accordingly, when no factors and circumstances other than incarceration are raised at a disposition hearing in a child abuse and neglect proceeding with regard to a parent's ability to remedy the condition of abuse and neglect in the near future, the circuit court shall evaluate whether the best interests of a child are served by terminating the rights of the biological parent in light of the evidence before it. This would necessarily include but not be limited to consideration of the reason for the incarceration, the nature of the offense for which the parent is incarcerated, the terms of the confinement, and the length of the incarceration in light of the abused or neglected child's best interests and paramount need for permanency, security, stability and continuity.

Here, the father's incarceration and terms thereof established Appellee's inability to correct the conditions of abuse and neglect in the near future and could have served as the basis for termination of parental rights. Furthermore, additional relevant facts supporting termination were before the court in this case. The father had been awarded custody of the five-month-old infant following an improvement period granted in the initial abuse and neglect petition. Nonetheless, his decision-making during the brief time the child was in his custody – a mere 26 days – shows an abject disregard for the child's general well-being. His actions actually put the child's health, welfare and safety squarely at risk. He possessed a number of firearms when he knew that he was prohibited by law from having guns, and thus jeopardized his ability to care for the infant. He knew he could be arrested for having firearms, and he knew if he were arrested there were no other family members located by DHHR who could or would care for the infant in his stead. Additionally, Appellee kept the guns in the home where the child was living and the actual sale of the deadly weapons occurred in the baby's presence. Once Appellee was arrested, the baby was taken to the home of his paternal grandmother, a placement previously found to be unsafe because of the woman's deteriorating health condition. It was from there that a CPS worker was called three days after the arrest and where she found the then five-month-old infant laying in a playpen, because no appropriate bedding was in the house, wearing a urine soaked diaper. All of these factors show that the father, who seemingly succeeded in adhering to the requirements of an improvement period, proceeded in short order after assuming custody of Cecil T. to make improper choices regarding the infant by blatantly disregarding the child's best interests and placing Cecil T. directly in harm's way by selling firearms in the baby's presence. Furthermore, the father offered no explanation of how he could or proposed to remedy the situation of neglect and abuse. Also relevant and significant to the issue of termination of parental rights was the lower court's observation during the hearing that no strong emotional bond existed between the infant and Appellee since a majority of this child's life had been spent with Appellants as his caretakers.

We appreciate the lower court's obvious concern with terminating parental rights when the parent is incarcerated and is thereby limited in demonstrating the present ability to redress the apparent conditions of abuse and neglect. However, this Court has made it quite clear that under any circumstances "courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement . . . where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and this is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illness, need consistent close interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by numerous placements." Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266

S.E.2d 114 (1980). We have further said that "[a]lthough parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syl. Pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996).

During its deliberations, the lower court expressly recognized this Court's holding in syllabus point five of In re Emily,[14] 208 W.Va. 325, 540 S.E.2d 542, and correctly chose not to enter an order granting a dispositional improvement period with a delayed onset date. However, by ordering that the child's legal custody remain with DHHR and his physical custody be continued with Appellants without terminating parental rights, the lower court allowed the father's incarceration to define the time period in which the father may attempt to rectify the conditions of abuse and neglect and thereby created another type of delay in developing a child's permanency plan. Doing so leads to the same timeliness problems discussed in In re Emily.

The case of In re Emily involved a situation quite similar to the one before us, except neither parent was immediately free to participate in a dispositional improvement period in a normal way because the mother was engaged in a long-term inpatient substance abuse treatment program and the father was incarcerated. The lower court had granted delayed dispositional improvement periods to commence upon the discharge or release of each parent. We essentially found that no statutory authority existed to delay implementation of a dispositional improvement period since doing so would contradict the established legislative purpose of expediting abuse and neglect cases so as to safeguard the welfare of the children. We went on to say that "the delayed implementation of the respondent parents' improvement periods is particularly problematic because, by the very terms of the court's ruling, the delay is indefinite," and is based on a presupposition that there would come a time when the parents could be able to accomplish what they had previously been unable to do. Id. at 337, 540 S.E.2d at 554. The very same problems exist in giving a parent who is not able in the near future to alter the conditions causing the abuse and neglect of a child the opportunity to later demonstrate his or her ability to rectify the situation at some indefinite point in the future. Although aimed at the dispositional improvement periods under discussion, the admonition in syllabus point six of In re Emily[15] regarding adherence to statutory time limits and eligibility requirements has equal application to all abuse and neglect matters. 208 W.Va. at 328, 540 S.E.2d at 545. Decisions regarding parental rights and a child's needs for permanency and stability are no exception. We find no provision anywhere in the abuse and neglect statutes giving courts discretion to create what the lower court termed a "limbo period" where a permanency plan for an abused or neglected child may be placed on hold indefinitely. Importantly, Rule 43 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings unequivocally directs that "[p]ermanent placement of each child shall be achieved within eighteen (18) months of the final disposition order, unless the court specifically finds on the record extraordinary reasons sufficient to justify the delay." Emphasis added. This eighteen-month period is not a mere suggestion, but a standard to which courts should faithfully and routinely adhere except in the most extraordinary or unusual circumstances – circumstances which simply are not present here. Strict adherence to the eighteen-month period furthers the best interests of children victimized by abuse and neglect because their need for permanency in a secure environment is paramount. Consequently, we hold that the eighteen-month period provided in Rule 43 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedures for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings for permanent placement of an abused and neglected child following the final dispositional order must be strictly followed except in the most extraordinary circumstances which are fully substantiated in the record.

[14]As stated in syllabus point five of In re Emily, "[t]he commencement of a dispositional improvement period in abuse and neglect cases must begin no later than the date of the dispositional hearing granting such improvement period."

[15]Syllabus point six of In re Emily states: "At all times pertinent thereto, a dispositional improvement period is governed by the time limits and eligibility requirements provided by W.Va. Code § 49-6-2 (1996) (Repl. Vol. 1999) [pre-adjudicatory and post-adjudicatory improvement period], W.Va. Code § 49-6-5 (1998) (Repl. Vol. 1999) [post-adjudicatory improvement period], and W.Va. Code § 49-6-12 (1996) (Repl. Vol. 1999) [improvement period generally].

Having found error as to a matter of law, we reverse the ruling of the lower court. We additionally find that the record relates sufficient facts and circumstances warranting termination of parental rights.

IV. Conclusion

Based upon the aforementioned reasons, the January 29, 2010, order of the Logan County Circuit Court is reversed, and the case is remanded for entry of an order terminating the father's parental rights and advancement of the permanent placement of the child.

Reversed and remanded.

CHIEF JUSTICE DAVIS delivered the Opinion of the Court.

JUSTICES STARCHER AND ALBRIGHT concur in part, and dissent in part, and reserve the right to file separate opinions.

JUSTICE BENJAMIN concurs and reserves the right to file a separate opinion.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. The plain language of W. Va. Code § 49-6-6 (1977) (Repl. Vol. 2004) permits a child, a child's parent or custodian, or the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources to move for a modification of the child's disposition where a change of circumstances warrants such a modification. However, a child's disposition may not be modified after he/she has been adopted.

2. For purposes of W. Va. Code § 49-6-6 (1977) (Repl. Vol. 2004), "parent" means the biological or natural father or mother of a child; the adoptive father or mother of a child; or the legal guardian of a child.

3. W. Va. Code § 49-6-7 (1977) (Repl. Vol. 2004) permits a parent to voluntarily relinquish his/her parental rights. Such voluntary relinquishment is valid pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-7 if the relinquishment is made by "a duly acknowledged writing" and is "entered into under circumstances free from duress and fraud."

4. A final order terminating a person's parental rights, as the result of either an involuntary termination or a voluntary relinquishment of parental rights, completely severs the parent-child relationship, and, as a consequence of such order of termination, the law no longer recognizes such person as a "parent" with regard to the child(ren) involved in the particular termination proceeding.

5. A valid voluntary relinquishment of parental rights, effectuated in accordance with W. Va. Code § 49-6-7 (1977) (Repl. Vol. 2004), includes a relinquishment of "rights to participate in the decisions affecting a minor child," W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(o) (1999) (Repl. Vol. 2004), and causes the person relinquishing his/her parental rights to lose his/her status as a parent of that child.

6. A person whose parental rights have been terminated by a final order, as the result of either an involuntary termination or a voluntary relinquishment of parental rights, does not have standing as a "parent," pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-6 (1977) (Repl. Vol. 2004), to move for a modification of disposition of the child with respect to whom his/her parental rights have been terminated.

Davis, Chief Justice:

The appellant herein and respondent below, Tameka L. M. L.[1] [hereinafter "Tameka" or "mother"], appeals from orders entered October 11, 2006, and December 14, 2006, by the Circuit Court of Berkeley County. By order entered October 11, 2006, the circuit court determined that the mother does not have standing to request a modification of the minor child's, Cesar L.'s [hereinafter "Cesar"], disposition in accordance with W. Va. Code § 49-6-6 (1977) (Repl. Vol. 2004)[2] because she had voluntarily relinquished her parental rights and, thus, was no longer Cesar's parent. In response to this ruling, Tameka then sought to withdraw her earlier relinquishment. By order entered December 14, 2006, the circuit court found that Tameka's relinquishment was voluntary and free of fraud and duress and, accordingly, that it was a valid voluntary relinquishment pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-7 (1977) (Repl. Vol. 2004).[3] On appeal to this Court, Tameka claims that the circuit court erred by finding that she does not have standing to request a modification in Cesar's disposition and by refusing to set aside her voluntary relinquishment. Upon a review of the parties' arguments, the record of this matter, and the pertinent authorities, we affirm the October 11, 2006, and December 14, 2006, orders of the Berkeley County Circuit Court.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

This case began on February 23, 2005, with the birth of Cesar L. to his mother, Tameka. Shortly thereafter, on March 3, 2005, the appellee herein and petitioner below, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources [hereinafter "the DHHR"], filed an emergency petition requesting that Cesar's care and custody be immediately transferred to the DHHR because the DHHR believed Cesar to be in danger insofar as Tameka's rights to three older children had been involuntarily terminated.[4] The

[3]Pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-7 (1977) (Repl. Vol. 2004), "[a]n agreement of a natural parent in termination of parental rights shall be valid if made by a duly acknowledged writing, and entered into under circumstances free from duress and fraud."

[4]In its petition seeking the emergency temporary custody of Cesar, the DHHR enumerated various aggravated circumstances in this case, including the fact that the mother has had her parental rights involuntarily terminated as to three older children: her rights as to two children were involuntarily terminated on August 24, 2001, as a result (continued...)

circuit court awarded the DHHR the temporary care and custody of Cesar by order entered March 3, 2005. The DHHR, in June 2005, placed Cesar in his aunt's care and custody.[5]

Subsequently, the DHHR filed an amended petition alleging that Cesar was an abused and/or neglected child based upon the fact that he tested positive for marijuana and amphetamines at the time of his birth and his mother, Tameka, tested positive for marijuana at the time of Cesar's birth.[6] Tameka filed an answer, admitting her drug abuse and stipulating that Cesar's case was an aggravated circumstances case.[7] By order entered May 25, 2005, Cesar was adjudicated to be an abused and neglected child.

of abandonment, and her rights as to a third child were involuntarily terminated on November 26, 2002, due to aggravated circumstances in the 2001 case and her incarceration on felony charges involving check forgery. The petition further averred that all three of these children were adopted by Tameka's parents, with whom she still resides, and that, as a result of her living conditions, she continues to have unsupervised access to all three of these children. Furthermore, the petition represented that Tameka had a fourth child, born in 2004, who died at the age of three months, presumably while co-sleeping in a twin-sized bunk bed with Tameka.

[5]The record indicates that Tameka selected this relative placement for Cesar, and that this aunt has passed a home study and is presently a possible permanent placement for Cesar pending the conclusion of the underlying abuse and neglect proceedings.

[6]The DHHR also filed a second amended petition wherein it raised abuse and neglect allegations against Cesar's father, Lois A. L. Although the circuit court in the underlying proceedings has also made various determinations as to the status of Lois's rights vis-a-vis Cesar, such rulings have been raised in a separate petition for appeal and are not at issue in the instant proceeding.

Following the adjudicatory hearing, Tameka planned to enter a drug treatment program in Beckley, West Virginia. While she was checking into this facility, a routine background check revealed an outstanding warrant for Tameka's arrest had been issued by the State of Virginia.[8] As a result, Tameka was arrested and incarcerated in Virginia. The circuit court then continued to postpone Cesar's dispositional hearing until such time as Tameka was released from incarceration. Ultimately, on September 29, 2005, Tameka, while she was still incarcerated, signed a voluntary relinquishment of parental rights, which her counsel later filed with the circuit court.[9] During a hearing held on November 30, 2005, mother's counsel presented Tameka's voluntary relinquishment to the circuit court, and the circuit court accepted it after counsel represented that the relinquishment was voluntary. Counsel for mother also requested the court to permit Tameka to have post-termination visitation with Cesar, which motion was granted subject to Cesar's best interests and the discretion of Cesar's care giver, his aunt.

The circuit court conducted numerous other proceedings regarding Cesar, his continued thriving in his aunt's care, and the rights of his father. On June 19, 2006,

[8]Tameka earlier had been incarcerated in the State of Virginia on felony charges involving check forgery. See supra note 4. Although she had served the time for that crime, she failed to pay the accompanying $50 fine. Her nonpayment constituted a parole violation, and, thus, the warrant for her arrest was issued.

[9]See note 22, infra, for the language of Tameka's voluntary relinquishment of her parental rights to Cesar.

Tameka, by new counsel, filed a motion pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-6 requesting the circuit court to modify Cesar's disposition vis-a-vis her parental rights. In support of her request for relief, Tameka asserted that she had been released from incarceration and that she wished to be reunited with her son. The circuit court conducted a hearing on September 28, 2006, and issued its order with regard to mother's motion to modify disposition on October 11, 2006. In summary, the circuit court determined that because Tameka had voluntarily relinquished her parental rights to Cesar, she did not have standing to request a modification of his disposition insofar as W. Va. Code § 49-6-6 plainly states that the only persons that may make such a motion are "a child, a child's parent or custodian or the state department." The circuit court did, however, suggest that Tameka could file a motion, in accordance with W. Va. Code § 49-6-7, to withdraw her voluntary relinquishment and that if her parental rights were reinstated, she could then request a modification of Cesar's disposition.

Tameka then filed an affidavit, on October 11, 2006, alleging that her relinquishment was not voluntary but had been obtained under duress during her incarceration in Virginia.[10] In further support of her affidavit, Tameka claimed that her attorney had not explained the ramifications of the voluntary relinquishment to her and that she had been led to believe that her parental rights would be terminated if she did not sign the relinquishment form. Following a hearing on this motion, the circuit court, by order entered December 14, 2006, concluded that Tameka was not subject to fraud or duress when she signed her voluntary relinquishment and denied Tameka's motion to withdraw her relinquishment. From the orders entered October 11, 2006, and December 14, 2006, Tameka now appeals[11] to this Court.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

The instant appeal arose in the context of an abuse and neglect proceeding. When reviewing rulings rendered by a lower court in the abuse and neglect context, we consider carefully the various components of the court's ruling, according deference where warranted and reviewing de novo legal interpretations.

[11]Tameka's petition for appeal was filed on December 12, 2006, and indicated that it was an appeal from an order "to be entered, [and] also" an order entered "Oct[.] 11, 2006." The circuit court entered its order denying Tameka relief pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-7 on December 14, 2006. Insofar as the appellee herein, the DHHR, has conceded that Tameka is appealing from both orders and has fully briefed Tameka's arguments relating to both orders, we find there is no procedural barrier to considering Tameka's assignments of error as to both orders on appeal to this Court. See Syl. pt. 3, State v. Salmons, 203 W. Va. 561, 509 S.E.2d 842 (1998) ("When a defendant assigns an error in a criminal case for the first time on direct appeal, the state does not object to the assignment of error and actually briefs the matter, and the record is adequately developed on the issue, this Court may, in its discretion, review the merits of the assignment of error.").

> the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused and neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

Syl. pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996). In the case sub judice, the circuit court interpreted two different statutes, W. Va. Code §§ 49-6-6 and 49-6-7, and applied those interpretations to the facts before it. We previously have held that "[i]nterpreting a statute or an administrative rule or regulation presents a purely legal question subject to de novo review." Syl. pt. 1, Appalachian Power Co. v. State Tax Dep't of West Virginia, 195 W. Va. 573, 466 S.E.2d 424 (1995). Accord Syl. pt. 1, Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., 194 W. Va. 138, 459 S.E.2d 415 (1995) ("Where the issue on an appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of law or involving an interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review."). Guided by these standards of review, we proceed to consider the mother's assignments of error.

III.

DISCUSSION

On appeal to this Court, Tameka assigns error to the circuit court's rulings finding that she lacked standing to request a change of Cesar's disposition in accordance with W. Va. Code § 49-6-6 and refusing to set aside her voluntary relinquishment of her parental rights pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-7. We will address each of these assignments in turn.

A. Standing pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-6 (Order of October 11, 2006)

Tameka first assigns error to the circuit court's finding that she does not have standing to move for a modification of Cesar's disposition in accordance with W. Va. Code § 49-6-6 (1977) (Repl. Vol. 2004). By order entered October 11, 2006, the circuit court ruled that because Tameka had voluntarily relinquished her parental rights to Cesar, she was no longer Cesar's parent, and thus, she did not qualify as one of the enumerated individuals who are statutorily permitted to move for a modification of disposition. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-6.

Before this Court, Tameka argues that the circuit court erred by finding that she does not have standing to request a modification of Cesar's disposition. In support of her argument, Tameka suggests that W. Va. Code § 49-6-6 and W. Va. Code § 49-6-7 should be read independently of one another to permit parents who have voluntarily relinquished their parental rights to request modification of their children's dispositional orders. Otherwise, Tameka argues, the circuit court's application of W. Va. Code § 49-6-7 completely eradicates any rights she has as Cesar's parent to request relief pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-6.

Likewise, the DHHR substantially agrees with Tameka's contention that the circuit court erred by finding that she does not have standing to move for modification under W. Va. Code § 49-6-6. In this regard, the DHHR claims that such an interpretation of W. Va. Code § 49-6-6 creates a procedural barrier to the permanency of children whose parents' rights have been terminated by voluntary relinquishment because those parents must prove that their relinquishments were obtained by fraud or duress before they can move for modification to demonstrate a change in circumstances and be reunited with their children.

By contrast, Cesar's Guardian ad Litem [hereinafter "the Guardian"] urges this Court to affirm the circuit court's ruling because when Tameka voluntarily relinquished her parental rights, her legal status as Cesar's parent was terminated. The Guardian further contends that it is not fair to a child to permit a parent to try to undo his/her voluntary relinquishment to seek to re-enter the child's life when that parent is virtually a stranger to the child. Moreover, the Guardian asserts that permitting a parent under these circumstances standing to request a modification of disposition also unnecessarily delays the child's permanent placement.

1. W. Va. Code § 49-6-6. At issue in this assignment of error is the language of W. Va. Code § 49-6-6 and its application to the facts of this case. The portion[12] of W. Va. Code § 49-6-6 that is relevant to these proceedings permits

> [u]pon motion of a child, a child's parent or custodian or the state department[13] alleging a change of circumstances requiring a different disposition, the court shall conduct a hearing pursuant to section two [§ 49-6-2] of this article and may modify a dispositional order: Provided, That a dispositional order pursuant to subdivision (6), subsection (a) of section five [§ 49-6-5(a)(6)] shall not be modified after the child has been adopted. . . .

(Footnote added). In order to assess the correctness of the circuit court's ruling regarding this section, however, we first must consider the language of the statute, itself.

We previously have held that "[t]he primary object in construing a statute is to ascertain and give effect to the intent of the Legislature." Syl. pt. 1, Smith v. State Workmen's Comp. Comm'r, 159 W. Va. 108, 219 S.E.2d 361 (1975). When examining the text of a statutory provision, language that is plain need not be construed before it is applied to the facts of the case. "A statutory provision which is clear and unambiguous and plainly expresses the legislative intent will not be interpreted by the courts but will be given full force and effect." Syl. pt. 2, State v. Epperly, 135 W. Va. 877, 65 S.E.2d 488 (1951). But see Syl. pt. 1, Farley v. Buckalew, 186 W. Va. 693, 414 S.E.2d 454 (1992) ("A statute that is ambiguous must be construed before it can be applied.").

[12]For the full text of W. Va. Code § 49-6-6, see supra note 2.

[13]For purposes of the child welfare statutes, of which W. Va. Code § 49-6-6 is a part, "state department" refers to "the state department of health and human resources." W. Va. Code § 49-1-4(5) (1998) (Repl. Vol. 2004).

Nevertheless, where the Legislature has failed to provide a statutory definition for a word used in one of its enactments, the common, ordinary meaning of the word is relied upon to give meaning to the statute. "Generally the words of a statute are to be given their ordinary and familiar significance and meaning, and regard is to be had for their general and proper use." Syl. pt. 4, State v. General Daniel Morgan Post No. 548, V.F.W., 144 W. Va. 137, 107 S.E.2d 353 (1959). In other words, "[i]n the absence of any definition of the intended meaning of words or terms used in a legislative enactment, they will, in the interpretation of the act, be given their common, ordinary and accepted meaning in the connection in which they are used." Syl. pt. 1, Miners in Gen. Group v. Hix, 123 W. Va. 637, 17 S.E.2d 810 (1941), overruled on other grounds by Lee-Norse Co. v. Rutledge, 170 W. Va. 162, 291 S.E.2d 477 (1982).

Applying these tenets of statutory construction to the legislative enactment at issue herein, W. Va. Code § 49-6-6, we find the language of this provision to be facially plain. Therefore, we hold that the plain language of W. Va. Code § 49-6-6 (1977) (Repl.

Vol. 2004) permits a child, a child's parent or custodian, or the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources[14] to move for a modification of the child's disposition where a change of circumstances warrants such a modification. However, a child's disposition may not be modified after he/she has been adopted. Although this statutory language is plain, the parties dispute the precise meaning of the word "parent" employed therein. Therefore, we must determine whether a person who has voluntarily relinquished his/her parental rights retains his/her status as a "parent" for purposes of W. Va. Code § 49-6-6.[15]

2. Definition of "parent." While the Legislature has not defined the word "parent" in the specific child welfare statutes encompassing W. Va. Code § 49-6-6, the Legislature has provided a definition for the word "parent" in the statutes criminalizing child abuse. In the criminal law context, "'[p]arent' means the biological father or mother of a child, or the adoptive mother or father of a child." W. Va. Code § 61-8D-1(7) (1988) (Repl. Vol. 2000).[16] This definition is particularly instructive insofar as it is part of the [15]Insofar as the facts of the case sub judice involve Tameka's voluntary relinquishment of her parental rights, as opposed to the involuntary termination thereof, we will limit our discussion herein to voluntary relinquishments of parental rights.

[16]Following the institution of the instant proceedings, the Legislature amended W. Va. Code § 61-8D-1 (1988) (Repl. Vol. 2000), however the definition of "parent" was not affected by these changes. See W. Va. Code § 61-8D-1(7) (2005) (Repl. Vol. 2005).

general body of law concerning the abuse and neglect of minor children. See Syl. pt. 5, in part, Fruehauf Corp. v. Huntington Moving & Storage Co., 159 W. Va. 14, 217 S.E.2d 907 (1975) ("Statutes which relate to the same persons or things, or to the same class of persons or things, or statutes which have a common purpose will be regarded in pari materia to assure recognition and implementation of the legislative intent."). See also Syl. pt. 3, Smith v. State Workmen's Comp. Comm'r, 159 W. Va. 108, 219 S.E.2d 361 ("Statutes which relate to the same subject matter should be read and applied together so that the Legislature's intention can be gathered from the whole of the enactments.").

Similarly, this Court has defined the term "parent" in Rule 3(j) of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings: "'[p]arent' or 'parents' means the child's natural parent(s), custodian(s), or legal guardian(s)." This definition also is instructive to our decision herein because the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings are intended to provide guidance in the absence of other authority or in the presence of conflicting authority. See W. Va. R. Proc. for Child Abuse & Neglect Proceed. 1 ("These rules set forth procedures for circuit courts in child abuse and neglect proceedings instituted pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-1, et seq. If these rules conflict with other rules or statutes, these rules shall apply.").

Reconciling the legislative definition of "parent" in W. Va. Code § 61-8D-1(7) with the definition of "parent" contained in Rule 3(j) of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, we find the discrete differences between these two definitions to be distinctions without a difference. Accordingly, we hold that, for purposes of W. Va. Code § 49-6-6 (1977) (Repl. Vol. 2004), "parent" means the biological or natural father or mother of a child; the adoptive father or mother of a child; or the legal guardian of a child.[17]

3. Effect of voluntary relinquishment of parental rights. The question remains, however, whether a parent who has voluntarily relinquished his/her parental rights retains his/her status as a "parent" after such relinquishment. W. Va. Code § 49-6-7 (1977) (Repl. Vol. 2004) sets forth the procedure a parent must follow in order to voluntarily relinquish his/her parental rights: "[a]n agreement of a natural parent in termination of parental rights shall be valid if made by a duly acknowledged writing, and entered into under circumstances free from duress and fraud." Applying the tenets of statutory construction discussed above, we find this statute also to be plain and in need of no further construction to understand its terms. Therefore, we hold that W. Va. Code § 49-6-7 (1977) (Repl. Vol. 2004) permits a parent to voluntarily relinquish his/her parental rights. Such voluntary relinquishment is valid pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-7 if the relinquishment is made by "a duly acknowledged writing" and is "entered into under circumstances free from duress and fraud." What this statute does not address, though, is whether, by virtue of a voluntary relinquishment of parental rights, the parent loses his/her status as the child's parent. The resolution of this query is critical to determining whether Tameka has standing to move for a modification of Cesar's disposition under W. Va. Code § 49-6-6.

The revocation of a parent's parental rights, whether by voluntary relinquishment or by involuntary termination, is a very serious matter. By definition, "parental rights" encompasses "any and all rights and duties regarding a parent to a minor child, including, but not limited to, custodial rights and visitational rights and rights to participate in the decisions affecting a minor child." W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(o) (1999) (Repl. Vol. 2004) (emphasis added).[18] As to the importance and sanctity of parental rights, we frequently have observed that "[n]othing is more sacred or scrupulously safeguarded as a parent's right to the custody of his/her child." In re Clifford K., 217 W. Va. 625, 644, 619 S.E.2d 138, 157 (2005). Accord Syl. pt. 1, In re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973) ("In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States

[18]This section has since been recodified, but the definition of "parental rights" was not changed. See W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(q) (2007) (Supp. 2007).

Constitutions."); Syl. pt. 1, Whiteman v. Robinson, 145 W. Va. 685, 116 S.E.2d 691 (1960) ("A parent has the natural right to the custody of his or her infant child, unless the parent is an unfit person because of misconduct, neglect, immorality, abandonment or other dereliction of duty, or has waived such right, or by agreement or otherwise has transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody, the right of the parent to the custody of his or her infant child will be recognized and enforced by the courts.").

For this reason, the decision to end a parent's parental rights is not one that is made lightly, and this process of ending a parent's parental rights is guided by many stringent rules and regulations to protect the rights of both the parent and his/her child. See generally W. Va. Code § 49-6-1, et seq. (outlining procedure to be followed in child abuse and neglect cases); W. Va. R. Proc. for Child Abuse & Neglect Proceed. 1, et seq. (providing further guidelines to be followed in abuse and neglect proceedings). See also Syl. pt. 7, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996) (""'Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternative when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected." Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993).").

Be that as it may, once a determination, whether voluntary or involuntary, has been made to revoke a parent's parental rights, we must accept the weighty considerations accompanying that decision and may overturn that ruling only if warranted.[19] See W. Va. Code § 49-6-7 (permitting rescission of voluntary relinquishment of parental rights where such relinquishment was obtained by fraud or duress); Syl. pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (delineating standard of review of circuit court orders in abuse and neglect proceedings).

Despite the importance of a parent's parental rights, in cases involving the relinquishment or termination of parental rights, the paramount concern remains the best interests of the children involved therein. "Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal . . . must be the health and welfare of the children." Syl. pt. 3, in part, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589. Accord State ex rel. Roy Allen S. v. Stone, 196 W. Va. 624, 638, 474 S.E.2d 554, 568 (1996) ("Although a parent has a protectable interest in a child, a parent's rights are not absolute: the welfare of the child is the paramount consideration to which all of the factors, including common law preferential rights of the parents, must be deferred or subordinated." (internal quotations and citations omitted)). Ensuring finality for these children is vital to safeguarding their best interests so that they may have permanency and not be continually shuttled from placement to placement. See Syl. pt. 1, in part, In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991) ("Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security.").

Consequently, we typically have considered a termination or relinquishment of parental rights as achieving such finality through the cessation of that particular parent-child relationship, which then facilitates the child's permanent placement and/or adoption. In this regard, we previously have stated that "[w]hen an individual's parental rights have been terminated the law no longer recognizes such individual as a 'parent' with regard to the child or children involved in the particular termination proceeding." Elmer Jimmy S. v. Kenneth B., 199 W. Va. 263, 268, 483 S.E.2d 846, 851 (1997). In light of our prior recognition of the effect of the revocation of a person's parental rights, we now hold that a final order terminating a person's parental rights, as the result of either an involuntary termination or a voluntary relinquishment of parental rights, completely severs the parent-child relationship, and, as a consequence of such order of termination, the law no longer recognizes such person as a "parent" with regard to the child(ren) involved in the particular termination proceeding.

Thus, barring some egregious circumstances that would justify reinstating the person's parental rights, an involuntary termination or a voluntary relinquishment of parental rights permanently severs the parent-child relationship and relieves such person of all the rights and privileges, as well as duties and obligations, considered to be "parental rights," W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(o) (1999). See W. Va. Code § 49-6-7 (invalidating voluntary relinquishment of parental rights obtained by fraud or duress); Syl. pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (limiting reversal of abuse and neglect rulings by a lower court to those decisions that are "clearly erroneous"). As a result, the person who formerly possessed such parental rights loses his/her status as the child's parent. Accordingly, we hold that a valid voluntary relinquishment of parental rights, effectuated in accordance with W. Va. Code § 49-6-7 (1977) (Repl. Vol. 2004), includes a relinquishment of "rights to participate in the decisions affecting a minor child," W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(o) (1999) (Repl. Vol. 2004), and causes the person relinquishing his/her parental rights to lose his/her status as a parent of that child. We hold further that a person whose parental rights have been terminated by a final order, as the result of either an involuntary termination or a voluntary relinquishment of parental rights, does not have standing as a "parent," pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-6 (1977) (Repl. Vol. 2004), to move for a modification of disposition of the child with respect to whom his/her parental rights have been terminated.[20] Applying these holdings to the facts presently before us, we conclude that the circuit court did not err by ruling that Tameka does not have standing as a parent to request a modification of Cesar's disposition in accordance with W. Va. Code § 49-6-6 because, by virtue of her voluntary relinquishment of her parental rights to Cesar, Tameka is no longer considered to be his parent.[21] Thus, the October 11, 2006, order of the Circuit Court of Berkeley County is affirmed.

be inconsistent with a finding that Tameka lacks standing as a parent. Citing Syl. pt. 8, In re Stephen Tyler R., 213 W. Va. 725, 584 S.E.2d 581 (2003) ("A circuit court may, in the course of modifying a previously-entered dispositional order in an abuse and neglect case in accordance with W. Va. Code § 49-6-6 (1977) (Repl. Vol. 2001), amend a parent's continuing support obligation or the amount thereof. The court may not, however, modify said dispositional order to cancel accrued child support or decretal judgments resulting from child support arrearages."). Such a construction is not accurate, however, and the Guardian correctly recognizes that the modification of disposition permitted by the Stephen case was limited solely to a modification of child support. Moreover, W. Va. Code § 48-11-105 (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2004) permits a party to move for modification of child support at any time there exists a "substantial change in circumstances."

[21]In their arguments to this Court, the parties, namely Tameka and the DHHR, have expressed concern that if a person who has relinquished his/her parental rights does not have standing to move for a modification of disposition under W. Va. Code § 49-6-6, then persons who have substantially corrected the conditions of abuse and neglect would never be able to present evidence of such improvement to the court. Without reiterating the limited circumstances under which a voluntary relinquishment of parental rights may be invalidated, it suffices to say that this opinion does not preclude any of the other persons permitted by W. Va. Code § 49-6-6 to request a change in the child's disposition from doing so if the relinquished parent's improved circumstances are such that they constitute "a change of circumstances" thereunder, and, as required by W. Va. Code § 49-6-6, such motion is made before the child has been adopted.

Tameka also assigns error to the circuit court's ruling finding her voluntary relinquishment of parental rights[22] to be valid. In its order of October 11, 2006, denying

RELINQUISHMENT OF PARENTAL RIGHTS BY MOTHER
REQUEST FOR POST-RELINQUISHMENT VISITATION

I, Tameka M[.]-L[.], the Respondent Mother of Cesar A[.] L[.], date of birth February 23, 2005, after thoughtful consideration of this matter, hereby acknowledge the following:

1. That I believe it is in the best interest of Cesar A[.] L[.] to remain in the custody of the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources;

2. I understand that I am entitled to be represented by counsel at all proceedings.

3. Heidi J. Myers has been appointed by this Honorable Court to represent my interests at these hearings.

4. I understand that I would be entitled to call witnesses, present evidence, testify on my own behalf, and have my attorney cross-examine any witnesses called at any hearing held in this matter;

5. I wish to waive my right to an adjudication and dispositional hearing in this matter and voluntarily relinquish all my parental rights to Cesar A[.] L[.]

6. I understand the Court would consider less drastic alternatives to termination, such as granting a pre or post adjudicatory improvement period, returning the child into my custody or simply having custody remain with West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources.

7. I fully understand the consequences of this decision. I understand my decision will result in the termination of my parental rights as to Cesar A[.] L[.]

8. I understand that I have no right to custody or visitation in this matter, but request at this time that visitation be afforded to me in the future.

9. I understand that I will have no right to participate in the care, custody, control, education, training or any aspect of raising Cesar A[.] L[.] from this point forward.

10. I understand by relinquishing parental rights to Cesar A[.] L[.] that it is a final disposition as towards custody and therefore I leave the Court no less restrictive alternative or option other than termination of my parental rights.

11. I understand that I am authorizing West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources to consent to the adoption of Cesar A[.] L[.], the right to change his name and I understand that I am waiving notice as to these proceedings.

12. I have read and discussed thoroughly with my attorney all the above-mentioned rights.

13. I fully understand the meaning and consequences of executing this document.

14. I have not been induced, coerced or threatened into signing this document.

15. No promises or rewards have been offered in consideration for my execution of this document.

I hereby freely, knowingly intelligently and voluntarily relinquish all my parental rights to Cesar A[.] L[.]

Tameka standing to move for a modification of Cesar's disposition because she earlier had relinquished her parental rights to this child, the circuit court indicated that if Tameka sought relief from her voluntary relinquishment, her parental rights potentially could be restored at which time she then would have standing to request that Cesar's disposition be modified. Pursuant to this order, Tameka filed an affidavit[23] seeking to withdraw her

Now comes Tameka L[.] L[.], and first being duly sworn, deposes and states the following:

1. That I relinquished my rights to my son Cesar L[.] under duress.

2. I was incarcerated at the time of any relinquishment in the State of Virginia.

3. That my attorney at the time Heidi Myers did not explain the relinquishment to me. I only spoke with her secretary once, and then a block was put on any further calls. Heidi Myers sent a form down for me to sign but no letter explaining it.

4. The secretary at the Myers Law Office informed me that if I did not relinquish I would be terminated from my son and then I could not get him back.

voluntary relinquishment of parental rights. Thereafter, the circuit court, by order entered December 14, 2006, found that Tameka had not presented evidence sufficient to warrant an evidentiary hearing on her motion and denied the same, determining that Tameka's relinquishment was valid and had not been obtained by fraud or duress.

On appeal to this Court, Tameka complains that the circuit court erred by not affording her an evidentiary hearing and by refusing to set aside her relinquishment. In this regard, Tameka asserts that the circuit court should have permitted her to present evidence in a hearing before the court to prove that her relinquishment had been obtained under duress. As to her claim of duress, Tameka states that she was incarcerated at the time of her relinquishment and claims that although she was represented by an attorney at that time, she did not receive the advice of counsel prior to executing the relinquishment. The DHHR and the Guardian respond by urging this Court to affirm the circuit court's ruling insofar as Tameka failed to prove that her voluntary relinquishment of her parental rights had been obtained by fraud or duress as required by W. Va. Code § 49-6-7 to invalidate an otherwise valid relinquishment.

The statute which permits a parent to voluntarily relinquish his/her parental rights and provides guidance as to when such a relinquishment should be invalidated is W. Va. Code § 49-6-7 (1977) (Repl. Vol. 2004). As we observed in the preceding section of this opinion, this statute provides that "[a]n agreement of a natural parent in termination of parental rights shall be valid if made by a duly acknowledged writing, and entered into under circumstances free from duress and fraud." Id. Having determined the language of this provision to be plain, we need only apply it to the facts presently before us.

1. Hearing on motion to withdraw voluntary relinquishment. Tameka first argues that the circuit court was required to permit her to present evidence, at a hearing before the court, to prove that she was improperly induced by fraud or duress to relinquish her parental rights to Cesar. We previously have addressed this issue and concluded that the decision to hold an evidentiary hearing rests within the court's sound discretion: "Under the provisions of W.Va.Code, 49-6-7, a circuit court may conduct a hearing to determine whether the signing by a parent of an agreement relinquishing parental rights was free from duress and fraud." Syl. pt. 3, State ex rel. Rose v. Pancake, 209 W. Va. 188, 544 S.E.2d 403 (2001) (emphasis added). Moreover, the word "may" generally is afforded a permissive connotation, which renders the referenced act discretionary, rather than mandatory, in nature. See State v. Hedrick, 204 W. Va. 547, 552, 514 S.E.2d 397, 402 (1999) ("The word 'may' generally signifies permission and connotes discretion." (citations omitted)); Gebr. Eickhoff Maschinenfabrik und Eisengieberei mbH v. Starcher, 174 W. Va. 618, 626 n.12, 328 S.E.2d 492, 500 n.12 (1985) ("An elementary principle of statutory construction is that the word 'may' is inherently permissive in nature and connotes discretion." (citations omitted)). Thus, the circuit court had discretion to permit Tameka an opportunity to present evidence at a hearing for that purpose or to consider, without a hearing, Tameka's motion to withdraw her relinquishment. Under the facts of this case, we find that the circuit court did not abuse its discretion by denying Tameka the evidentiary hearing she requested. As will be discussed more fully below, Tameka did not present any new evidence in her affidavit that would tend to indicate that her relinquishment had been obtained by fraud or duress to warrant further development during an evidentiary hearing.

2. Proof of fraud or duress. Tameka also challenges the circuit court's ruling upholding her relinquishment as valid because she had failed to prove that it had been obtained by fraud or duress as required by W. Va. Code § 49-6-7. We previously have observed that,

> [w]hile W.Va. Code, 49-6-7 specifically permits a relinquishment of parental rights, it clearly suggests that such an agreement may be invalid if it is not entered into under circumstances that are free of duress and fraud. Whether there has been fraud or duress is a question of fact that must be determined by the circuit court judge.

Rose, 209 W. Va. at 191, 544 S.E.2d at 406.

To guide lower courts in making a determination as to whether or not a relinquishment should be invalidated, the elements needed to prove fraud or duress, as well as the requisite burden of proof therefor, were explained at length in the concurrence to Rose:

> [A] relinquishment agreement that is made in writing and entered into under circumstances free from duress and fraud is valid. A parent attempting to show otherwise is faced with a challenging task. Indeed, the threshold for establishing duress and fraud in the context of the relinquishment of parental rights is extremely high. As to duress, this Court has held that, in the context of an adoption, duress "means a condition that exists when a natural parent is induced by the unlawful or unconscionable act of another to consent to the adoption of his or her child. Mere 'duress of circumstance' does not constitute duress[.]" Syl. pt. 2, in part, Wooten v. Wallace, 177 W. Va. 159, 351 S.E.2d 72 (1986). See also Baby Boy R. v. Velas, 182 W. Va. 182, 185, 386 S.E.2d 839, 842 (1989) ("[Duress] means a condition that exists when a natural parent is induced by the unlawful or unconscionable act of another to consent to the adoption of his or her child."). With respect to fraud, we have held:
> > The essential elements in an action for fraud are: (1) that the act claimed to be fraudulent was the act of the defendant or induced by him; (2) that it was material and false; that plaintiff relied on it and was justified under the circumstances in relying upon it; and (3) that he was damaged because he relied on it.

(1981). . . .

> Finally, I wish to emphasize that a parent challenging a relinquishment of his or her parental rights on the grounds of duress and fraud has the difficult responsibility of establishing the elements outlined above by clear and convincing evidence. See, e.g., [W. Va. Code §] 48-4-5(a)(2) (1997) (Repl. Vol. 1999) (allowing revocation of adoption due to fraud or duress only where "[t]he person who executed the consent or relinquishment proves by clear and convincing evidence . . . that the consent or relinquishment was obtained by fraud or duress" (emphasis added)) . . . .
> [I]t is clear that a parent has a heavy burden to establish duress or fraud once he or she has relinquished parental rights. . . .

Rose, 209 W. Va. at 192-93, 544 S.E.2d at 407-08 (Davis, J., concurring) (emphasis in original) (additional citations omitted).

Reviewing the contents of the affidavit by which Tameka sought to withdraw her relinquishment,[24] we agree with the circuit court's conclusion that she did not prove that she had been subject to fraud or duress at the time she relinquished her parental rights. Although we appreciate that, at the time she signed her voluntary relinquishment of her parental rights to Cesar, Tameka was incarcerated and thus not then able to care for her child, this simple fact, alone, is not sufficient to constitute duress. In this regard, we previously held that "[m]ere 'duress of circumstance' does not constitute duress." Syl. pt. 2, in part, Wooten v. Wallace, 177 W. Va. 159, 351 S.E.2d 72.

Neither are we convinced that Tameka's former counsel coerced her into relinquishing her parental rights. Of particular relevance to this assertion in her subsequent affidavit are Tameka's own representations in the relinquishment document,[25] which sharply contradict her current assertions of duress, that she "fully understand[s] the consequences of this decision;" she has "read and discussed thoroughly with [her] attorney all the above-mentioned rights;" she "fully understand[s] the meaning and consequences of executing this document;" she has "not been induced, coerced or threatened into signing this document;" and she "freely, knowingly, intelligently and voluntarily relinquish[es] all [her] parental rights to Cesar A[.] L[.]"

The above-quoted statements contained in Tameka's relinquishment constitute judicial admissions by which she is bound and which she cannot now deny. See Syl. pt. 4, State v. McWilliams, 177 W. Va. 369, 352 S.E.2d 120 (1986) ("A judicial admission is a statement of fact made by a party in the course of the litigation for the purpose of withdrawing the fact from the realm of dispute."). "The significance of such an admission is that it 'will stop the one who made it from subsequently asserting any claim inconsistent therewith.'" Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp. v. Rowing, 205 W. Va. 286, 302, 517 S.E.2d 763, 779 (1999) (quoting Clark v. Clark, 70 W. Va. 428, 433, 74 S.E. 234, 236 (1912) (additional citations and quotations omitted)). Accord Keller v. United States, 58 F.3d 1194, 1198 n.8 (7th Cir. 1995) ("Judicial admissions are formal concessions . . . or stipulations by a party or its counsel . . . that are binding upon the party making them. They may not be controverted at trial or on appeal."). Because Tameka is bound by the admissions contained in her relinquishment, we cannot condone her present attempts to recant these statements absent clear and convincing evidence of the duress to which she claims to have been subject at the time thereof.

Furthermore, because Cesar is the fourth child who the DHHR has removed from Tameka's custody as the result of an abuse and neglect proceeding, it may be presumed that Tameka is familiar with the abuse and neglect process. The fact that Tameka's parental rights to three of these children have been involuntarily terminated makes her present assertions that she did not appreciate the full import of her relinquishment even less convincing. In deciding this case, the circuit court determined that Tameka had failed to sustain her burden of proof, and, having reviewed the record in this case, we agree with the circuit court's ruling. Accordingly, the December 14, 2006, order of the Circuit Court of Berkeley County is affirmed.

IV.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the October 11, 2006, order and the December 14, 2006, order of the Circuit Court of Berkeley County are hereby affirmed.

Affirmed.

RORY L. PERRY II, CLERK
SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS
OF WEST VIRGINIA

Albright, Justice, concurring in part, dissenting in part:

I concur with the majority opinion on the very limited basis that it reaches the proper legal result for the facts of the underlying case. I write separately to register my firm dissent to the manner in which the majority has seen fit to unreasonably extend its decision to facts not before the Court. I fear that the majority's zeal to eliminate entirely the possibility that biological parents might seek modification of court decisions involuntarily terminating parental rights in an abuse and neglect case wrongly establishes a new point of law. That new point of law overlooks the constitutional limitations of this Court, ignores legislative intent and disregards prior post-termination visitation rulings of this Court. The specific language of the majority opinion to which I refer appears in syllabus point four of the majority opinion and reads, in pertinent part: "A final order terminating a person's parental rights, as the result of either an involuntary termination or a voluntary relinquishment of parental rights, completely severs the parent-child relationship," thus denying such parents standing to seek modifications.

The underlying action involved a mother who voluntarily relinquished her parental rights. She subsequently sought to revoke her relinquishment and petitioned for modification of the abuse and neglect dispositional order pursuant to the provisions of West Virginia Code § 49-6-6 (1977) (Repl. Vol. 2004). Section 4, article VIII of the West Virginia Constitution provides in relevant part that "[w]hen a judgment or order of another court is reversed, modified or affirmed by the [supreme] court, every point fairly arising upon the record shall be considered and decided." This Court has taken the enforcement of this provision seriously by entertaining and deciding only those matters fairly arising from the record. Syl. Pt. 9, State v. Comstock, 137 W.Va. 152, 70 S.E.2d 648 (1952) ("Under the West Virginia Constitution, . . .when a judgment or decree is reversed or affirmed by this Court, the Court will not consider and decide a point which does not fairly arise upon the record of the case."); Thornton v. CAMC, 172 W.Va. 360, 364, 305 S.E.2d 316, 320-21 (1983) (appellate review must be limited to those issues which appear in the record). The majority improvidently declined to adhere to this long-recognized, self-imposed restriction. Instead, the majority extends its holding to include cases involving involuntary termination of parental rights, a circumstance not present in this case. The issue was not raised in the facts and the issue was not properly developed before this Court through brief and argument. As a result the majority's decision is ill-considered and fatally flawed.

It is equally disconcerting that the conclusion reached in the majority opinion clearly ignores legislative intent. Proper reading of the statutory provision regarding modification necessarily results in the conclusion that a biological parent is permitted to seek modification of a dispositional order in an abuse or neglect case. The statute expressly provides that a motion to modify a dispositional order may be made by a "child, a child's parent or custodian or the state department" and "[t]hat a dispositional order pursuant to subdivision (6), subsection (a) of section five [§ 49-6-5 (a)(6)] shall not be modified after the child has been adopted." W.Va. Code § 49-6-6. West Virginia Code § 49-6-5 (a)(6) (2002) (Repl. Vol. 2004) includes the circumstances under which a court may proceed to involuntarily terminate parental rights. By using a direct internal cross-reference to the termination of parental rights provision, the Legislature has expressed the intent that biological parents whose rights have been judicially terminated have a narrow window of opportunity to seek modification of dispositional orders. The majority wrongly rebuffs that clear legislative intent in order to announce a judicially created social policy that closes the door in child abuse and neglect cases to modification by any natural parent, including those whose parental rights are involuntarily terminated by judicial decree.

Furthermore, by its holding the majority has created a conflict with established case law allowing post-termination visitation. No mention is even made in the majority opinion of the decision authored by Justice Cleckley in 1995 in the case of In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995). The relevant and significant holding in Christina L. involved the recognition that a close emotional bond between a parent and child may exist even when parental rights are terminated in abuse and neglect cases and that continued visitation or other contact may be in the best interests of the child. Id. at Syl. Pt. 5. It is not surprising that the majority ignores Christina L. because any effort to distinguish that case would be at best disingenuous since visitation under Christina L. is conditioned upon the existence of a close emotional bond between the parent and child. Without addressing Christina L., the majority has inappropriately created conflict in this very difficult and particularly sensitive area of the law.

At first blush, the approach taken in the majority opinion seemingly streamlines the adoption process by reducing potential impediments for placement of children who have been victims of abuse and neglect. However, it also turns a blind eye to what the future actually holds for too many of these children. Adoption often is not a viable possibility for "special needs children." Like it or not, the reality is that some children will never be candidates for adoption because of their age, mental or physical disability, race or other factor, and they will simply languish in foster care for any number of years. It is possible that a parent whose rights have been involuntarily terminated could, over time, effect a change in circumstances which would support countermanding the termination decision. It may very well be that it is these children the Legislature contemplated would be protected and served by the policy it adopted by enacting the modification statute and providing that narrow window of opportunity.

I do not understand the majority's desire to so drastically restrict the standing of parents whose rights have been judicially terminated to seek modification. Having standing to apply for modification and attaining modification are far from synonymous. A natural parent seeking to overturn a termination decision has an exceptionally heavy burden to overcome in proving timeliness of the motion, fitness to be a parent, the validity of the claimed change in the parent's errant ways and finally, the lodestar – that the change would be in the best interests of the child. It is the quantum of proof and not the elimination of the opportunity that has governed and should govern the rare modification of termination orders in abuse and neglect cases. See Overfield v. Collins, 199 W. Va. 27, 483 S.E.2d 27 (1996) (setting forth burdens and quantum of proof in proceeding by natural parent to regain custody of child either permanently or temporarily transferred to third party).

In sum, I concur with the majority's affirmance of the rulings of the court below in the instant case because no clear error was proven as to application by the lower court of the facts to the law with regard to voluntary relinquishment of parental rights.[1] However, I adamantly dissent from the majority's reaching beyond the matters fairly arising upon the record in order to foreclose the opportunity of natural parents whose rights have been involuntary terminated to seek modification of dispositional orders in abuse and neglect case. The majority's policy statement is contrary to the expressed intention of the Legislature, is at odds with prior case law regarding post-termination visitation, and engineers a poor social policy by judicial fiat. As a result, I concur, in part, and dissent, in part.

[1]Of course, a person retains standing to challenge the existence of a valid voluntary relinquishment. Although Appellant's contest of the validity of the relinquishment was unsuccessful in this case, that challenge was rejected on the merits by both this Court and the lower court, not on the basis of a lack of standing.

I am authorized to state that Justice Starcher joins in this separate opinion.

This case is not about the mother. It is about Cesar L. It is about his welfare. The mother had counsel. The mother voluntarily relinquished her maternal rights. There was no fraud. There was no duress. This voluntary relinquishment was notarized. Cesar L. is entitled to permanency and stability. Judge Silver ruled correctly and in the best interests of this child. I concur in this affirmation.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "'"Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Per Curiam:

This is an appeal by Wanda S.[1] (hereinafter "Appellant") from a denial of motions for an improvement period and a decision to terminate parental rights to three children, Courtney H., Victoria H., and Charity H. The Appellant alleges that the lower court erred by denying her motions for a post-adjudicatory improvement period and a dispositional improvement period. Based upon this Court's review of the record, briefs, arguments of counsel, and pertinent authorities, we affirm the decision of the lower court and remand with directions to determine whether post-termination visitation between the Appellant and the children should be ordered.

I. Factual and Procedural History

The Appellant and Henry H. are the biological parents of the three children at issue in this appeal, Courtney H., Victoria H. and Charity H.[2] On December 29, 2001, the Appellant transported the children to the State Police barracks in Pendleton County to report allegations of sexual abuse by Henry H., the biological father of the children.[3] Troopers Teter and Kingery of the West Virginia State Police informed the Appellant that she should seek medical and psychological examinations of the children; thus, the Appellant states that she took the children to Rockingham Memorial Hospital in Harrisonburg, Virginia, to be examined for evidence of sexual abuse on or about December 31, 2001. Although the Appellant alleges that a nurse informed her that an examination would be untimely since the children last visited with their father during Thanksgiving 2000, the hospital has no record of the visit. The Appellant next took the children to Winchester Medical Center for a physical examination on April 22, 2002. Forensic Nurse Brenda Adams examined the children and found evidence of sexual abuse and sexual assault in all three children.

On May 6, 2002, the Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR"), through its Child Protective Services worker Cary Waybright, filed an abuse and neglect petition against the Appellant, Henry H., and John S., the Appellant's husband at that time. The petition alleged sexual abuse by Henry H. and further alleged that the Appellant was aware of the abuse but continued to permit the children to visit Henry H. The petition also alleged that the Appellant allowed the children to maintain contact with another known sexual offender, Jackie W., the Appellant's own father. Further, physical abuse, parental abuse of alcohol, and domestic violence were included in the petition.

[3]Henry H. was indicted for these offenses in February 2003. Although his parental rights were also terminated, he is not a party to this appeal. Henry H. has previously been convicted of the offense of third degree sexual assault of a female victim in May 1994. The Appellant and Henry H. had one more child, Charity, after Henry H.'s conviction and were divorced in 1998. At the divorce hearing, the Appellant failed to seek a protective visitation order between the girls and their father, failed to advise the court of Henry H.'s status as a sexual offender, and agreed to regular visitation between the girls and their father. The Appellant has testified during the current proceedings that she did not advise the divorce court of the sexual offenses or seek supervised visitation because she could not imagine that a father would sexually abuse his own daughters, even though she admitted that she had been sexually abused by her own father, Jackie W.

The children were removed from their mother's custody and placed in foster care in Randolph County, where they have remained during the pendency of this action.[4] The DHHR amended the petition on July 24, 2002, to include allegations that John S. physically abused the children, that the Appellant failed to protect the children from that abuse; that the Appellant refused to pay for eye glasses for Courtney; that the Appellant threatened to commit suicide in front of the children; that the Appellant refused to treat the children's head lice; that there were fleas in the carpeting of the Appellant's place of residence; that John S. forced the children to sit of their hands for several hours as punishment for routine offenses;[5] that Henry H. forced the children to watch pornographic

[4]The guardian ad litem for the children, Marla Zelene Harman, reports that the children have adapted well to the foster/pre-adoptive placement, that all three girls are special needs children, and that they have all been diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder, with the middle child showing hostage type symptomology.

[5]The reports also indicated that John S. punished the children by forcing them to stand in the corner for long periods of time based upon perceived transgressions concerning food or the failure to obtain a hand stamp at school. The children had regularly arrived at school with bruises, and teachers reported that the children were afraid to get on movies; that Henry H. engaged in sexual intercourse with the children; and that both Henry H. and Jackie W. are registered sexual offenders with whom the children have regular contact.

In a July 3, 2002, psychological report, Dr. Thomas Stein observed that his examination revealed that the Appellant suffered from post-traumatic stress originating from the sexual abuse she endured in her early adolescence. Although Dr. Stein noted that the Appellant had received some treatment from a licensed professional counselor and earlier treatment following the abuse in Braxton County, Dr. Stein concluded that "it is obvious to this psychologist that those treatments were ineffective in adequately addressing her post-traumatic stress condition." Dr. Stein opined that the Appellant's inability to protect her children originated in her underlying personality which developed from the sexual abuse she suffered as a child. Dr. Stein further explained that the Appellant had sufficient intellectual capacity to benefit from appropriate psychotherapeutic intervention and that the "in-home services related to child management would do nothing to address the issues of [the Appellant's] own previous sexual abuse and concomitant personality tendencies. . . ." Dr.

the school bus to go home in the evenings. The children also reported being hit with flyswatters, wood, and a fishing pole. In 1999, the DHHR entered into a "safety contract" with the family subsequent to an incident in which John S. struck six-year-old Victoria's hands with a board because she had eaten cheese belonging to the Appellant. The Appellant, however, testified during the adjudicatory hearing that she could hardly remember that incident.

Stein concluded that the "likelihood of [the Appellant] fully and completely discharging her parenting responsibilities in an appropriate manner would be dramatically enhanced" after effective treatment. Unfortunately, Dr. Stein did not identify a time span in which improvement could be expected for the Appellant.

An adjudicatory hearing was held on August 5, 2002,[6] and the lower court issued an adjudicatory order on October 8, 2002,[7] finding that each of the children had been neglected and abused by the Appellant, Henry H., and John S. Specifically, the lower court found that Henry H. had sexually abused the children; that John S. had repeatedly physically abused the children; that the Appellant had consistently failed to take protective safety measures by exposing the children to sex offenders, by failing to timely submit the children for medical examinations, and by failing to seek appropriate psychological treatment for the children after the sexual abuse was revealed. The lower court further found that the Appellant had failed to protect the children from the harsh discipline and physical and emotional abuse inflicted by John S., their step-father. The court further emphasized that the Appellant had failed to acknowledge the extent of the abuse or its impact on the children. In an October 16, 2002, child case plan prepared by the DHHR, it was noted that the Appellant had previously failed to cooperate with offered services and that she had repeatedly denied that she or John S. abused the children.[8]

[6]During the adjudicatory hearing, the lower court indicated that it wished to interview the children in chambers. On August 16, 2002, the children and their guardian ad litem were present with the lower court in chambers in Romney, West Virginia. Subsequent to this interview, the parties were provided with an audio tape of the interview by the court reporter. No order or other writing from the lower court addressed what determinations were made based upon the interview or how it influenced the lower court's ruling on the adjudicatory hearing issues.

[7]The original October 8, 2002, adjudicatory order was not forwarded to counsel for the Appellant by the guardian ad litem, Marla Zelene Harman. Thus, a revised adjudicatory order, with slight corrections in the statement of facts, was entered on November 26, 2002.

On October 24, 2002, the Appellant divorced John S., and he was thereafter dismissed from these proceedings. On November 6, 2002, the lower court conducted a hearing on the Appellant's motion for a post-adjudicatory improvement period. The DHHR and the guardian ad litem opposed such motion. The Appellant testified with regard to her ability to fully participate in such improvement period. The lower court also heard the testimony of Ms. Toni Walters, the individual supervising the visits between the Appellant and her children. It appears from the record that Ms. Walters was affiliated with Try Again Homes and was not an employee of the DHHR. Ms. Walters supervised the visitations for approximately five to six months, and her reports indicated that the visitations had been successful and that the Appellant had behaved very appropriately. During the November 6, [8]According to the record in this matter, this family has received social services since approximately 1993 in Braxton and Pendleton Counties. The services have included RESA child service, Potomac Highlands Guild, counseling through a local mental health guild and the Catholic Church, Right from the Start Early Intervention, and Action Youth Care family preservation services on multiple occasions. Courtney had also received a consultation with psychologist Dr. Mario Dennis in 1996 concerning allegations that she had been sexually abused. Dr. Dennis and social workers had advised the Appellant at that time to keep the children away from the Appellant's father, Jackie W.

2002, hearing, Ms. Walters testified that Cary Ours[9] of the DHHR expressed disapproval of the positive remarks made by Ms. Walters concerning the Appellant and indicated to Ms. Walters that "your reports are killing us." Ms. Walters was subsequently removed as the visitation supervisor.

Upon conclusion of the evidence on November 6, 2002, the lower court denied the motion for the post-adjudicatory improvement period, finding that the Appellant had received services for several years to little avail. Specifically, the lower court found that the Appellant failed to keep the children away from their grandfather, a registered sexual offender; failed to keep the children away from their father, a registered sexual offender; and failed to protect the children from the severe physical discipline imposed by John S., even after a "safety agreement" was entered into with the DHHR in August 1999 as a result of John S.'s unreasonable punishment of the children.

A dispositional hearing was conducted on December 9, 2002, and the lower court considered and denied the Appellant's motion for a dispositional improvement period based upon the absence of evidence that she could comply with the requirements of an improvement plan.[10] On January 6, 2003, the lower court entered a dispositional order, finding that the Appellant was unwilling or unable to provide for the children's needs and that she had failed to protect the children from abuse. The court further found that continuation in the home was contrary to the welfare of the children, that the DHHR had made numerous reasonable efforts to preserve the family, and that there was no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect and abuse could be substantially corrected in the near future. The lower court consequently terminated the parental rights of both the Appellant and Henry H.

The Appellant appeals that determination to this Court, contending that the lower court committed reversible error by denying her motions for post-adjudicatory and dispositional improvement periods. The guardian ad litem and DHHR maintain that the lower court's decision was correct and in the best interests of the children since there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect could be substantially corrected in the near future. The guardian ad litem and DHHR further argue that the Appellant has remained in denial regarding the degree and nature of abuse that the children have endured, has failed to respond positively to rehabilitative services offered over many years, and has failed to demonstrate an ability to comply with terms which would be associated with an improvement period.

II. Standard of Review

In appeals from abuse and neglect proceedings, this Court has consistently applied a standard of review subjecting conclusions of law to de novo review and findings of fact to the clearly erroneous standard. In syllabus point one of In re Travis W., 206 W. Va. 478, 525 S.E.2d 669 (1999), this Court stated:

> "'Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.' Syl. Pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996)." Syllabus Point 1, In re George Glen B., 205 W. Va. 435, 518 S.E.2d 863 (1999).

This Court further stated as follows in State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 200 W. Va. 555, 490 S.E.2d 642 (1997): "The above standard of review requires deference by this Court to the findings of a circuit court in a civil abuse and neglect proceeding. The critical nature of unreviewable intangibles justify the deferential approach we accord findings by a circuit court." 200 W. Va. at 562, 490 S.E.2d at 649. In In re Emily & Amos B., 208 W. Va. 325, 540 S.E.2d 542 (2000), this Court also acknowledged the deference owed to the lower court by stating that "the circuit court is the better-equipped tribunal" to make substantive determinations regarding termination of parental rights. 208 W. Va. at 340, 540 S.E.2d at 557 (rejecting allegation that incarceration should automatically result in termination).

III. Discussion

During the pendency of an abuse and neglect proceeding, an individual facing potential termination of parental rights may move the presiding court for an improvement period at several stages of the proceedings. The Appellant in the present case requested an improvement period following the final adjudicatory hearing and again as a dispositional alternative. Statutory authority for these improvement periods is provided in West Virginia Code §§ 49-6-2(b) (1996) (Repl. Vol. 2001), 49-6-5(c) (1998) (Repl. Vol. 2001), and 49-6-12(b) (1996) (Repl. Vol. 2001). West Virginia Code § 49-6-12(b)(2) specifies that entitlement to an improvement period is conditioned upon the ability of the parent/respondent to demonstrate "by clear and convincing evidence, that the respondent is likely to fully participate in the improvement period. . . ." In State ex. rel Virginia M. v. Virgil Eugene S., 197 W. Va. 456, 475 S.E.2d 548 (1996), this Court specified that the most recent statutory enactments clarify that the burden of proof falls upon the parent requesting an improvement period. In footnote nine of Virginia M., this Court explained as follows:

> We note that West Virginia Code § 49-6-12 (1996), recently enacted by the West Virginia Legislature, now requires a parent seeking an improvement period in cases of neglect or abuse to file a written motion requesting it, and to demonstrate by clear and convincing evidence that he or she is likely to fully participate in the improvement period. Thus rather than presuming the entitlement of a parent to an improvement period, as under Cheryl M., . . . the law now places on the parent the burden of proof regarding whether an improvement period is appropriate.

197 W. Va. at 461 n. 9, 475 S.E.2d at 553 n. 9.[11]

Both statutory and case law emphasize that a parent charged with abuse and/or neglect is not unconditionally entitled to an improvement period. Where an improvement period would jeopardize the best interests of the child, for instance, an improvement period will not be granted. As the pertinent part of syllabus point seven of In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991), succinctly emphasizes, [11]The Cheryl M. reference is to State ex rel. West Virginia Dept. of Human Services v. Cheryl M., 177 W. Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987), holding that a parent may move for and be granted an improvement period "unless the court finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial." 177 W. Va. at 691, 356 S.E.2d at 184. In this vein, we hasten to point out that this Court's prior inquiries into what may constitute "compelling circumstances," such as in In re Darla B., 175 W. Va. 137, 331 S.E.2d 868 (1985), were based upon language in a former version of West Virginia Code § 49-6-2, prior to 1996 amendments, which stated that a court was to provide an improvement period unless compelling circumstances indicated otherwise. With the deletion of such language from the statute, the compelling circumstances concept is no longer relevant to this Court's investigation.

> "[C]ourts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened. . . ." Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

See also In re Erica C., ___ W. Va. ___, 589 S.E.2d 517 (2003). Additionally, if a parent is unable to demonstrate an ability to correct the underlying conditions of abuse and/or neglect in the near future, termination of parental rights may proceed without the utilization of an improvement period. See W. Va. Code 49-6-5(a)(6) (1998) (Repl. Vol. 2001). Syllabus point seven of In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996), accentuates this concept, as follows:

> "'Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected.' Syllabus Point 2, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980). Syllabus point 4, In re Jonathan P., 182 W. Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537 (1989)." Syllabus Point 1, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993).

Termination of parental rights is also authorized where a parent contends nonparticipation in acts giving rise to the termination despite the existence of clear and convincing evidence that such nonparticipating parent knowingly took no action to prevent or stop such acts to protect the child. In syllabus point two of In re Scottie D., 185 W. Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214 (1991), this Court explained as follows:

> Termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W.Va.Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such parent contends nonparticipation in the acts giving rise to the termination petition but there is clear and convincing evidence that such nonparticipating parent knowingly took no action to prevent or stop such acts to protect the child. Furthermore, termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W.Va.Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such nonparticipating parent supports the other parent's version as to how a child's injuries occurred, but there is clear and convincing evidence that such version is inconsistent with the medical evidence.

See also Syl. Pt. 3, In re Betty J.W., 179 W. Va. 605, 371 S.E.2d 326 (1988) ("W. Va. Code, 49-1-3(a) (1984), in part, defines an abused child to include one whose parent knowingly allows another person to commit the abuse. Under this standard, termination of parental rights is usually upheld only where the parent takes no action in the face of knowledge of the abuse or actually aids or protects the abusing parent").

A parent's right to an improvement period is carefully defined because the pre-eminent concern in abuse and neglect proceedings is the best interest of the child subject thereto. See Syl. Pt. 3, In re Michael Ray T., 206 W. Va. 434, 525 S.E.2d 315 (1999) ("'Cases involving children must be decided not just in the context of competing sets of adults' rights, but also with a regard for the rights of the child(ren).' Syllabus point 7, In re Brian D., 194 W. Va. 623, 461 S.E.2d 129 (1995).”). As this Court emphasized in syllabus point three of In re Katie S., “‘[a]lthough parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children.’”

In West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ex rel. Wright v. Doris S., 197 W. Va. 489, 475 S.E.2d 865 (1996), this Court addressed a situation similar to the one at bar, stating that:

> [I]n order to remedy the abuse and/or neglect problem, the problem must first be acknowledged. Failure to acknowledge the existence of the problem, i.e., the truth of the basic allegation pertaining to the alleged abuse and neglect or the perpetrator of said abuse and neglect, results in making the problem untreatable and in making an improvement period an exercise in futility at the child’s expense.

197 W. Va. at 498, 475 S.E.2d at 874. The lower court in the present case specifically stated that “I don’t believe that her submissiveness or failure to be assertive can be corrected in any period of time that a[n] . . . improvement period might allow us.” That is precisely the type of factual determination to which this Court must give deference on appellate review.

Based upon the above precedent, as well as our review of the entire record in this case, it is clear that the Appellant failed to present evidence to demonstrate that there was a reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect suffered by her children could be substantially corrected in the near future. Given the Appellant's refusal to acknowledge the seriousness of the continuous abuse her children have suffered, we uphold the lower court's conclusion that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect can be substantially corrected in the near future. The Appellant has simply failed to demonstrate any ability to protect her children from further abuse.

We further conclude that the lower court did not abuse its discretion by denying the requested improvement periods. The lower court's termination of the Appellant's parental rights was supported by clear and convincing evidence and was not clearly erroneous. Finally, we find that the lower court acted in the best interest of the children throughout the underlying proceedings.

IV. Relevant Concerns

While the evidence before the lower court undoubtedly justified its conclusions,[12] and we consequently affirm, there are troubling components of this case that

[12]The lower court quite obviously struggled earnestly with this case. With regard to the Appellant's motion for a post-adjudicatory improvement period, the lower court explained as follows:

> I frankly wanted to try to find some evidence that would convince me that it should be granted, but I think we have to look at the – at the prior experience that has been made here based upon the services that were rendered to her previously and whether or not the referrals were substantiated or not. The

should not elude inquiry. One such issue is the apparent absence of any services directly aimed at remedying the Appellant's underlying personality characteristics which apparently led to her inability to protect her children. An extensive array of in-home parenting services were provided and are documented in the record. Yet, these services were not specifically devised to address the Appellant's real deficiencies. It is fundamentally unfair to castigate the Appellant for failure to improve when the services offered to her were not designed to promote improvement in the specific target area in which she was most deficient. Dr. Stein's opinion indicated that the Appellant could quite possibly, at some unknown point in the future, gain enough confidence and mastery over her own abusive past to become an adequate parent to her daughters. While we are concerned with this situation, the record compels the conclusion, as stated above, that there is no reasonable manner in which to fact remains that services had been rendered to [the Appellant] for a number of years, for at least nine years, and they appear to have done little if any good.

She acknowledges that her latest husband, John, was abusive after the services were rendered. She also acknowledges that she was told to keep the girls away from her father, but yet didn't, knowing that he is a sexual offender, and that she entered into a safety agreement as late as 1999. She says that she's willing to cooperate to do all these things, but her prior experience would – would indicate that she will not follow up with that. Consequently, I cannot grant her motion for an improvement period and would find the basis for same is that her prior refusal to comply with services that have been offered to her.

calculate when or if the Appellant would attain that ability. Thus, the lower court's determinations cannot be deemed erroneous.

Equally troubling in this case is the allegation that a caseworker for the DHHR expressed disapproval of a visitation supervisor's report which cast the Appellant in a positive light. Such expression of displeasure insinuates an adversarial position or an antagonistic approach which is inconsistent with the intended goals and methodology of the DHHR as an entity. West Virginia Code § 49-6D-2 (1984) (Repl. Vol. 2001) specifies that the DHHR's services are intended to provide a mechanism through which "family ties" will be preserved and strengthened where possible, "while recognizing both the fundamental rights of parenthood and the State's responsibility to assist the family in providing the necessary training and education of all children. . . ." The legislature has provided for "the offering of opportunities by the department whereby parents, guardians or custodians and their children may avail themselves of public and private resources offering programs and services which are primarily preventive and nonpunitive and geared toward a rehabilitation of the home and a treatment of the underlying factors which cause or tend to cause abuse and neglect. . . ." W. Va. Code § 49-6D-2(b)(1) (emphasis supplied). The legislature also states that the DHHR's objectives shall be carried out in a manner which ensures that assistance will be provided "without fear by the citizens that the State's exercise of that responsibility will be unfairly used as a means of terminating family ties[.]" W. Va. Code § 49-6D-2(b)(6). The praise of failure and the deprecation of success are concepts completely incongruous with the stated legislative purpose of providing nonpunitive assistance and insulating the parent from fear that the State will use its power unfairly.

We further note that the Appellant was frequently encouraged by the DHHR to separate herself and her children from her husband John, due to his abusive tendencies. She accomplished this goal by divorcing John, possibly in the expectation that the divorce would enhance the possibility of regaining custody of her children. The record also reflects, however, that the Appellant and John may still maintain a relationship of some nature.

V. Right to Continued Association

The record clearly reveals that an emotional bond exists between the Appellant and her children. Throughout the proceedings, the visitations have progressed well, and the children have expressed interest in continuing to maintain a relationship with their mother.[13] Based upon this emotional bond, as well as the efforts demonstrated by the [13]The Appellant energetically participated in regular visitations with the children, as scheduled by the DHHR. Toni Walters, as supervisor of the visits, indicated that the time the mother spent with the girls was very beneficial and productive. The supervisor indicated in one of her visitation reports that she was "impressed with how the visits are going." "This supervisor has only been able to report positive things about this family." The supervisor stated that the children "adore" their mother, that the mother engages in "'hands on' interactions during the visits," that she "brings a picnic lunch, not McDonalds, but the things to make sandwiches together." The supervisor stated that she was "impressed with this family and feels positive about the reunification."

Appellant with regard to counseling, divorcing her husband, and actively seeking a relationship with her children, the lower court, upon remand, shall examine the emotional bond between the Appellant and her children. The lower court may grant the Appellant post-termination visitation with the children, provided that such continued relationship is in the children's best interests and "would not unreasonably interfere with their permanent placement." State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W. Va. 251, 260, 470 S.E.2d 205, 214 (1996). As this Court explained in syllabus point eight of In re Katie S.,

> "When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest." Syllabus Point 5, In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995).

198 W. Va. at 82, 479 S.E.2d at 592; see also Syl. Pt. 11, In re Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996) ("A child has a right to continued association with individuals with whom he has formed a close emotional bond, including foster parents, provided that a determination is made that such continued contact is in the best interests of the child").

Thus, upon remand, the lower court is instructed to hear argument from all parties on this issue of post-termination visitation and take additional evidence, if necessary, to determine whether continued visitation or other contact with the Appellant is in the best interests of the children.

VI. Conclusion

For the reasons set forth above, the final order of the Circuit Court of Pendleton County is affirmed, and this case is remanded with directions.

Affirmed and remanded with directions.

OF WEST VIRGINIA

Davis, J., dissenting:

In this case the majority has affirmed a decision of the circuit court terminating a mother's parental rights without first giving her the benefit of either a post-adjudicatory or pre-disposition improvement period.[1] Given the particular facts presented in this case, the result reached by the majority is simply wrong. I strongly believe that the appellant, Wanda S., was entitled to the benefit of an improvement period before the decision to terminate her parental rights was made. For this reason, I dissent.

While the evidence in this case makes clear that past efforts to provide services to Wanda S. had not been successful, the record is equally clear that the services in no way addressed Wanda S.'s fundamental problem, her post-traumatic stress condition. As the majority opinion recognizes, a psychological report filed by Dr. Thomas Stein opined that Wanda S.'s "inability to protect her children originated in her underlying personality which developed from the sexual abuse she suffered as a child." Maj. op. at 4. Dr. Stein concluded that the "likelihood of [Wanda S.] fully and completely discharging her parenting responsibilities in an appropriate manner would be dramatically enhanced" following effective treatment.

I believe that Dr. Stein' conclusions, when considered along with the steps this woman did take to protect her children, i.e. reporting their sexual abuse when she became aware of it, divorcing her abusive husband, and the positive reports generated from her visits with her children following their removal from her home, constitute clear and convincing evidence that Wanda S. was "likely to fully participate in the improvement period . . . ." W. Va. Code § 49-6-12(b)(2) (1996) (Repl. Vol. 2001). Consequently, Wanda S. should have been granted an improvement period before any decision of whether or not to terminate her parental rights was made.[2]

In view of the foregoing, I respectfully dissent.

[2]When considering the result reached in this case in connection with another case rendered this Term of Court the message the majority seems to be sending is that when a young man is subjected to sexual abuse as a child, and as a result thereof he becomes a sexual predator who prays on young children, he is deserving of every conceivable chance that may be given him. Conversely, when a woman has been subjected to sexual abuse as a child, and as a result thereof she does not become a sexual predator, but by virtue of the emotional scars of her abuse finds herself unable to protect her children from abuse at the hands of others, she is not deserving of a reasonable chance to receive appropriate psychotherapeutic intervention prior to having her parental rights to her children terminated.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. Syl. Pt. 2, In re Beth Ann B., 204 W. Va. 424, 513 S.E.2d 472 (1998).

3. In a child abuse and neglect proceeding where abandonment of the child by either or both biological parents is alleged and proven, the circuit court should decide in the dispositional phase of the proceeding whether to terminate any or all parental rights to the child. Before making that decision, even where there are written relinquishments of parental rights, the circuit court is required to conduct a disposition hearing, pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5 (1999) and Rules 33 and 35 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, at which the issue of such termination is specifically and thoroughly addressed.

Scott, Justice:

In this original-jurisdiction proceeding, the petitioner, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR"), seeks a writ of mandamus compelling the respondent, the Honorable George W. Hill, Jr., Judge of the Circuit Court of Wood County, to conduct disposition hearings pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5 (1999) in six child abuse and neglect cases in order to resolve the status of the parental rights of the biological fathers, who allegedly abandoned their children. In each case, the mother's parental rights have been terminated, but the respondent judge has left unresolved the issue of whether the father's parental rights should be terminated. Under the circumstances of the cases before us, we conclude that disposition hearings regarding termination of the fathers' parental rights are required as part of the abuse and neglect proceedings. Accordingly, the writ of mandamus is granted.

I.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

The six abuse and neglect cases giving rise to this mandamus action involve a combined total of eleven children, who have been adjudged abused and neglected, and seven biological fathers,[1] who have allegedly abandoned their children.[2] While the cases differ somewhat factually, they share two important commonalities--(1) DHHR filed a child abuse and neglect petition in the Circuit Court of Wood County seeking, inter alia, termination of the father's parental rights, and (2) the respondent judge refused and/or failed to conduct a disposition hearing on the issue of whether the father's parental rights should be terminated. The salient facts in each case are outlined below.

[1] Hereinafter, we use the word "father" to refer to a biological father.

[2] DHHR indicates in its petition for writ of mandamus that the fathers in these cases are either "unknown" or have "otherwise abandoned" their children. In In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995), this Court recognized that abandonment of a child by a parent "constitutes grounds for termination of parental rights." Id. at 456, 460 S.E.2d at 702.

A. Chastity D.,[3] James D., Leslie C., Rosemarie C., Jeffrey I., Jr., Priscilla I., and Brandy W.

In four of the abuse and neglect cases, Judge Hill entered an "agreed" order terminating the parental rights of the "unknown" father without a disposition hearing. Each "agreed" order was signed by counsel for the father, the assistant prosecuting attorney, and the children's guardian ad litem.[4] The children involved in these cases are Chastity D., James D., Leslie C., Rosemarie C., Jeffrey I., Jr., Priscilla I., and Brandy W.[5]

The four agreed orders were substantially the same, each stating that "the parties advised the Court that the respondent-unknown father waived the adjudicatory and dispositional hearings and it being in the best interests of the child the parties agree that the unknown father's parental rights should be TERMINATED to the above-named children." The orders contained specific findings, including "that the respondent-father neglected the above-named children in that he has abandoned the said child [sic];

[3] We adhere to our usual practice in family law cases involving sensitive facts and use initials to identify the parties rather than their full names. See In re Beth Ann B., 204 W. Va. 424, 425 n.1, 513 S.E.2d 472, 473 n.1 (1998); State ex rel. Paul B. v. Hill, 201 W. Va. 248, 250 n.1, 496 S.E.2d 198, 200 n.1 (1997); In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 83 n.2, 479 S.E.2d 589, 593 n.2 (1996).

[4] The validity of the consent given by the attorneys for the fathers is not at issue. But we are mystified by the practice illustrated upon the record of these cases whereby an agreed order is signed by the attorney for an "unknown" father, ostensibly signifying the father's consent to termination of his parental rights, when the attorney has never met nor spoken with his or her client. Obviously, an attorney cannot consent to, waive, or surrender any rights of a client who is unknown or cannot be located. Under such circumstances, the only way in which an "unknown" father's parental rights can be terminated is upon a proper hearing pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5.

[5] There is no indication of the children's ages on the limited record before us.

that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect . . . can be substantially corrected in the near future; . . . and that the Court has no other recourse than to terminate the parental rights of the respondent-father . . . ." In addition, Judge Hill awarded DHHR legal and physical custody of the children and authorized DHHR to consent to their adoption.[6]

B. Chrystal M., Shane M., and Cynthia M.

The fifth abuse and neglect case concerned several children, but the instant mandamus petition relates to only three of those children: Chrystal M., born March 7, 1979; Shane M., born July 10, 1986; and Cynthia M., born November 27, 1987. Because Chrystal M. is now twenty years old and no longer subject to the circuit court's jurisdiction for purposes of abuse and neglect proceedings,[7] our decision herein does not pertain to her.

On March 14, 1996, DHHR filed a petition alleging, inter alia, that Shane M. and Cynthia M. were abused or neglected children. In the petition, the children's mother was identified as Donna M., and their father was identified as Steve A., address unknown. DHHR alleged that the children were residing [6] The agreed order in the Chastity D. and James D. matter was entered on July 22, 1999. The agreed order in the case involving Rosemarie C., Jeffrey I., Jr., and Priscilla I. was entered on July 23, 1999. The agreed order in the Leslie C. matter was entered on July 27, 1999, and the agreed order in the Brandy W. matter was entered on August 4, 1999.

[7] West Virginia Code § 49-1-2 (1999) defines a "child" as used in chapter 49 to mean "any person under eighteen years of age." Thus, a circuit court's jurisdiction over a child abuse and neglect proceeding, governed by article 6 of chapter 49, terminates when the child turns eighteen. In this particular case, the abuse and neglect proceeding should have been dismissed as to Chrystal M. when she attained the age of eighteen.

with their mother and Phillip B.[8] at a certain Parkersburg address. The petition contained specific allegations of physical abuse by Donna M. and implicated both Donna M. and Phillip B. as being guilty of neglect. At the close of the petition, DHHR requested that the "parental rights of the aforementioned parents . . . be permanently terminated . . . ."[9]

On March 14, 1996, Judge Hill entered an order which found imminent danger to the physical well being of the children and directed that they be delivered into the custody of DHHR, pending a preliminary hearing. In the order, notice was given of a preliminary hearing and a "final hearing" on March 21, 1996, at 3 p.m. and April 26, 1996, at 1:15 p.m., respectively. At the conclusion of the order, the clerk of the court was directed to deliver copies of the petition, order, and notice to the county sheriff to be served upon the children's mother and Phillip B., who were "made the Respondents to this cause." In addition, attorneys were appointed to represent the designated respondents and the children. This order made no mention of Steve A., the children's father.

Following the preliminary hearing on March 21, 1996, the respondent judge entered an order on March 22, 1996, awarding DHHR temporary custody of the children and granting the "respondent-

[8] Phillip B. is the father of two children who were named in the abuse and neglect petition but are not involved in this mandamus action.

[9] The sufficiency of the abuse and neglect petition is not at issue here. We observe, however, that given DHHR's apparent belief that the father of Shane M. and Cynthia M. had abandoned them, the facts relating thereto should have been alleged in the petition. In syllabus point one of Katie S., this Court held that a non-custodial parent can be found to have abused and neglected his or her child, expressly overruling State ex rel. McCartney v. Nuzum, 161 W.Va. 740, 248 S.E.2d 318 (1978). 198 W. Va. at 86, 479 S.E.2d at 596.

parents" a six-month improvement period.

On January 16, 1997, DHHR filed a supplemental abuse and neglect petition alleging sexual abuse of the children by their mother and Phillip B. On April 4, 1997, May 21, 1997, and June 13, 1997, an adjudicatory hearing took place, and on July 9, 1997, an adjudicatory order was entered, finding the children were abused and neglected and the abuse and neglect was inflicted by Donna M. and Phillip B. Upon these findings, it was ordered that temporary legal and physical custody of the children remain with DHHR. Also, in the adjudicatory order, Judge Hill set a date and time for the disposition hearing and directed the court clerk to provide a certified copy of the order to the "parties."

On August 4, 1997, Judge Hill held a disposition hearing, and on August 20, 1997, a disposition order was entered which terminated the parental rights of Donna M. and Phillip B. The order was silent regarding the parental rights of Steve A. As indicated earlier, previous orders did not recognize Steve A. as a party to the proceeding, even though he was named in the abuse and neglect petition and DHHR requested termination of his parental rights.

On September 23, 1999, Judge Hill entered an agreed order, signed by the assistant prosecuting attorney and guardian ad litem, continuing DHHR's custody of the children.[10]

[10] Previously, on August 27, 1999, the respondent judge had entered an order granting DHHR permission to authorize separate placement and adoption of the children.

The sixth abuse and neglect case now in question involves Ciera Faith S. and her putative father, with regard to whom no disposition hearing has been held. On September 23, 1999, Judge Hill conducted a hearing on an amended abuse and neglect petition, filed by DHHR, pertaining to the "unknown" father of Ciera Faith S.[11] At the hearing, the assistant prosecuting attorney, who was serving as counsel for DHHR, stated that DHHR sought to have the "unknown" father "adjudicated of neglect by virtue of abandonment." The prosecuting attorney acknowledged that the child's mother alleged a man named James S. was the father and that "[h]e was to come in for a [paternity] test and never did."[12] In addition, the prosecuting attorney stated that Ciera Faith S. was going through an adoption. Thereafter, the following exchange ensued between Judge Hill and the prosecuting attorney:

> THE COURT: That is fine. Go through with the adoption.
> MS. LITTLE: That is where we run into problems. The department has a policy --
> THE COURT: The hell with their policy. I don't approve of their policy. That is an order of the Court. I see nothing to do but to proceed with the adoption. I am going to overrule the objection of the department when it comes to that. Their policies are not set by statute.

Later during the September 23, 1999, hearing, the child's guardian ad litem expressed her concern about going through with the adoption given the unaddressed allegation that James S. was Ciera Faith S.'s father. Judge Hill abruptly dismissed this concern, stating: "The adoption statute provides if there is no father. Okay. This is a waste of time and money, and a waste of the lawyer's time and the taxpayer's money, and abuse and neglect proceedings. The policy of the department is just wasteful of everybody's time, including theirs."

On October 1, 1999, Judge Hill entered an order which declared: "this proceeding with regard to the respondent-father's parental rights is moot and shall be considered at the adoption hearing." By the same order, Judge Hill dismissed the case from the circuit court's docket.

II.

STANDARD FOR WRIT OF MANDAMUS

This case is before this Court on the petition of DHHR seeking the extraordinary remedy of mandamus. The standard for determining whether issuance of a writ of mandamus is proper in a particular case entails a three-prong inquiry:

> " ' "A writ of mandamus will not issue unless three elements coexist -- (1) a clear legal right in the petitioner to the relief sought; (2) a legal duty on the part of respondent to do the thing which the petitioner seeks to compel; and (3) the absence of another adequate remedy." Syllabus Point 1, State ex rel. Billy Ray C. v. Skaff, 190 W.Va. 504, 438 S.E.2d 847 (1993); Syllabus Point 2, State ex rel. Kucera v. City of Wheeling, 153 W.Va. 538, 170 S.E.2d 367 (1969).' Syllabus point 2, Staten v. Dean, 195 W.Va. 57, 464 S.E.2d 576 (1995)." Syllabus point 2, Ewing v. Board of Education of Summers County, 202 W.Va. 228, 503 S.E.2d 541 (1998).

Syl. Pt. 1, State ex rel. ACF Indus., Inc. v. Vieweg, 204 W.Va. 525, 533-34, 514 S.E.2d 176, 184-85 (1999). Thus, our task is to ascertain whether DHHR has satisfied these criteria and thereby demonstrated its entitlement to mandamus relief. See id. at 534, 514 S.E.2d at 185.

III.

DISCUSSION

Following this standard, we consider (1) whether DHHR has a "clear legal right" to the writ of mandamus compelling Judge Hill to conduct disposition hearings in the abuse and neglect cases now before us; (2) whether Judge Hill has a "legal duty" to do that which DHHR seeks to compel; and (3) whether mandamus relief is the only "adequate remedy" available to DHHR.

In our analysis, we explore one determinative question: In each of the six abuse and neglect cases, was Judge Hill required to hold a disposition hearing and decide whether the father's parental rights should be terminated during the abuse and neglect proceeding? For the reasons outlined below, we answer it affirmatively.

This Court has repeatedly condemned the practice of failing to determine the status of the father's parental rights during an abuse and neglect proceeding. In In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995), an abuse and neglect case in which the natural mother's parental rights to two children were terminated, this Court found it was reversible error for the Circuit Court of Wood County to authorize DHHR to consent to the children's adoption without addressing the father's parental rights. Even though the father was named in the abuse and neglect petition filed by DHHR, and it was alleged in the petition that he resided "somewhere in Parkersburg" and had not been in contact with the children for a number of years, the circuit court failed to include him in the proceeding. We identified two serious problems with the circuit court's approach in that case. First, it "strips [the father] . . . of any parental rights without affording him due process." Id. at 455, 460 S.E.2d at 701. Second, and "[p]erhaps even more importantly, it leaves the status of the children dangling, and the validity of a future adoption subject to challenge." Id. Based on this rationale, we forcefully rejected DHHR's argument that the father could move to protect his rights if and when persons to adopt the children were found:

> It would be ludicrous for this Court to allow this matter to linger while Christina and Kenneth are in foster care. Should they be fortunate enough to form a bond with their foster parents and the foster parents move for adoption, it would be all the more devastating to the children to have to go back into court to litigate whatever rights the natural father may possess. Dangling, unresolved parental rights also have a chilling effect on potential adoptive parents. We choose to resolve this issue in a timely manner rather than to leave this potential timebomb unresolved.

In In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996), this Court reiterated its concern for resolution of the status of the father's parental rights as part of the abuse and neglect proceeding. The abuse and neglect petition filed by DHHR in Katie S. sought termination of the parental rights of both parents of two children. The father was named in the petition; his address was listed as "unknown;" and the evidence strongly suggested that he had abandoned his children. At the end of the disposition hearing, the circuit court terminated the mother's parental rights, but found that the father was not a proper party and dismissed him. On review, this Court was critical of the fact that "no action was taken [by the circuit court] concerning the parental rights of the children's father":

> We again emphasize that the practice of waiting until adoption proceedings to determine the status of such a parent's parental rights, leaves "the children in 'No Man's Land' with regard to any resolution in their lives," may discourage persons who want to adopt the children, and leaves "the > validity of a future adoption subject to challenge" (when due process has not been afforded to a natural parent). In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. at 455-56, 460 S.E.2d at 701-2.

198 W. Va. at 85-86, 479 S.E.2d at 595-96. We concluded in Katie S. that "the circuit court should have considered the allegation that the father had abandoned his children when the abuse and neglect petition was presented." Id. at 87, 479 S.E.2d at 597. Therefore, we directed the circuit court to consider upon remand the issue of the father's parental rights. Id.

In two of the cases sub judice, the respondent judge did not decide whether the father's parental rights should be terminated.[13] Judge Hill's failure to resolve the status of the father's parental rights was clearly contrary to both Christina L. and Katie S. By leaving "[d]angling, unresolved parental rights" in these cases, Judge Hill created a "potential timebomb" which, if left unattended, could obliterate the children's chances of being placed into adoptive homes.[14] Christina L., 194 W. Va. at 456, 460 S.E.2d at 702.

For these reasons, we conclude that the respondent judge should have resolved the status of the father's parental rights in all six abuse and neglect cases here presented. We further conclude, under well-settled law, that a disposition hearing was necessary to make such a determination.

[13] As discussed in Part I, supra, in the other four cases, Judge Hill terminated the father's parental rights by entry of an agreed order and without a disposition hearing, an approach which violates Rules 33 and 35 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings. See supra note 4 and infra note 15.

[14] Pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(6), "[n]o adoption of a child shall take place until all proceedings for termination of parental rights under this article and appeals thereof are final." Thus, where an abuse and neglect proceeding has been instituted seeking termination of the father's parental rights, timely resolution of the status of the father's rights is crucial.

West Virginia Code § 49-6-5, the statute governing the dispositional phase of abuse and neglect proceedings, provides in relevant part: "The court shall forthwith proceed to disposition giving both the petitioner [normally DHHR] and respondents [normally the child's parents] an opportunity to be heard." W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a).

Recently, in In re Beth Ann B., 204 W. Va. 424, 513 S.E.2d 472 (1998), this Court spoke succinctly on the requirement of a disposition hearing. The sole issue in Beth Ann B. was whether a circuit court may terminate parental rights in a child abuse and neglect proceeding without first conducting a disposition hearing, when the parent has signed an agreed order containing stipulations of facts which, if proven, would support a termination of parental rights under West Virginia Code § 49-6-5. Despite the existence of such an agreed order, signed by the children's natural mother and her counsel, we decided that a disposition hearing was required and reversed the decision of the circuit court. In syllabus point two of Beth Ann B., we held:

> In a child abuse and/or neglect proceeding, even where the parties have stipulated to the predicate facts necessary for a termination of parental rights, a circuit court must hold a disposition hearing, in which the specific inquiries enumerated in Rules 33 and 35 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings are made, prior to terminating an individual's parental rights.

Id. at 425, 513 S.E.2d at 473. Our holding was based upon the statutory scheme applicable in child abuse and neglect proceedings and the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings.[15] In reaching our holding, we stated:

[15] The Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings were adopted by order of this Court on December 5, 1996, and became effective on January 1, 1997.

> Clearly, the statutory scheme contemplates a disposition hearing prior to termination of an individual's parental rights. This Court recognized as much in syllabus point one of West Virginia Department of Welfare ex rel. Eyster v. Keesee, 171 W.Va. 1, 297 S.E.2d 200 (1982), where we held:
>
> > "West Virginia Code, Chapter 49, Article 6, Section 2, as amended, and the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions prohibit a court or other arm of the State from terminating the parental rights of a natural parent having legal custody of his child, without notice and the opportunity for a meaningful hearing." Syl. pt. 2, In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973).
> Our decision in Keesee preceded the advent of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, adopted by order of this Court on December 5, 1996, and effective on January 1, 1997. But the mandatory prerequisite of a disposition hearing where parental rights are being terminated is plainly incorporated in the Rules.

204 W. Va. at 428, 513 S.E.2d at 476; see also Syl. Pt. 2, In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973) ("West Virginia Code, Chapter 49, Article 6, Section 2, as amended, and the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions prohibit a court or other arm of the State from terminating the parental rights of a natural parent having legal custody of his child, without notice and the opportunity for a meaningful hearing."); In re Sutton, 132 W. Va. 875, 880, 53 S.E.2d 839, 842 (1949) ("A parent, in our opinion, cannot be divested of parental rights without notice and opportunity for hearing.").

In every case now before this Court, Judge Hill failed to hold a disposition hearing, which we have previously found to be a "mandatory prerequisite" to the termination of parental rights. Beth Ann B., 204

W. Va. at 428, 513 S.E.2d at 476. Because we have determined that Judge Hill should have decided whether to terminate each father's parental rights during the abuse and neglect proceeding, as discussed above, we must also conclude that he should have conducted a disposition hearing prior to rendering that decision.

Accordingly, under the facts of the cases before us, we hold that in a child abuse and neglect proceeding where abandonment of the child by either or both biological parents is alleged and proven, the circuit court should decide in the dispositional phase of the proceeding whether to terminate any or all parental rights to the child. Before making that decision, even where there are written relinquishments of parental rights, the circuit court is required to conduct a disposition hearing, pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5 (1999) and Rules 33 and 35 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, at which the issue of such termination is specifically and thoroughly addressed. Adoption proceedings should not be burdened unnecessarily with this issue.

IV.

CONCLUSION

Based upon the foregoing, we conclude that the three criteria for mandamus relief, discussed in Part II, are fully satisfied. Therefore, we grant the writ of mandamus requested by DHHR and order Judge Hill to hold a proper disposition hearing in each case in order to address and resolve the issue of whether the father's parental rights should be terminated.

Writ granted as moulded.

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia

STATE ex rel. W.VA. DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN SERVICES

v.

CHERYL M., et al.

No. 17156

April 2, 1987

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions." Syllabus Point 1, In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973).

2. W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), permits a parent to move the court for an improvement period which shall be allowed unless the court finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial.

3. Under W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), when an improvement period is authorized, then the court by order shall require the Department of Human Services to prepare a family case plan pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3 (1984).

4. Under W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3 (1984), the Department of Human Services is required to prepare a family case plan with participation by the parties and their counsel and to submit it to the court for approval within thirty days.

5. The purpose of the family case plan as set out in W.Va.Code, 49-6D- 3(a) (1984), is to clearly set forth an organized, realistic method of identifying family problems and the logical steps to be used in resolving or lessening these problems.

J. David Judy, III, Judy & Judy, Moorefield, for appellant.

Kenneth Knopf, Asst. Atty. Gen., Charleston, William Bean, Pros. Atty., Moorefield, for appellee.

MILLER, Justice:

Cheryl M. appeals from the final order of the Circuit Court of Hardy County which terminated her parental rights to her infant child, Amanda. See footnote 1 She assigns as error the trial court's retention of temporary custody of Amanda beyond statutory limits, the trial court's failure to allow a statutory improvement period, and the trial court's failure to adopt the least restrictive alternative that is appropriate to the circumstances.

Cheryl M. and Mark J. are the natural parents of Amanda, born July 19, 1983, in the State of Maine where her parents were residents. See footnote 2 In April, 1984, Cheryl and Amanda came to Wardensville, West Virginia, to see Mark, who was traveling with a carnival which was giving a performance in that area. The child abuse incident occurred during Cheryl's argument with Mark over his lack of monetary support.

The argument began at the motel where he was staying with his cousin and her husband who also worked for the carnival. They claimed that Cheryl dropped the baby while arguing with Mark. Cheryl claimed she placed Amanda on Mark's bed. The argument continued outside where Mark's relatives claimed Cheryl dropped Amanda. Cheryl stated she slipped on wet grass, fell, and the baby landed on top of her. The final incident occurred when she placed the baby on an open porch while still arguing with Mark and the baby rolled to the edge, but was caught by Mark.

Dr. Thomas Peck, examining Amanda at the DHS's request on the day of the incident, found a "well child physically" of average height and weight. He concluded, "I see no evidence on my exam to support that there has been significant injury from this abuse event." X-rays revealed no evidence of any acute or chronic trauma. A medical report submitted by Dr. E.R. Caldwell, III, of a May 21, 1984 examination stated that Amanda's growth and development were normal and her EEG was also found to be completely normal. The doctor concluded she appeared healthy and was social and smiling.

On April 28, 1984, after this incident, the West Virginia Department of Human Services (DHS), was called and took physical custody of Amanda. A petition requesting temporary custody filed later that day was granted by the Circuit Court of Hardy County. See footnote 3 The DHS in its petition did not address the availability of alternatives other than the impossibility of transferring physical custody to the father who worked for a carnival. The circuit court made no finding about alternatives less restrictive than the removal of the child and placed physical custody with the DHS which, in turn, placed Amanda in a foster home.

On May 10, 1984, at the preliminary hearing, the DHS recommended that Amanda be returned, through the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children, See footnote 4 to the State of Maine. This would permit the Maine Department of Human Services to supervise her reunification with her mother who had family living in Maine. Cheryl and court-appointed counsel for Amanda concurred with this recommendation. The circuit court deferred acting on this motion and requested that the DHS obtain a placement plan from the Maine Department of Human Services. See footnote 5 The circuit court continued temporary custody of Amanda with the DHS pending receipt of a plan for services from the State of Maine. Cheryl returned to Maine in anticipation of her child following.

Maine submitted a plan dated July 16, 1984, to the DHS, which was received on July 23, 1984. The DHS sent the plan to the circuit court on September 12, 1984, including it as an attachment in a request for termination of all parental rights. At an October 16, 1984 hearing, the DHS obtained permission to amend its petition to terminate Cheryl's parental rights. Cheryl, who had recently returned from Maine, See footnote 6 appeared at this hearing.

On November 7, 1984, the DHS filed its amended petition requesting the termination of Cheryl's parental rights. On November 15, 1984, Cheryl through her attorney filed a response to the amended petition in which she sought an improvement period. The court held a hearing on December 13, 1984, in which the facts surrounding the original abuse were developed and a finding of abuse and neglect was made, but no action was taken to terminate Cheryl's parental rights or on her request for an improvement period. Further hearings were held on April 15 and 18 and July 8, 1985, and at the July hearing, the parental rights were terminated.

This Court has long recognized the constitutional protections surrounding the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant children, stating in Syllabus Point 1 of In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973):

> "In the law concerning cust ody of m inor children, no rule is m ore firm ly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is param ount to that of any other person; it is a fundam ental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions."

See also State v. T.C., 172 W.Va. 47, 303 S.E.2d 685 (1983); State ex rel. Miller v. Locke, 162 W.Va. 946, 253 S.E.2d 540 (1979).

We relied in Willis on Stanley v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 645, 651, 92 S.Ct. 1208, 1213, 31 L.Ed.2d 551, 559 (1972), where the United States Supreme Court stated:

> "The integrity of the fam ily unit ha s found protection in the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Am endment, Meyer v. Nebras ka, [262 U.S. 390, 399, 43 S.Ct. 625, 626-27, 67 L.Ed. 1042 (1923)] , the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Am endment, Skinner v. Ok lahoma, [316 U.S. 535, 541, 62 S.Ct. 1110, 1113, 86 L.Ed. 1655 (1942)] , and the Ninth Amendment, Griswold v. Connectic ut, 381 U.S. 479, 496, 85 S.Ct. 1678, 1688, 14 L.Ed.2d 510 (1965) (Goldberg, J., concurring)."

Stanley retains its constitutional vitality as is evidenced by Santosky v. Kramer, 455 U.S. 745, 753, 102 S.Ct. 1388, 1394-95, 71 L.Ed.2d 599, 606 (1982), where the Supreme Court, after concluding that parental rights cannot be terminated under the due process clause upon less than a "clear and convincing" evidence standard, declared:

> "The fundam ental liberty interest of natural parents in the care, custody, and m anagement of their child does not evaporate sim ply because they have not been m odel parents or have lost tem porary custody of their child to the State. Even when blood relations hips are strained, parents retain a vital interest in preventing the irretrieva ble destruction of their family life." See footnote 7

Our statute, W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(c) (1984), also requires "clear and convincing" proof. In Interest of S.C., 168 W.Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981).

W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), See footnote 8 permits a parent to move the court for an improvement period which shall be allowed unless the court finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial. We explained in State v. Scritchfield, 167 W.Va. 683, 692-93, 280 S.E.2d 315, 321 (1981):

> "Clearly, the statute presumes the entitle ment of a parent to an opportunity to ameliorate the conditions or circumstances upon which a child neglect or abuse proceeding is based pending final adjudication, no doubt in recognition of the fundam ental right of a parent to the custody of m inor children until the unfitness of the parent is proven. See, e.g., In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973). The statute perm its the court to deny such a request only upon a finding of 'compelling circumstances.' "
> See also In re Thaxton, 172 W.Va. 429, 307 S.E.2d 465 (1983).

Once the DHS amended its petition seeking permanent custody of Amanda, Cheryl moved the court for an improvement period. The trial court did not rule on the motion until the final adjudicatory hearing in July, 1985, when the court in effect denied it by terminating her parental rights. The court reasoned that for all practical purposes an improvement period had existed since the first hearing.

This conclusion cannot be supported by the facts. We can only conclude that the DHS provided, at best, only minimal assistance and that, although Cheryl cooperated, the DHS never altered its position that her parental rights should be terminated. As we have earlier noted, this position was taken by the DHS in its September 12, 1984 report to the court, See footnote 9 before Cheryl had returned to this State. The initial basis for the recommendation for total parental severance was based on what appears to be a misreading by the DHS of the Maine report of July 16, 1984, See footnote 10 which was received by the DHS on July 23, 1984. This was clarified in Maine's letter of October 12, 1984. See footnote 11

In October, 1984, Cheryl had contact with the DHS and followed its recommendation to utilize the local mental health agency. From November through December 13, 1984, the DHS paid for this counseling. At a hearing in April, 1985, Nikki Kesner, Cheryl's counselor at the mental health agency, testified that in December, 1984, the DHS indicated it would no longer pay for Cheryl's counseling. This was apparently because the counseling was in opposition to their position favoring removal of the child from Cheryl.

Ms. Kesner testified that as part of her counseling on parenting skills, she requested increased visitation between Cheryl and Amanda from only one hour once a week. She stated the DHS denied her request. According to Ms. Kesner, Cheryl continued working with the mental health agency after the DHS stopped paying for her sessions. She testified that Cheryl cooperatedand progressed in her skill level during these sessions. She also testified that she saw no imminent danger in reunifying Cheryl with her child.

A DHS social worker testified that Cheryl had been given material on budgeting and meal planning which she read, but did not extensively discuss. Cheryl was said to be cooperative, but reserved by the DHS personnel. They admitted that her attitude might be a result of its petition to sever her rights.

In October, 1984, after Cheryl had returned to this State, the DHS did assist her in finding a trailer to live in, but it lacked a cook stove. In January, 1985, the pipes in the trailer froze. Subsequently, Cheryl moved in with her boyfriend who was employed and whom she later married. The DHS worker commented that she had found the trailer to be clean and neat.

The DHS also encouraged Cheryl to find a job at a local chicken processing plant. She applied, but the plant had no permanent jobs available. She was placed on the on-call list which meant that if an employee was off, she might be called to fill-in. She was called twice in a ten-day interval. Cheryl then decided to maintain her steady work as a waitress and cashier at a local supper club. Because her child was in a foster home, she was not eligible for any regular benefits from the DHS.

Part of the problem in this case is the lack of a court-approved family case plan. As a result of a 1984 amendment to W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b), See footnote 12 when an improvement period is authorized, then the court by order shall require the DHS to prepare a family case plan pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3 (1984). Under W.Va.Code,

49-6D-3, the DHS is required to prepare a family case plan with participation by the parties and their counsel and to submit it to the court for approval within thirty days. See footnote 13 The purpose of the family case plan as set out in V.Va.Code, 49-6D-3(a), "is to clearly set forth an organized, realistic method of identifying family problems and the logical steps to be used in resolving or lessening these problems." See footnote 14

This case aptly illustrates the legislative wisdom behind W.Va.Code, 49-6D- 3. It is designed to foreclose a natural parent from being placed in an amphorous improvement period where there are no detailed standards by which the improvement steps can be measured. It also provides a meaningful blueprint that the DHS can monitor and which will also give the court specific information to determine whether the terms of the improvement period were met. Without such a plan, a court is then confronted with general testimony as to whether the natural parent has shown the requisite "improvement."

The point that bears emphasizing is that under W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b), the family case plan is triggered when a court orders an improvement period. Here, the court took no formal action to order an improvement period and, as a consequence, there was never any court-approved family case plan as required by W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3(b).

It must be remembered that W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3, is a part of a larger enactment known as the West Virginia Child Protective Services Act (CPSA), W.Va.Code, 49-6D-1, et seq. Its purpose and intent are set out in W.Va.Code, 49-6D-2, which emphasizes that "the intention of the legislature [is] to provide for the removal of a child from the custody of the child's parents only when the child's welfare cannot be otherwise adequately safeguarded." (Emphasis added).

The DHS is given primary responsibility for the implementation of this act which became effective on June 10, 1984. See footnote 15 It may well be that because of its relatively recent enactment, the DHS and the lower court were not entirely familiar with its terms. From a review of the record in this case, we find that the DHS fell far short of the goals envisioned by the CPSA and provided little relevant assistance to the mother in this case.

We cannot accept the DHS's position that good faith efforts were made toward a rehabilitative plan when its court position as early as September, 1984, was to have Cheryl's rights terminated. This was before any parenting assistance was extended to Cheryl by the DHS. The April 15 and 18, 1985, hearings clearly show that they were designed to determine whether to permanently sever Cheryl's parental rights as requested by the DHS. At the conclusion of these hearings, the court asked the DHS if it was satisfied and was assured that it was and the matter was then submitted for a decision. See footnote 16

Curiously, following this hearing, the DHS prepared a revised family case plan for Cheryl, but appears not to have obtained any court approval under W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3(b). See footnote 17 Over the objection of Cheryl's counsel, a further hearing was held on July 8, 1985, at which point two DHS caseworkers testified about Cheryl's failure to meet the amended plan.

In the ordinary case where there are no compelling reasons to reject an improvement period under W.Va.Code, 49-6-2, we do not believe that the DHS should move for total severance of the parental rights in advance of a meaningful improvement period. Such an action appears contrary to the provisions of the CPSA, which stresses the need to preserve the family relationship.

We, therefore, conclude that the court erred in permanently terminating the mother's rights to Amanda for several reasons. First, the mother was entitled to a meaningful improvement period to demonstrate her ability to care for her child as required by W.Va.Code, 49-6-2. There were no "compelling circumstances to justify a denial." W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b). Second, the DHS did not comply with the provisions of W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3, in regard to preparing an appropriate family case plan for submission to the court and, of equal importance, the rendering of good faith efforts to provide assistance and counseling for the mother under it. Finally, the evidence did not reach the clear and convincing standard as required by procedural due process and as embodied in W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(c) (1984), to terminate Cheryl's parental rights.

We recognize that the child has been with the foster parents for almost three years and are aware that there are undoubtedly bonds of attachment between the child and the foster parents. However, constitutional considerations as reinforced by the CPSA mandate preservation of parental rights. It is only when bona fide attempts at counseling fail or the original abuse and neglect is so egregious that an improvement period will be of no avail that a court may be warranted in severing parental rights. Neither of these conditions is met in this case.

Because the mother did not voluntarily consent to give up her rights to her child, the application of the rule regarding the best interests of the child is not controlling. The Supreme Court of Connecticut in In re Juvenile Appeal, 177 Conn. 648, 671-72, 420 A.2d 875, 886-87 (1979), aptly described the reason why the best interests rule is not applicable in a case involving the involuntary severance of parental rights:

> "In contrast to custody proc eedings, in which the best interests of the child are always the param ount considerati on and in fact usually dictate the outcome, in term ination proceedings the statutory criteria m ust be m et before term ination can be accom plished and adoption proc eedings begun. No all- encompassing ' best interests' standard vitiates the requirement of compliance with the statutory criteria. See Alsager v. District Court of Polk County, Iowa, [406 F.Supp. 10 (S.D.Iowa 1975), aff'd, 545 F.2d 1137 (8th Cir.1976)]; In re Adoption of Children by D., 61 N.J. 89, 293 A.2d 171 (1972); Malpass v. Morgan, 213 Va. 393, 192 S.E.2d 794 (1972); Ketcham & Babcock, 'Statutory Standards for the Involuntary Term ination of Parental Rights,' 29 Rutgers L.Rev. 530, 539 (1976); com ment, 'Termination of Parental Rights in Adoption Cases: Focusing on the Child,' 14 J.Fam.L. 547, 550 (1975).

"Insistence upon strict com pliance w ith the statutory criteria before termination of parental rights and subsequent adopti on proceedings can occur is not inconsistent with concern for the best interest s of the child. Rather, it enhances the child' s best interests by prom oting autonom ous families and by reducing the dangers of arbitrary and biased decisions amounting to state intrusi on disguised under the rubric of the child' s 'best interests.' See Wald, ' State In tervention on Behalf of "Neglected" Children: Standards for Removal of Children from Their Homes, Monitoring the Status of Children in Foster Care, and Term ination of Parental Rights,' 28 Stan.L.Rev. 623, 638- 39 (1976)."

The Connecticut Supreme Court went on to explain a recurrent social problem that courts and commentators have observed with regard to terminating natural parents' rights to their children when the parents are economically deprived-- the existence of a bias in favor of having the child with someone who is more economically secure:

"Petitions for termination of parental rights are particularly vulnerable to the risk that judges or social work ers will be tempted, consciously or unconsciously, to com pare unfavorably the material advantages of the child's natural parents with those of prospective adoptive parents and therefore to reach a result based on su ch comparisons rather than on the statutory criteria. The United St ates Suprem e Court has forcefully recognized this danger: ' Commentators have ... noted ... that middle- and upper-income families who ne ed temporary care services for their children have the resource to purchase privat e care.... The poor have little choice but to submit to state-supervised child care when family crises strike.... Studies also suggest that social workers of m iddle-class backgrounds, perhaps unconsciously, incline to favor continued placement in foster care with a generally higher-status family ra ther than return the child to his natural family, thus reflecting a bias th at treats the natural parents' poverty and lifestyle as prejudicial to the be st interests of the child. [Citations > omitted.] This accounts it has been said , for the hostility of agencies to the efforts of natural parents to obtain the return of their children.' Smith v. Organization of Foster Families fo r Equality & Reform, 431 U.S. 816, 834-35, 97 S.Ct. 2094, 2104- 2105, 53 L.Ed.2d 14 [28-29] (1977)." 177 Conn. at 672-73, 420 A.2d at 886-87.

Here, as we pointed out earlier, the policy of the legislature is to favor rehabilitating the family unit before severing parental rights. Thus, the rule regarding the best interests of the child is not controlling in this proceeding. See footnote 18

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the Circuit Court of Hardy County is reversed and this case is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion. These proceedings will consist of approving an appropriate family case plan under W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3(a), and ultimately determining whether or not to reunite Cheryl with her daughter.

Reversed and Remanded.

Footnote: 1 We follow our past practice in juvenile and domestic relations cases which involve sensitive facts and do not utilize the last names of the parties. See, e.g., West Virginia Dept. of Human Services v. La Rea Ann C.L., 175 W.Va. 330, 332 S.E.2d 632 (1985); State v. Ellsworth J.R., 175 W.Va. 64 n. 1, 331 S.E.2d 503 n. 1 (1985).

Footnote: 2 Mark J. did not object to the circuit court's termination of his parental rights on April 15, 1985. He made no appearance in this matter after May, 1984. His only concern as articulated through his court- appointed counsel was to thwart any effort by Cheryl to regain custody of Amanda.

Footnote: 3 We note that W.Va.Code, 49-6-3(a) (1977), requires that a petition for emergency child custody be filed before the DHS can obtain physical custody, and, in pertinent part, provides:
"Upon the filing of a petition, the court may order that the child be delivered for not more than ten days into the custody of the state department or a responsible relative, pending a preliminary hearing, if it finds that: (1) There exists imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child, and (2) there are no reasonably available alternatives to removal of the child, including, but not limited to, the provision of medical, psychiatric, psychological or homemaking services in the child's present custody. The initial order directing such custody shall contain an order appointing counsel and scheduling the preliminary hearing, and upon its service shall require the immediate transfer of custody of such child to the state department or a responsible relative."

In 1984, the legislature amended W.Va.Code, 49-6-3, by adding a new subsection (c), which enables the DHS to obtain physical custody without a prior court order in certain extreme situations and sets a prompt post- seizure hearing. The 1984 amendments did not become effective until June 10, 1984.

Footnote: 4 W.Va.Code, 49-2A-1, et seq. (1975).

Footnote: 5 It does not appear that the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children requires a placement plan from the receiving state in this situation. Under W.Va.Code, 49-2A-1, Article III(b), the sending state forwards its request and reasons for intending to send the child to the receiving state, which then notifies the sending state in writing that they concur. The receiving state's only responsibility is to find "that the proposed placement does not appear to be contrary to the interests of the child." W.Va.Code, 49-2A-1, Article III(d). See In re Matter of Pima County v. Fisher, 125 Ariz. 430, 610 P.2d 64 (1980); Sinhogar v. Parry, 53 N.Y.2d 424, 425 N.E.2d 826, 442 N.Y.S.2d 438 (1981).

Footnote: 6 A report from the Maine DHS dated October 24, 1984, indicates that Cheryl after returning to Maine had been in contact with the Maine DHS regarding the return of her daughter on some thirteen occasions. When it appeared further hearings were required in West Virginia, she returned to this State in October, 1984.

Footnote: 7 Santosky, 455 U.S. at 763-64, 102 S.Ct. at 1400, 71 L.Ed.2d at 613, also makes some penetrating observations in regard to the potential for overmatch in a parental termination case: "The State's ability to assemble its case almost inevitably dwarfs the parents' ability to mount a defense. No predetermined limits restrict the sums an agency may spend in prosecuting a given termination proceeding. The State's attorney ... enjoys full access to all public records concerning the family. The State may call on experts in family relations, psychology, and medicine to bolster its case. Furthermore, the primary witnesses at the hearing will be the agency's own professional caseworkers whom the State has empowered both to investigate the family situation and to testify against the parents. Indeed, because the child is already in agency custody, the State even has the power to shape the historical events that form the basis for termination.13 "The disparity between the adversaries' litigation resources is matched by a striking asymmetry in their litigation options. Unlike criminal defendants, natural parents have no 'double jeopardy' defense against repeated state termination efforts."
Note 13 of Santosky, 455 U.S. at 763, 102 S.Ct. at 1400, 71 L.Ed.2d at 613, states, in relevant part:
"In this case, for example, the parents claim that the State sought court orders denying them the right to visit their children, which would have prevented them from maintaining the contact required by Fam. Ct. Act § 614.1(d).... The parents further claim that the State cited their rejection of social services they found offensive or superfluous as proof of the agency's 'diligent efforts' and their own 'failure to plan' for the children's future." This same pattern can be seen in this case.

Footnote: 8 W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), provides:
"In any proceeding under this article, the parents or custodians may, prior to final hearing, move to be allowed an improvement period of three to twelve months in order to remedy the circumstances or alleged circumstances upon which the proceeding is based. The court shall allow one such improvement period unless it finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial thereof, but may require temporary custody in the state department or other agency during the improvement period. An order granting such improvement period shall require the department to prepare and submit to the court a family case plan in accordance with the provisions of section three [§ 49-6D-3], article six-D of this chapter." This section was amended effective June 10, 1984, to add the last sentence.

Footnote: 9 From this report, it appears that one of the reasons the DHS moved for severance was that the foster parents had indicated a desire to adopt Amanda.

Footnote: 10 There was an earlier report of May 2, 1984, from the Maine DHS which the court had before it at the May 10, 1984, hearing where the parties recommended the interstate transfer of Amanda to Maine. This report revealed that Cheryl's other daughter had been removed from her custody and placed with her family in Maine several years before when it was determined that her boyfriend had sexually abused the child in Cheryl's absence. Despite these adverse facts, the court was willing to accede to the DHS's recommendation that Amanda be returned to the Maine DHS.

Footnote: 11 The text of the letter of October 12, 1984, reads:
"Thank you for the copy of the report(s) you sent to Mr. Bean in support of the hearing scheduled for October 16, 1984. For the record, we wish to clarify what may be misinformation that may be presented to the court.
"1. In your 'Report to the Court' dated September 12, 1984, page # 1, item '2)' is incorrect. The Maine Department of Human Services has not offered any plan to Amanda's mother relative to rehabilitation/reunification efforts. It has been our information that the court wanted a plan proposed to it by Maine D.H.S. (item four of court order entered 5-15- 84). Hence, we have not been authorized to offer any specific services to the family until approved by the court.
"2. Relative to item '5)' of the report of 9-12: The Dept's prognosis for rehabilitation is 'guarded' (see letter of 7-16 from K. Edgecomb) and we believed that any replacement of the child (into a Maine foster home or with family) ought not occur until the family has been engaged in a (court approved) reunification effort for at least three (3) months. While your conclusion of 'no reasonable likelihood of rehabilitation' may ultimately be supported by evidence, we must reiterate that to date, no services have been offered to Amanda's mother subsequent to the order of this May. "3. In Dr. Life's letter to you of 7-10-84, he notes Amanda '... apparently had a long history of child abuse'. While not knowing the basis of that impression, our report of 5-2-84 to the court does not reveal any prior (before 4-28) abuses of Amanda but rather a risk of harm by virtue of her parent's conflictive relationship.

"I trust that this information will be used to aid the court in making the best possible decision for Amanda."

Footnote: 12 For the complete text of W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), see note 8, supra.

Footnote: 13 W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3(b), in relevant part, states:
"[T]he family case plan described in subsection (a) of this section shall be furnished to the court within thirty days after the entry of the order referring the case to the department, and shall be available to counsel for the parent, guardian or custodian and counsel for the child or children. The department shall encourage participation in the development of the family case plan by the parent, guardian or custodian, and, if the child is above the age of twelve years and the child's participation is otherwise appropriate, by the child. It shall be the duty of counsel for the participants to participate in the development of the family case plan.... The court shall examine the proposed family case plan or any modification thereof, and upon a finding by the court that the plan or modified plan can be easily communicated, explained and discussed so as to make the participants accountable and able to understand the reasons for any success or failure under the plan, the court shall inform the participants of the probable action of the court if goals are met or not met."

Footnote: 14 W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3(a) (1984), also provides general goals for a family case plan:
"Every family case plan prepared by the department shall contain the following:
"(1) A listing of specific, measurable, realistic goals to be achieved;
"(2) An arrangement of goals into an order of priority;
"(3) A listing of the problems that will be addressed by each goal;
"(4) A specific description of how the assigned caseworker or caseworkers and the abusing parent, guardian or custodian will achieve each goal;
"(5) A description of the departmental and community resources to be used in implementing the proposed actions and services;
"(6) A list of the services which will be provided;
"(7) Time targets for the achievement of goals or portions of goals;
"(8) An assignment of tasks to the abusing or neglecting parent, guardian or custodian, to the caseworker or caseworkers, and to other participants in the planning process; and
"(9) A designation of when and how often tasks will be performed."
W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3(b), has a thirty-day time period for the preparation of the plan along with further details for its implementation.

Footnote: 15 Even before the enactment of the CPSA, it is clear from W.Va.Code, 49-6-1, et seq., that the DHS had the primary responsibility for providing effective home counseling and psychiatric, medical, and other services to the parents of neglected and abused children.

Footnote: 16 This dialogue is reflected at pages 241 through 242 of the April 18, 1985 hearing:

Are you satisfied that she's now reached the maximum that she's going to? In other words, you don't need any more any additional time?
"A. I don't know for what purpose.
"Q. It would serve no useful purpose that you can see, then? All right. Well, with that understanding, we'll, we're ready, I think, for a final conclusion in the matter. The Court is not prepared today to give you that decision. I do want to review the file in the matter and will get in touch with the attorneys, then, later on."

Footnote: 17 W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3(b) (1984), in relevant part, states: "The family case plan may be modified from time to time by the department to allow for flexibility in goal development, and in each such case the modifications shall be submitted to the court in writing."

NEELY, Justice dissenting:

I dissent because the record in this case conclusively demonstrates that the appellant is incapable of improvement and the child's welfare will be jeopardized by a return of custody to the natural mother.

The record before us discloses a plethora of pertinent facts not discussed in the majority's opinion. Cheryl has an older daughter by a previous liaison, Danielle, who currently lives with her maternal grandparents in Maine. Cheryl was forced to relinquish her custodial rights to Danielle when the Maine Department of Human Services intervened after discovering that Cheryl had left Danielle with a male babysitter who had given Danielle gonorrhea. On 22 April 1984, Cheryl was observed in Wardensville, West Virginia pushing Amanda in her carriage up and down the streets of Wardensville in the rain. This apparently continued for approximately a half an hour, while Amanda was scantily clad and wrapped in a soaking wet blanket. That evening, Cheryl and Mark, Amanda's biological father, entered a local bar and grill and sat down to eat dinner. Amanda, meanwhile, was left outside the bar and grill, unattended. Mark and Cheryl retrieved Amanda only upon the protests of fellow patrons.

After leaving Wardensville at the request of Mark, Cheryl and Amanda spent approximately a week in Maryland. When Mark did not come to Maryland with provisions he had promised, Cheryl returned with Amanda to Wardensville. When Cheryl located Mark, she proceeded to assault him verbally and physically. Cheryl was so intent on avenging herself against Mark that, within the space of one hour, she dropped Amanda three times. Moreover, witnesses testified that Cheryl continued to assault Mark even after Amanda had made it clear through her screams of pain that she required attention.

Mark's parental rights have been terminated, and he pays no child support. Cheryl does not currently have a job, has evidenced an inability to hold a job in the past, and has been resistant to attempts to help her find steady employment consistent with the responsibilities of a single parent. Moreover, Cheryl appears to be unable to maintain her own residence. She now lives with her boyfriend in his mobile home. See footnote 1 Dr. Stein, with whom Cheryl has had several counseling sessions, testified that Cheryl "has a very pronounced pattern of putting her own needs for romantic relationships in a superior position to the needs of the child." Dr. Stein states that he has "very serious reservations that the interest of the child would be best served by returning custody to the biological mother."

Dr. Life, Amanda's pediatrician, testified that, when Amanda was first placed in foster care, she appeared malnourished. Dr. Life testified that Amanda's physical and emotional health have improved greatly since Amanda has been placed with foster parents, but that Amanda continues to suffer physiological setbacks and emotional problems following her weekly visits with Cheryl.

Testimony elicited at the hearings indicated that Cheryl was generally inattentive to Amanda's safety, clothing, nourishment, and sanitary needs. Cheryl has apparently been generally uncooperative with, and unpleasant toward, departmental caseworkers who have been attempting to help her improve her parenting skills. Moreover, Cheryl's personal life is and has been for some time in considerable disorder. She has children by two different men (Amanda out of wedlock), and has been deserted by and since divorced Amanda's father. Moreover, Cheryl reportedly attempted suicide in the summer of 1985.

In Syl. pt. 1 of In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980), we held:

> As a general rule the least restrictive alternative regarding parental rights to custody of a child under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977] will be employed; however, courts are not required to e xhaust every speculative possibility of parental im provement before term inating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and that is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illne ss, need consistent clos e interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by numerous placements.

See also In Interest of Darla B., --- W.Va. ---, 331 S.E.2d 868 (1985). The majority correctly notes that, as a matter of technical doctrine, the doctrine of "the best interest of the child" is not applicable to this case. However, that academic observation does not imply that the interest of Amanda should be a matter of utter indifference to this Court. In determining whether "compelling circumstances" exist under W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) [1984], we must, as R.J.M. suggests, weigh the probability that a child will suffer irreparable physical or psychological harm against the speculative possibility that a natural parent with an established record of chronic neglect and abuse may some day bring his or her behavior within the acceptable tolerances of parenting conduct. After all, "it must be remembered that we are not * * * [dealing with] a piece of property, but rather with a feeling, vulnerable, and sorely put upon little human being." Lemley v. Barr, 176 W.Va. 378, 343 S.E.2d 101 (1986).

The Department of Human Services, Dr. Stein, Dr. Life, the guardian ad litem for the child, and even Amanda's natural father believe that Amanda's interest would be ill-served by being returned to Cheryl. On the record before it, the trial court had ample evidence upon which it could find that there was "no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future." W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(a)(6) [1984]. Although no family case plan was prepared by the Department of Human Services, department workers had been working with Cheryl for close to one year before her parental rights were terminated. During that time Cheryl showed little promise of improvement. It makes little sense for this Court to reverse the determination of the trial court and order the Department to prepare a family case plan when Amanda appears to be happy and thriving with her foster parents (who want to adopt her), and Cheryl has already amply demonstrated a marked inability to mend her ways. I would therefore hold that this case presents "compelling circumstances to justify a denial" within the meaning of W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) [1984], and would affirm the trial court.

I am authorized to say that BROTHERTON, J., joins in this dissent.

Footnote: 1 At oral argument it was represented that Cheryl and her boyfriend are now married. However, there has been no evidence presented about Cheryl's new husband's employment, income or character. The character of this man and the quality of the home he would provide for Amanda are certainly issues to which the trial court should devote close scrutiny in its further proceedings.

CHIEF JUSTICE DAVIS delivered the Opinion of the Court.

1. "Where the issue on an appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of law or involving an interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review." Syllabus point 1, Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., 194 W. Va. 138, 459 S.E.2d 415 (1995).

2. "A motion to vacate a judgment made pursuant to Rule 60(b), W. Va. R. C. P., is addressed to the sound discretion of the court and the court's ruling on such motion will not be disturbed on appeal unless there is a showing of an abuse of such discretion." Syllabus point 5, Toler v. Shelton, 157 W. Va. 778, 204 S.E.2d 85 (1974).

3. "When a statute is clear and unambiguous and the legislative intent is plain, the statute should not be interpreted by the courts, and in such case it is the duty of the courts not to construe but to apply the statute." Syllabus point 5, State v. General Daniel Morgan Post No. 548, V.F.W., 144 W. Va. 137, 107 S.E.2d 353 (1959).

4. "'The general rule of statutory construction requires that a specific statute be given precedence over a general statute relating to the same subject matter where the two cannot be reconciled.' Syllabus point 1, UMWA by Trumka v. Kingdon, 174 W. Va.

330, 325 S.E.2d 120 (1984)." Syllabus point 6, State ex rel. Tucker County Solid Waste Authority v. West Virginia Division of Labor, 222 W. Va. 588, 668 S.E.2d 217 (2008).

5. Pursuant to the plain language of W. Va. Code § 49-7-33 (2002) (Repl. Vol. 2009), a circuit court "may . . . order the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources to pay for professional services" incurred in a child abuse and neglect proceeding. Such "professional services" include, but are not limited to, "evaluation, report preparation, consultation and preparation of expert testimony" by an expert witness. W. Va. Code § 49-7-33.

6. When a circuit court orders the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources to pay for professional services, including those provided by an expert witness, pursuant to the provisions of W. Va. Code § 49-7-33 (2002) (Repl. Vol. 2009), the Department of Health and Human Resources shall be permitted to establish the fee schedule by which the professional will be paid "in accordance with the Medicaid rate, if any, or the customary rate [with] adjust[ments to] the schedule as appropriate." W. Va. Code § 49-7-33.

Davis, Chief Justice:

The appellant herein, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter referred to as "DHHR"), appeals from orders entered July 30, 2009, and August 24, 2009, by the Circuit Court of Marshall County. Through its order of July 30, 2009, the circuit court required the DHHR to pay the costs associated with the expert witness retained by the minor child's mother in the underlying abuse and neglect proceeding. In its August 24, 2009, order, the circuit court upheld its earlier ruling, denying the DHHR's motion for relief therefrom. On appeal to this Court, the DHHR assigns error to the circuit court's order and contends that the subject expert witness fees and expenses should be assessed to the West Virginia Public Defender Corporation (hereinafter referred to as "Public Defender Corporation"). Alternatively, the DHHR contends that if it is found to be the party responsible for paying the mother's expert witness costs, the DHHR, itself, should be permitted to establish the fee schedule for such payment. Upon a review of the parties' arguments, the record designated for appellate consideration, and the pertinent authorities, we affirm, in part, and reverse, in part, the decisions of the Marshall County Circuit Court and remand this case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. Specifically, we affirm the circuit court's rulings insofar as the lower court required the DHHR to pay the mother's expert witness costs. However, we reverse the circuit court's orders to the extent that the lower court required the DHHR to make such payment in accordance with the fee schedule adopted by the Public Defender Corporation.

Accordingly, we remand this case to the circuit court for a recalculation of the allowable expert witness fees in accordance with the DHHR's fee schedule set forth in W. Va. Code § 49-7-33 (2002) (Repl. Vol. 2009).

I.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

The underlying abuse and neglect case commenced in November 2008 with the DHHR's filing of a petition alleging that the minor child, Chevie V.,[1] had been abused and/or neglected by her mother, her father, and/or her mother's live-in boyfriend. Specifically, marks had been discovered on Chevie's neck spelling out the word "WIMP," which marks were suspected to be caused by burns from a lit cigarette.[2] The petition alleged that Chevie's mother had placed these marks on Chevie's neck.[3] Chevie's mother denied that she had harmed her child and disputed that the marks were cigarette burns.[4]

[1]In keeping with our longstanding practice of referring to children in cases involving sensitive facts by their last initials rather than by their full names, we will refer to Chevie by her last initial. See, e.g., In re Abbigail Faye B., 222 W. Va. 466, 470 n.1, 665 S.E.2d 300, 304 n.1 (2008); In re Cesar L., 221 W. Va. 249, 252 n.1, 654 S.E.2d 373, 376 n.1 (2007); In re Clifford K., 217 W. Va. 625, 630 n.1, 619 S.E.2d 138, 143 n.1 (2005).

[2]Chevie was six years old when the abuse and neglect petition was filed in November 2008.

[3]An amended petition filed in December 2008 included findings of several additional marks on Chevie's back, arm, and ankles.

In January 2009, Chevie's mother moved the circuit court to grant her permission to hire an expert to refute the DHHR's allegations as to the nature and origin of Chevie's injuries. This request to hire an expert was conditioned upon the DHHR's use of an expert to prove its allegations regarding the source of Chevie's injuries; if the DHHR did not intend to use an expert witness, Chevie's mother indicated that she would withdraw her request. In her motion, Chevie's mother also indicated that the law is not clear as to who is responsible for paying for a parent's expert witness in an abuse and neglect proceeding but that, based upon her research and inquiries, the Public Defender Corporation was believed to be the responsible party.[5] By order entered February 23, 2009, the circuit court granted Chevie's mother's request to obtain an expert witness and directed that "said expert witness must accept the fee as set forth by [the] Public Defender Corporation fee schedule." Thereafter, Chevie's mother retained Dr. Mary Carrasco as her expert witness and requested the circuit court to approve her as her expert witness and to approve her payment by the Public Defender Corporation, both of which the court ordered on February 27, 2009:

> Accordingly, it is ORDERED that Respondent Mother's expert, Dr. Mary Carrasco, shall be paid by and from [the] West Virginia Public Defender Corporation at an hourly out of six counts of malicious assault, five counts of child abuse, and one count of child abuse resulting in injury in connection with Chevie's injuries. Chevie's mother currently is awaiting trial on these charges.

[5]Chevie's mother was represented by appointed counsel during the underlying abuse and neglect proceeding, but said counsel was not provided by the Public Defender Corporation.

> ORDERED that said expert's mileage shall be paid at 44.5 cents per mile and hotel and car rental with itemized invoices attached[.]

During the course of the abuse and neglect proceedings, the mother's attorney requested reimbursement of the fees and expenses she had paid to the mother's expert witness. By order entered July 30, 2009, the circuit court "ORDER[ED] that the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources reimburse [Chevie's mother's attorney] the amount of $6,810.63 paid by [the mother's attorney] for services and expenses rendered and incurred by Dr. Mary Carrasco[.]" The DHHR objected to this ruling, which contradicted the court's earlier order charging the Public Defender Corporation with payment of the mother's expert witness and, accordingly, filed a "Motion for Reconsideration of Payment Order."[6] By order entered August 24, 2009, the circuit court

[6]The DHHR's motion was in the nature of one filed pursuant to West Virginia Rule of Civil Procedure 60(b) whereby a party requests relief from a prior order or judgment of the court. See W. Va. R. Civ. P. 60(b) (permitting circuit court to relieve party from court's judgment or order for variety of reasons). Despite the DHHR's designation of its motion as a "motion to reconsider," we take this opportunity to again reiterate that "the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure do not explicitly recognize a 'motion for reconsideration.'" Builders' Serv. & Supply Co. v. Dempsey, 244 W. Va. 80, 83, 680 S.E.2d 95, 98 (2009) (per curiam) (citations omitted). Accord Richardson v. Kennedy, 197 W. Va. 326, 329, 475 S.E.2d 418, 421 (1996) ("Despite our repeated direction to the bench and bar of this State that a 'motion to reconsider' is not a properly titled pleading in West Virginia, it continues to be used."); Savage v. Booth, 196 W. Va. 65, 68, 468 S.E.2d 318, 321 (1996) (continued...)

upheld its earlier order directing the DHHR to pay the fees and expenses incurred by the mother's expert witness and amended its February 27, 2009, order charging such costs to the Public Defender Corporation. Thereafter, the circuit court granted the DHHR's request for a determination pursuant to Rule 54(b) of the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure[7] to permit this issue to be appealed during the pendency of the remainder of the underlying abuse and neglect proceeding.

From these adverse rulings, the DHHR appeals to this Court. Chevie, through her Guardian ad Litem, also appears before this Court. However, neither Chevie's parents or Chevie's mother's boyfriend nor the West Virginia Public Defender Corporation are parties to the instant appeal.[8]

("[T]he West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure do not recognize a 'motion for reconsideration.'"). Thus, we repeat our admonition to counsel to refer to a motion for relief from a court's order as a Rule 60(b) motion because the phrase "motion for reconsideration" simply is no longer within the vocabulary of this Court.

[7]West Virginia Rule of Civil Procedure 54(b) provides, in pertinent part:

> [w]hen more than one claim for relief is presented in an action, whether as a claim, counterclaim, cross-claim, or third-party claim, or when multiple parties are involved, the court may direct the entry of a final judgment as to one or more but fewer than all of the claims or parties only upon an express determination that there is no just reason for delay and upon an express direction for the entry of judgment.

II.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

In the instant proceeding, the DHHR appeals from the circuit court's July 30, 2009, order charging the DHHR with the costs associated with the mother's expert witness in the underlying abuse and neglect proceeding and from the circuit court's August 24, 2009, order denying the DHHR's motion for relief from the court's July 30, 2009, order.

The sole issue decided by the circuit court in its July 30, 2009, order involves an interpretation of existing statutory and case law to determine which party is responsible for the payment of the mother's expert witness in the underlying abuse and neglect proceeding. "Where the issue on an appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of

and neglect case on January 17, 2010, whereby Chevie's father was awarded her physical and legal custody and Chevie's mother was granted supervised visitation. The order does not provide, however, whether the parental rights of Chevie's mother were terminated or whether such parental rights remain in force and effect. Having reviewed the record in this case, we are very troubled by the delay between the occurrence of the circuit court's dispositional hearing, held on December 28, 2009, and the court's subsequent entry of its dispositional order on January 17, 2010, nearly one month later and outside the time period within which such orders are required to be filed. See W. Va. R. P. Child Abuse & Neglect Proc. 36(a) ("At the conclusion of the disposition hearing, the court shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law, in writing or on the record, as to the appropriate disposition in accordance with the provisions of W. Va. Code § 49-6-5. The court shall enter a disposition order, including findings of fact and conclusions of law, within ten (10) days of the conclusion of the hearing." (emphasis added)). Accord In re B.B., 224 W. Va. 647, 655 n.19, 687 S.E.2d 746, 754 n.19 (2009) (per curiam) (same). Accordingly, we remind circuit courts of their duty to be vigilant in adhering to the guidelines governing abuse and neglect proceedings and the entry of orders therein.

law or involving an interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review." Syl. pt. 1, Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., 194 W. Va. 138, 459 S.E.2d 415 (1995). Accord Syl. pt. 1, Appalachian Power Co. v. State Tax Dep't of West Virginia, 195 W. Va. 573, 466 S.E.2d 424 (1995) ("Interpreting a statute or an administrative rule or regulation presents a purely legal question subject to de novo review."). Therefore, our review of the circuit court's order charging the DHHR with the payment of the mother's expert witness is plenary.

Also on appeal to this Court is the circuit court's August 24, 2009, order denying the DHHR's motion for relief from the court's prior order. As we explained in the preceding section, the phrase "motion for reconsideration" is not a part of this Court's vernacular. Rather, motions brought pursuant to Rule 60(b) of the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure that request relief from a court's judgment or order should be referred to as such. See, e.g., Builders' Serv. & Supply Co. v. Dempsey, 244 W. Va. 80, 83, 680 S.E.2d 95, 98 (2009) (per curiam); Richardson v. Kennedy, 197 W. Va. 326, 329, 475 S.E.2d 418, 421 (1996); Savage v. Booth, 196 W. Va. 65, 68, 468 S.E.2d 318, 321 (1996). When a court is called upon to decide a Rule 60(b) motion, this Court has found such a ruling to lie within the court's discretion:

> A motion to vacate a judgment made pursuant to Rule 60(b), W. Va. R. C. P., is addressed to the sound discretion of the court and the court's ruling on such motion will not be disturbed on appeal unless there is a showing of an abuse of such discretion.

Syl. pt. 5, Toler v. Shelton, 157 W. Va. 778, 204 S.E.2d 85 (1974). Therefore, the circuit court's decision to grant or deny the requested Rule 60(b) motion is within the court's discretion.

We proceed to consider the parties' arguments in light of these standards.

III.

DISCUSSION

On appeal to this Court, the DHHR assigns error to (1) the circuit court's decision to hold it responsible for the payment of the mother's expert witness fees and (2) the circuit court's ruling that such payment be made in accordance with the fee schedule established by the Public Defender Corporation. Although the DHHR's appeal is from both the circuit court's initial payment order and the court's subsequent order denying the DHHR's motion for relief from its first order, both orders must be considered together insofar as the subsequent order sets forth the court's reasoning for its initial decision.

A. Party Responsible for Payment of Expert Witness Costs in Abuse and Neglect Proceeding

In its order of July 30, 2009, the circuit court very succinctly "ORDER[ED] that the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources reimburse [Chevie's mother's attorney] the amount of $6,810.63 paid by [the mother's attorney] for services and expenses rendered and incurred by Dr. Mary Carrasco[.]" Through its subsequent, August 24, 2009, order, the circuit court explained that its decision to assess the DHHR with the mother's expert witness costs was based upon West Virginia Trial Court Rules 27.01 and 27.02, as well as W. Va. Code § 49-6-4(a) (2005) (Repl. Vol. 2009). Before this Court, the DHHR contends, instead, that W. Va. Code § 29-21-13a(e) (2008) (Repl. Vol. 2008) and West Virginia Trial Court Rule 35.05(b) dictate that the Public Defender Corporation, not the DHHR, is responsible for the payment of the mother's expert witness. Finally, the minor child's Guardian ad Litem agrees with the circuit court's conclusion that the DHHR is the responsible party but urges, instead, that W. Va. Code § 49-7-33 (2002) (Repl. Vol. 2009) is determinative of the issue.

Insofar as the instant controversy requires this Court to review and apply various statutes, we begin our analysis with a brief summary of the rules of statutory construction. When deciding a statutory matter, we first must determine the intent of the Legislature in adopting the statute in question. "The primary object in construing a statute is to ascertain and give effect to the intent of the Legislature." Syl. pt. 1, Smith v. State Workmen's Comp. Comm'r, 159 W. Va. 108, 219 S.E.2d 361 (1975). Next, we consider the precise wording of the statutory enactment. Plain statutory language must be applied as it is written. "When a statute is clear and unambiguous and the legislative intent is plain, the statute should not be interpreted by the courts, and in such case it is the duty of the courts not to construe but to apply the statute." Syl. pt. 5, State v. General Daniel Morgan Post No. 548, V.F.W., 144 W. Va. 137, 107 S.E.2d 353 (1959). Accord Syl. pt. 2, Crockett v.

Andrews, 153 W. Va. 714, 172 S.E.2d 384 (1970) ("Where the language of a statute is free from ambiguity, its plain meaning is to be accepted and applied without resort to interpretation."); Syl. pt. 2, State v. Epperly, 135 W. Va. 877, 65 S.E.2d 488 (1951) ("A statutory provision which is clear and unambiguous and plainly expresses the legislative intent will not be interpreted by the courts but will be given full force and effect."). However, ambiguous statutory language must be construed before it can be applied. "Judicial interpretation of a statute is warranted only if the statute is ambiguous and the initial step in such interpretative inquiry is to ascertain the legislative intent." Syl. pt. 1, Ohio Cnty. Comm'n v. Manchin, 171 W. Va. 552, 301 S.E.2d 183 (1983). Accord Syl. pt. 1, Farley v. Buckalew, 186 W. Va. 693, 414 S.E.2d 454 (1992) ("A statute that is ambiguous must be construed before it can be applied.").

As a final matter, the ruling of the circuit court and the arguments of the various parties to the case sub judice suggest that there exist many statutes and rules that are perceived to apply to the issues before us. Obviously, not all of these authorities are in agreement, or the instant controversy would not exist. Under the rules of statutory construction, where different statutes speak to the same subject matter but conflict with one another, the more specific statute governs. "'The general rule of statutory construction requires that a specific statute be given precedence over a general statute relating to the same subject matter where the two cannot be reconciled.' Syllabus point 1, UMWA by Trumka v. Kingdon, 174 W. Va. 330, 325 S.E.2d 120 (1984)." Syl. pt. 6, State ex rel.

Tucker Cnty. Solid Waste Auth. v. West Virginia Div. of Labor, 222 W. Va. 588, 668 S.E.2d 217 (2008).

Although this Court previously has considered the first issue presented for our resolution, i.e., who is responsible for paying for a parent's expert witness in an abuse and neglect proceeding, this matter essentially remains one of first impression. In our first case involving this question, Hewitt v. State of West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources, 212 W. Va. 698, 575 S.E.2d 308 (2002), the DHHR appealed from an order requiring it to pay an expert witness who had provided services in several juvenile delinquency and abuse and neglect cases. Although W. Va. Code § 49-7-33 was in effect at the time the Court issued its opinion, the statute had been enacted after the facts at issue in that case and thus did not apply thereto. Absent express statutory direction on this point, the Court held, in Syllabus point 2, that > [i]n recognition of the lack of an express funding obligation provided for expert fees in juvenile delinquency cases and pursuant to our inherent authority to manage the courts of this state, this Court will assume financial responsibility in matters arising under this state's juvenile delinquency laws for the fees properly charged by expert witnesses appointed by the trial courts and subsequently approved for payment.

212 W. Va. 698, 575 S.E.2d 308. With respect to the expert witness fees associated with abuse and neglect proceedings, the Court > determine[d] that all orders approving and awarding payment for services performed by [the expert witness] in abuse and/or neglect cases that were entered prior to June 7, 2002, the > effective date of West Virginia Code § 49-7-33 (2002), shall be paid by DHHR at the rate approved by the trial court. Any payment orders pertaining to abuse and/or neglect matters entered following the effective date of West Virginia Code § 49-7-33, shall be paid by DHHR at the rate established by Medicaid and adopted by DHHR for such services.

212 W. Va. at 700, 575 S.E.2d at 310 (footnote omitted).

The Court further commented on the thorny issue that could not be finally resolved in that case and concluded that conflicting statutes governed who, exactly, is responsible for paying for expert witnesses in abuse and neglect proceedings:

> A significant and lingering issue, which cannot be resolved today, arises from the conflicting statutory provisions now in effect that address the award of expert fees in abuse and neglect cases. Notwithstanding the enactment of West Virginia Code § 49-7-33 and its grant of authority to DHHR to set rates for expert witnesses, previously established authority still exists for circuit courts to "provide for the payment of all such expert witnesses" in abuse and neglect proceedings. W. Va. Code § 49-6-4. As a result of this continuing authority in the circuit courts, we do not accept the position of DHHR that it has exclusive authority for the payment of expert fees in abuse and neglect cases under the provisions of W. Va. Code § 49-7-33. Clearly, that provision, when properly invoked, enables the Department to use Medicaid-established rates for the provision of health care services as required under chapter 49, articles five and six, where such rates are available. Critically, however, a circuit court still retains the ultimate authority for entry of all orders directing payment of expert witness fees in abuse and neglect matters. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-4.

212 W. Va. at 702-03, 575 S.E.2d at 312-13 (footnotes omitted). Following the Court's opinion containing this language, however, the Legislature amended W. Va. Code § 49-6-4 to remove the phrase discussed in Hewitt. Cf. W. Va. Code § 49-6-4(a) (1984) (Repl. Vol.

2004) (former version of statute, which contains above-referenced language) with W. Va. Code § 49-6-4(a) (2005) (Repl. Vol. 2009) (current version of statute, from which referenced language has been removed). Therefore, the central question as to who is responsible for the payment of expert witnesses in abuse and neglect cases remains unresolved following Hewitt.

Thereafter, the Court revisited the scope of its mandate in Hewitt as it pertained to the payment of expert witnesses in juvenile delinquency proceedings in State ex rel. Artimez v. Recht, 216 W. Va. 709, 613 S.E.2d 76 (2005) (per curiam). While reiterating the Hewitt language detailing the DHHR's obligation to pay for expert witnesses in the abuse and neglect cases at issue in Hewitt, the Artimez decision did not further discuss the party responsible for the payment of expert witnesses in abuse and neglect proceedings such as the case sub judice. See Artimez, 216 W. Va. at 711, 613 S.E.2d at 78 (footnote omitted).

The final case this Court has decided regarding the payment of expert witnesses is limited to expert witnesses providing services in juvenile delinquency proceedings. See In re Bobby Lee B., 218 W. Va. 689, 629 S.E.2d 748 (2006) (per curiam). Insofar as the instant appeal involves abuse and neglect proceedings, and not juvenile delinquency matters, our prior decision in Bobby Lee B. is not instructive to our present inquiry. Thus, because we have not yet definitively determined, under existing statutory law, who must pay for a parent's expert witness in an abuse and neglect proceeding, we will consider the various authorities relied upon by the circuit court and the parties to this appeal.

1. W. Va. Trial Court Rules 27.01 & 27.02 and W. Va. Code § 49-6-4(a) (2005) (Repl. Vol. 2009). In explaining the reasoning for its July 30, 2009, ruling requiring the DHHR to pay for the mother's expert witness fees, the circuit court relied upon W. Va. Trial Court Rules 27.01 and 27.02, as well as W. Va. Code § 49-6-4(a). Trial Court Rule 27.01 provides that, "[u]pon motion by a party or upon its own motion, the court may appoint an expert to perform a medical or psychological evaluation and may require such expert to testify, pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-4." Rule 27.02 further explains that

> [t]he court shall by order establish in advance the reasonable fees and expenses to be paid to an expert. Payment shall be as follows: Upon completion of services by an expert, the court shall, by order, direct the State Department of Health and Human Resources to pay for the expert's evaluation, report writing, consultation, or other preparation; and the court shall, by order, direct payment by the Supreme Court's Administrative Office for the expert's fee and expenses entailed in appearing to testify as a witness.

While these rules specifically pertain to "expert assistance in child abuse or neglect cases," W. Va. Trial Ct. R., ch. 27, these rules do not apply to the case sub judice insofar as the circuit court did not specifically choose or appoint the mother's expert witness. Rather, here, the mother approached the circuit court about the possibility of hiring an expert witness. The circuit court then merely approved the mother's request to hire an expert, and then she, herself, proceeded to select and hire her own expert witness. Thus, because these rules govern appointed expert witnesses, rather than those hired following court approval, they do not apply to the case sub judice.

The circuit court also found basis for its decision in W. Va. Code § 49-6-4(a), which statute is referenced in Trial Court Rule 27.01. In pertinent part, W. Va. Code § 49-6-4(a) states that,

> [a]t any time during proceedings under this article the court may, upon its own motion or upon motion of the child or other parties, order the child or other parties to be examined by a physician, psychologist or psychiatrist, and may require testimony from such expert, subject to cross-examination and the rules of evidence . . . . If the child, parent or custodian is indigent, such witnesses shall be compensated out of the Treasury of the State, upon certificate of the court wherein the case is pending. . . .

As with Trial Court Rule 27.01, however, this statute also pertains to experts who have been appointed by a court because it speaks directly in terms of the court "order[ing]" such examination. In the abuse and neglect proceeding underlying the instant appeal, however, the circuit court did not order any party to be examined by the expert witness requested by Chevie's mother, and, in fact, Chevie's mother was not certain she would definitely call an expert witness when she requested the court's approval to retain one. Rather, Chevie's mother merely sought the circuit court's blessing to hire an expert witness if necessary to rebut the DHHR's evidence of Chevie's abuse and/or neglect. Because the circuit court in this case only approved, and did not appoint, the mother's expert, W. Va. Code § 49-6-4(a) likewise does not apply to the facts of this case. Therefore, we reject the circuit court's reliance on W. Va. Trial Court Rules 27.01 and 27.02 and W. Va. Code § 49-6-4(a) as authority supporting its decision to require the DHHR to pay for the mother's expert.

2. W. Va. Code § 29-21-13a(e) (2008) (Repl. Vol. 2008) and W. Va. Trial Court Rule 35.05(b). By contrast, the DHHR advocates that the governing authorities dictating payment of the mother's expert witness by the Public Defender Corporation are W. Va. Code § 29-21-13a(e) and W. Va. Trial Court Rule 35.05(b). W. Va. Code § 29-21-13a(e) specifies that,

> [f]or all other eligible proceedings, actual and necessary expenses incurred in providing legal representation, including, but not limited to, expenses for travel . . . and expert witnesses . . . shall be reimbursed to a maximum of one thousand five hundred dollars unless the court, for good cause shown, approves reimbursement of a larger sum.

(Emphasis added). By definition, the reference to "[e]ligible proceeding[s]" encompasses "child abuse and neglect proceedings which may result in a termination of parental rights," W. Va. Code § 29-21-2(2) (1996) (Repl. Vol. 2008), such as the underlying abuse and neglect proceeding at issue in this case.

Although this statute is relevant and specifically applies to abuse and neglect proceedings, abuse and neglect proceedings are only one of approximately fourteen different categories of cases that qualify as an "eligible proceeding" under W. Va. Code § 29-21-2(2). As such, W. Va. Code § 29-21-13a(e) is a more general statute delineating who is responsible for paying for an indigent parent's expert witness fees in an abuse and neglect proceeding because it establishes the Public Defender Corporation's payment obligation not just for abuse and neglect cases but for all types of proceedings involving an indigent defendant. As a rule, when both a specific and a general statute apply to a given case, the specific statute governs. See Syl. pt. 6, State ex rel. Tucker Cnty. Solid Waste Auth. v. West Virginia Div. of Labor, 222 W. Va. 588, 668 S.E.2d 217 ("'The general rule of statutory construction requires that a specific statute be given precedence over a general statute relating to the same subject matter where the two cannot be reconciled.' Syllabus point 1, UMWA by Trumka v. Kingdon, 174 W. Va. 330, 325 S.E.2d 120 (1984)."). W. Va. Code § 29-21-13a(e), being a more general statute pertaining to several different types of cases, necessarily must yield to the more specific statute, W. Va. Code § 49-7-33, whose scope is limited solely to abuse and neglect and juvenile proceedings.

The DHHR also urges that Rule 35.05(b) of the W. Va. Trial Court Rules similarly charges the Public Defender Corporation as the responsible party for the payment of the mother's expert witness expenses. Chapter 35 of the W. Va. Trial Court Rules addresses "public funding for expert assistance." More specifically, W. Va. Trial Court Rule 35.05(b) directs that

> (b) Expert Requested by an Indigent Defendant. – Upon completion of services by such expert, the court shall, by order, direct payment by Public Defender Services pursuant to W. Va. Code, Chapter 29 [see §§ 29-21-1 et seq.].

In the same manner as W. Va. Code § 29-21-13a(e), however, Rule 35.05(b), while applicable to abuse and neglect proceedings among other cases, is simply too broad and general when compared with the more specific scope of W. Va. Code § 49-7-33. Therefore, we do not find either W. Va. Code § 29-21-13a(e) or W. Va. Trial Court Rule 35.05(b) to be persuasive authority to relieve the DHHR of its payment obligation in this case.

3. W. Va. Code § 49-7-33 (2002) (Repl. Vol. 2009). Lastly, the Guardian ad Litem suggests that W. Va. Code § 49-7-33 definitively establishes the DHHR's responsibility for paying Chevie's mother's expert witness costs as ordered by the circuit court. The full text of W. Va. Code § 49-7-33 provides

> [a]t any time during any proceedings brought pursuant to articles five [§§ 49-5-1 et seq.] [juvenile proceedings] and six [§§ 49-6-1 et seq.] [cases of child neglect or abuse] of this chapter, the court may upon its own motion, or upon a motion of any party, order the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources to pay for professional services rendered by a psychologist, psychiatrist, physician, therapist or other health care professional to a child or other party to the proceedings. Professional services include, but are not limited to, treatment, therapy, counseling, evaluation, report preparation, consultation and preparation of expert testimony. The West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources shall set the fee schedule for such services in accordance with the Medicaid rate, if any, or the customary rate and adjust the schedule as appropriate. Every such psychologist, psychiatrist, > physician, therapist or other health care professional shall be paid by the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources upon completion of services and submission of a final report or other information and documentation as required by the policies and procedures implemented by the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources.

We find this statutory language to be plain and capable of but one construction. As such, W. Va. Code § 49-7-33 must be applied as it is written. See Syl. pt. 5, State v. General Daniel Morgan Post No. 548, V.F.W., 144 W. Va. 137, 107 S.E.2d 353. Accordingly, we hold that, pursuant to the plain language of W. Va. Code § 49-7-33 (2002) (Repl. Vol. 2009), a circuit court "may . . . order the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources to pay for professional services" incurred in a child abuse and neglect proceeding. Such "professional services" include, but are not limited to, "evaluation, report preparation, consultation and preparation of expert testimony" by an expert witness. W. Va. Code § 49-7-33.

Having found this statutory language to be plain, we next must consider whether it is determinative of the instant controversy. We find that it is. Unlike the statutes applicable to numerous different types of proceedings discussed in the preceding section, W. Va. Code § 49-7-33 specifically pertains only to juvenile and abuse and neglect proceedings. As such, it is a specific statute that expressly applies to abuse and neglect proceedings such as those underlying the instant appeal. Thus, as a more specific statute, this statute is dispositive and permits a circuit court to order the DHHR to pay for a party's expert witness in an abuse and neglect case. See Syl. pt. 6, Tucker Cnty. Solid Waste Auth., 222 W. Va. 588, 668 S.E.2d 217.

Finally, we must consider whether the circuit court correctly ordered the DHHR to pay for the expenses associated with Chevie's mother's expert witness. W. Va. Code § 49-7-33 employs the word "may" in describing the circuit court's authority to require the DHHR to pay for professional services. We have construed the word "may" to be permissive and connoting discretion. See Gebr. Eickhoff Maschienenfabrik und Eisengieberei mbH v. Starcher, 174 W. Va. 618, 626 n.12, 328 S.E.2d 492, 500 n.12 (1985) ("An elementary principle of statutory construction is that the word 'may' is inherently permissive in nature and connotes discretion." (citations omitted)). Here, the circuit court properly exercised its discretion in ordering the DHHR to pay for Chevie's mother's expert witness costs in the first instance. Moreover, the circuit court did not abuse its discretion in denying the DHHR's motion for relief from the court's July 30th order establishing the DHHR's payment obligation insofar as said order was correct because the circuit court was statutorily authorized to direct the DHHR to pay for the mother's expert witness. Accordingly, to the extent the circuit court ordered the DHHR to pay the expenses associated with Chevie's mother's expert witness in the underlying abuse and neglect proceeding and subsequently upheld its decision, both rulings are affirmed.[9] [9]Although we affirm the circuit court's rulings based upon different authority than that relied upon by the circuit court in rendering its rulings, such disparity in decisional bases is permitted. See Syl. pt. 3, Barnett v. Wolfolk, 149 W. Va. 246, 140 S.E.2d 466 (1965) ("This Court may, on appeal, affirm the judgment of the lower court when it appears that such judgment is correct on any legal ground disclosed by the record, regardless of the ground, reason or theory assigned by the lower court as the basis for its judgment.").

B. Fee Schedule Governing Payment of Expert Witness Costs in Abuse and Neglect Proceeding

With regard to the second issue presented for this Court's resolution, the DHHR contends that if we should find that the DHHR is the party responsible for the payment of the mother's expert witness in this case, then it, and not the Public Defender Corporation, should be permitted to set the fee for such services. We agree with the DHHR that the circuit court erred in requiring the DHHR to pay Chevie's mother's expert witness costs in accordance with the fee schedule adopted by the Public Defender Corporation and approved by the circuit court in its February 27, 2009, order.

W. Va. Code § 49-7-33 specifically describes the manner in which the expert fees for which the DHHR is responsible are to be calculated. In this regard, the statute expressly explains that > [t]he West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources shall set the fee schedule for such services in accordance with the Medicaid rate, if any, or the customary rate and adjust the schedule as appropriate. Every such psychologist, psychiatrist, physician, therapist or other health care professional shall be paid by the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources upon completion of services and submission of a final report or other information and documentation as required by the policies and procedures implemented by the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources.

W. Va. Code § 49-7-33 (emphasis added). This language also is plain in its clarification of the method by which such payments are to be calculated. Thus, we hold that when a circuit court orders the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources to pay for professional services, including those provided by an expert witness, pursuant to the provisions of W. Va. Code § 49-7-33 (2002) (Repl. Vol. 2009), the Department of Health and Human Resources shall be permitted to establish the fee schedule by which the professional will be paid "in accordance with the Medicaid rate, if any, or the customary rate [with] adjust[ments to] the schedule as appropriate." W. Va. Code § 49-7-33.

Although we approve the circuit court's decisions to charge the DHHR with payment of the mother's expert witness expenses, we disapprove of the court's corresponding requirement that the DHHR pay such expenses in accordance with a fee schedule that is not its own. W. Va. Code § 49-7-33 clearly and explicitly states that the DHHR "shall set the fee schedule for such services." "Shall" is a mandatory, directory term that does not afford discretion in fulfilling its command. See Syl. pt. 1, E.H. v. Matin, 201 W. Va. 463, 498 S.E.2d 35 (1997) ("'It is well established that the word "shall," in the absence of language in the statute showing a contrary intent on the part of the Legislature, should be afforded a mandatory connotation.' Syllabus Point 1, Nelson v. West Virginia Public Employees Insurance Board, 171 W. Va. 445, 300 S.E.2d 86 (1982)."). Thus, the DHHR possesses the sole authority to determine the fee schedule by which professionals will be paid under W. Va. Code § 49-7-33. This conclusion reiterates our prior observation in Hewitt commenting that W. Va. Code § 49-7-33 "expressly grants authority to DHHR to set the rate for psychological evaluations and other types of services provided by a health care professional pursuant to the Medicaid-established rate, provided that such a rate exists." 212 W. Va. at 700 n.1, 575 S.E.2d at 310 n.1 (citations omitted). In spite of the DHHR's express authority, granted by statute and previously acknowledged by this Court in Hewitt, the circuit court nevertheless ignored the statute's directive, both through its initial order directing the DHHR to pay an amount that was calculated in accordance with the Public Defender Corporation's fee schedule and later when it refused the DHHR's request for relief on this ground. Consequently, we are compelled to reverse the circuit court's orders to the extent that they compel the DHHR to pay Chevie's mother's expert witness in accordance with the fee schedule adopted by the Public Defender Corporation. Accordingly, we remand this case to the circuit court for further proceedings to permit the DHHR to establish the fee schedule by which Chevie's mother's expert witness shall be paid in accordance with W. Va. Code § 49-7-33.

IV.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the July 30, 2009, and August 24, 2009, orders of the Circuit Court of Marshall County are hereby affirmed, in part, and reversed, in part, and this case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Affirmed, in part; Reversed, in part; and Remanded.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. """W. Va. Code, 49-1-3(a) (1984), in part, defines an abused child to include one whose parent knowingly allows another person to commit the abuse. Under this standard, termination of parental rights is usually upheld only where the parent takes no action in the face of knowledge of the abuse or actually aids or protects the abusing parent." 2. Where there is clear and convincing evidence that a child has suffered physical and/or sexual abuse while in the custody of his or her parent(s), guardian, or custodian, another child residing in the home when the abuse took place who is not a direct victim of the physical and/or sexual abuse but is at risk of being abused is an abused child under W. 3. """W. Va. The statute, however, does not specify any particular manner or mode of testimony or evidence by which the State Department of Welfare is obligated to meet this burden." 4. "Each child in an abuse and neglect case is entitled to effective representation of counsel. To further that goal, W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(a) [1992] mandates that a child has a right to be represented by counsel in every stage of abuse and neglect proceedings. Furthermore, Rule XIII of the West Virginia Rules for Trial Courts of Record provides that a guardian ad litem shall make a full and independent investigation of the facts involved in the proceeding, and shall make his or her recommendations known to the court. Rules 1.1 and 1.3 of the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct, respectively, require an attorney to provide competent representation to a client, and to act with reasonable diligence and promptness in representing a client." 5. When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest.

Cleckley, Justice:

In this child abuse and neglect case, the Circuit Court of Wood County terminated the parental rights of Bonita L.See footnote 1 to her children, Christina L. and Kenneth J.L., and authorized their adoption. The parental termination was based on evidence that Bonita L.'s live-in boyfriend, James R., sexually abused Christina L. for many years. Furthermore, Bonita L. knew of such abuse and aided James R. in performing some of the acts. Bonita L. and the guardian ad litem for Kenneth J.L. join in this appealSee footnote 2 and cite as error: (1) the circuit court's refusal to allow the mother's counsel and the guardian ad litem for the children the opportunity to submit their proposed dispositional alternatives; and (2) the authorization for the children's adoption since the children's father is not a respondent to the proceedings. Bonita L. raises an additional assignment of error that her parental rights should not be terminated because she had no knowledge the abuse was occurring.See footnote 3 For reasons discussed below, we remand this case to the circuit court for action consistent with this opinion.

I. FACTS AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

Bonita L. and Paul David L. are the natural parents of Christina L., who was born October 9, 1981, and Kenneth J.L., who was born January 12, 1983. Mr. and Mrs. L. divorced shortly after Kenneth's birth, and Bonita L. was awarded custody of the children. Christina and Kenneth have had very little contact with their natural father since the divorce. Bonita L. has lived as husband and wife with her boyfriend, James R., for more than a decade. The children refer to James R. as their father.

The investigation into this matter began after twelve- year-old Christina told a friend at school and a teacher that James R. had sexual contact with her. The evidence shows the sexual abuse began at approximately the time Christina was in the third grade and continued to the time it was reported. She stated James R. touched her breasts, vagina, and anus with his hands and penis. Furthermore, he attempted to penetrate her vagina and anus with his penis. Christina testified the abuse usually occurred in her parents' bedroom in the middle of the night or before school began.

Karol Payne, a child protective services worker with the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (Department), testified at the November 10, 1993, hearing that Christina told her that her mother knew the abuse was occurring because Bonita L. would sometimes hold her arms and tell her to be quiet. Christina testified that Bonita L. would tell her to hold still and not to "squirm." Christina also stated that Bonita L. and James R., on occasion, took Polaroid pictures of these sex acts.

Based on this evidence, the circuit court ordered the removal of Christina and Kenneth from their home. Temporary custody was vested in the Department.

Dr. Joan Phillips, a pediatrician, performed an examination on Christina at the Sexual Assault Clinic of Women and Children's Hospital in Charleston. Dr. Phillips testified at the February 25, 1994, hearing that her findings supported Christina's disclosure of sexual abuse. Upon examination, she noticed a notch in the vagina indicative of a penetration-type forced trauma. Dr. Phillips described the old injury as "an indentation or V-ed area into the tissue of the hymen. That is significant in that it was deep which would indicate that it had perhaps been a healed tear. It was also at the 8:00 position. We look at the vaginal opening as we would a clock from 12:00 all of the way around. Any notch between the 3:00 and 9:00 position is strongly indicative of trauma or healed trauma."

Dr. Phillips stated a straddle-type injury would not produce this result. Furthermore, it was highly unlikely the injury was caused by masturbation or tampon use.

Bonita L. and James R. vehemently denied any sexual abuse occurred. They speculated that Christina conjured up this story because she was jealous of the attention James R. began paying to his grandson. Furthermore, James R. stated that Christina's allegations were physically impossible because medical problems had prevented him from maintaining an erection for approximately three years. However, no medical evidence was submitted to support his claim.

Kenneth testified he was never sexually abused and no evidence was submitted to show he was abused or exposed to Christina's abuse. He testified he wanted to return to his mother's custody.See footnote 4 Kenneth also testified his mother and other family members did not believe Christina and put pressure on her to rescind the allegations.

By order entered May 23, 1994, the circuit court found by clear and convincing evidence that Christina was sexually abused by James R. and that her mother failed to protect her from the abuse even though she was aware that the abuse occurred. No findings were made in regard to Kenneth. The matter was set for a dispositional hearing.

At the dispositional hearing held May 31, 1994, Cynthia Beck, a psychologist, testified that she had conducted therapy for both Christina and Kenneth on a weekly basis for over a five-month period. Ms. Beck stated she originally diagnosed Christina as having a post-traumatic stress disorder. Christina had made progress in decreasing her anxiety level and was doing well in foster care. She recommended that Christina not return to her mother's custody because James R. was still in the home and Bonita L. never acknowledged the abuse occurred. Ms. Beck testified that it made Christina very angry and frustrated that her mother did not support her.

Ms. Beck diagnosed Kenneth as suffering from depression, although she admitted the depression may have been due to his placement in foster care. She stated that Kenneth wavers back and forth in deciding whether he believes Christina was sexually abused. He wants to believe his parents, but he also has a close bond to Christina and does not want to conclude she is lying. During one therapy session, he remembered two incidents that led him to believe the sexual abuse allegations may have been true. When Kenneth was getting something to eat one night, he remembered seeing James R. going towards Christina's bedroom. Also, he could remember walking into the house on one occasion and encountering James R. running through the house naked. Ms. Beck recommended that Kenneth remain in foster care. She testified that research indicates whenever one child is sexually abused, other children in the home are also at risk of being sexually abused. Furthermore, Kenneth was just beginning to work through the issues of sexual abuse and Ms. Beck was afraid a return to the home would undermine his therapy.

Joan George, a child protective services worker for the Department, testified that Bonita L. never acknowledged that Christina was sexually abused by James R. and was emphatic that she did not assist him. Ms. George testified that, during a visit, Bonita L. told Kenneth, directly in front of Christina, that she did not believe Christina. Ms. George recommended that all parental rights be terminated. She testified that Christina would like to stay in foster care until she reaches the age of eighteen, and then she would visit her mother and not have to see James R. Ms. George stated that due to Bonita L.'s refusal to accept responsibility for what happened to Christina, she was unable to work with the mother to help solve the family's problems. Ms. George felt that both children should be permanently removed from the home.

By order entered June 21, 1994, the circuit court found no reasonable likelihood that Bonita L. would substantially correct the conditions of abuse in the near future. Accordingly, Bonita L.'s parental rights were terminated to both Christina and Kenneth. The circuit court specifically authorized the Department to consent to the adoption of both children.

Bonita L. and the guardian ad litem for Kenneth join in this appeal. Bonita L. concedes that "any attempt to reunite mother and daughter would be futile" because Christina does not want to return home. Therefore, Bonita L. does not appeal the circuit court's decision in regard to Christina.

II. TERMINATION

A. Christina

We first address Bonita L.'s assertion that only a "scintilla of evidence" supports the circuit court's finding that she was aware James R. was sexually abusing Christina. This assignment of error is without merit. Karol Payne testified that Christina told her Bonita L. was aware of the abuse because she was there and participated in at least some of the acts by holding Christina's arms. Furthermore, Christina testified that her mother told her not to "squirm" and to be quiet when James R. sexually abused her. There was also evidence that Bonita L. took Polaroid pictures of the incidents or was at least aware of the existence of the pictures. Using the standard reiterated in Syllabus Point 1 of In re Jonathan Michael D., __ W. Va. __, __ S.E.2d __ (No. 22732 5/18/95), Bonita L.'s actions constitute child abuse:

> ""W. Va. Code, 49-1-3(a) (1984), in part, defines an abused child to include one whose parent knowingly allows another person to commit the abuse. Under this standard, termination of parental rights is usually upheld only where the parent takes no action in the face of knowledge of the abuse or actually aids or protects the abusing parent." Syl. pt. 3, In re Betty J.W., 179 W. Va. 605, 371 S.E.2d 326 (1988).' Syllabus Point 2, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993)."

Furthermore, the circuit court found Bonita L. was aware the abuse was occurring and did nothing to prevent it. This Court accords deference to the findings of the circuit court and will not set aside its findings "unless clearly erroneous[.]" W.Va.R.Civ.P. 52(a). "[A] reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm '[i]f the [circuit] court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety[.]'" In re Jonathan Michael D., __ W. Va. at __, __ S.E.2d at __ (Slip op. at 12), quoting Anderson v. City of Bessemer City, N.C., 470 U.S. 564, 573, 105 S. Ct. 1504, 1511, 84 L.Ed.2d 518, 528 (1985). The circuit court's decision to terminate Bonita L.'s parental rights to Christina is substantially supported by the record. Accordingly, we affirm that portion of the circuit court's order.

B. Kenneth

Although Bonita L. does not appeal the circuit court's decision regarding Christina, the circuit court's finding of Kenneth's abuse stems from her actions in abusing Christina. No evidence was presented that Kenneth was sexually abused by James R. However, the Department alleged he was an abused child under W. Va. Code, 49-1-3(a) (1994), which states, in part:

> "'Abused child' means a child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by:
> "(1) A parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home; or
> "(2) Sexual abuse or sexual exploitation[.]" (Emphasis added).

We find that the language of the statute is clear on its face.See footnote 5 The West Virginia Legislature plainly articulated its intention that "an 'abused child' means a child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by" the abuse inflicted upon "another child in the home." Under the statute, there need not be a showing by the Department that each child in the home is directly abused, either sexually or physically, before termination of parental rights is sought.

Accordingly, we hold that where there is clear and convincing evidence that a child has suffered physical and/or sexual abuse while in the custody of his or her parent(s), guardian, or custodian, another child residing in the home when the abuse took place who is not a direct victim of the physical and/or sexual abuse but is at risk of being abused is an abused child under W. Va. Code, 49-1-3(a) (1994).

We decline, however, to adopt a blanket rule that parental rights must be terminated to all the children residing in the home based merely on the finding that one child is abused. We do not believe this result was intended under the statute. Under W. Va. Code, 49-1-3(a), the Department must present clear and convincing evidence that the child's "health or welfare is harmed or threatened." Syllabus Point 1 of In re Beth, ___ W. Va. ___, 453 S.E.2d 639 (1994), states:

"'"W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], requires the State Department of Welfare [now the Department of Human Services], in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove 'conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition . . . by clear and convincing proof.' The statute, however, does not specify any particular manner or mode of testimony or evidence by which the State Department of Welfare is obligated to meet this burden." Syllabus Point 1, In Interest of S.C., 168 W. Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981).' Syllabus Point 1, West Virginia Department of Human Services v. Peggy F., 184 W. Va. 60, 399 S.E.2d 460 (1990)."

Our review of the record reveals that very little reference is made by Ms. Beck and Ms. George to any potential risk that Kenneth may be harmed or threatened by James R. or Bonita L. Ms. Beck made a vague reference to some unidentified studies that she relied upon indicating that if one child in the home is sexually abused then other children in the home suffer a higher risk of being sexually abused. Ms. George was concerned that Bonita L.'s denial of the abuse charges relating to Christina would somehow affect her ability to protect Kenneth. Apart from this testimony, the Department failed to put on additional evidence directly dealing with Kenneth's well being.See footnote 6

Moreover, the circuit court did not make a specific and independent finding of fact or conclusion of law that Kenneth either was abused or would be at risk of being abused if returned to his mother's custody. More specific findings are required in cases of this nature. Under W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) (1992), the circuit court is required to "make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected, which shall be incorporated into the order of the court." See State v. T.C., 172 W. Va. 47, 303 S.E.2d 685 (1983).

The evidence of Christina's abuse is certainly relevant and probative to the issue of Bonita L.'s capacity to protect Kenneth from any abuse should James R. begin abusing Kenneth, as the circuit court apparently feared would happen. Of particular concern to this Court is the possibility that should Kenneth be returned to the home, he may now be all the more reluctant to notify anyone should he be abused. He has experienced the ordeals of this case in which Bonita L. chose not to defend her daughter, but instead chose to defend her boyfriend even in the face of the evidence of sexual abuse. Kenneth may conclude that Bonita L. would likewise not support him should she be confronted with this issue again. In making its ultimate determination as to the disposition of Kenneth, the circuit court should take into consideration these concerns.

Because this issue was not specifically resolved below, we remand this case and direct the Department to conduct a further investigation as to any harm Kenneth may have suffered while residing with Bonita L. and James R. and the risk of being abused or further harmed if he is returned to their home. After hearing this evidence, the circuit court should make specific findings of fact and conclusions of law directly addressing the charges against Bonita L. as they relate to Kenneth. See Kincaid v. Morgan, 188 W. Va. 452, 425 S.E.2d 128 (1992) (this Court will remand case for further development if record has not been adequately developed).

III. DISPOSITIONAL HEARING

Bonita L. and Kenneth's guardian ad litem contend the circuit court wrongfully refused to allow them the opportunity to submit their proposed dispositional plans during the May 31, 1994, dispositional hearing. We agree.

At the close of Ms. George's testimony, the circuit court ruled that the only remedy would be to terminate parental rights. The guardian ad litem interrupted and requested the court to allow him to submit his dispositional plan into the record. The circuit court refused:

"A plan would be irrelevant. Any plan other than termination would be irrelevant so I would not allow you to encumber the record with the plan. The only plan would be where the department puts the custody of the children. So another plan would not only be irrelevant, it would be of no consequence and would encumber the record unnecessarily."

The State concedes the circuit court should have allowed counsel for Bonita L. and the guardian ad litem to present their alternative dispositional plans at the hearing. However, it claims the failure to do so is not reversible error because the circuit court was aware that the guardian ad litem would recommend returning Kenneth to the home because of Kenneth's earlier testimony. We disagree.

There is no dispute the circuit court found the alternative plans irrelevant and prevented the guardian ad litem from submitting his proposal into the record. Two witnesses for the State, Ms. Beck and Ms. George, were the only persons to testify at the dispositional hearing. At the conclusion of their testimony, the circuit court articulated its findings without allowing counsel on either side to argue the appropriateness of their dispositional plans. There is a clear legislative directive that guardians ad litem and counsel for both sides be given an opportunity to advocate for their clients in child abuse or neglect proceedings. W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 (1992), states that the circuit court shall give "both the petitioner and respondents an opportunity to be heard" when proceeding to the disposition of the case. The essence of effective representation is an opportunity to make a summation and recommendation before the rendition of judgment in these nonjury proceedings. See Herring v. New York, 422 U.S. 853, 95 S. Ct. 2550, 45 L.Ed.2d 593 (1975). This right must be understood to mean that the circuit court may not impose unreasonable limitations upon the function of guardians ad litem in representing their clients in accord with the traditions of the adversarial fact-finding process. In Syllabus Point 5, in part, of In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993), we stated:

"Each child in an abuse and neglect case is entitled to effective representation of counsel. To further that goal, W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(a) [1992] mandates that a child has a right to be represented by counsel in every stage of abuse and neglect proceedings. Furthermore, Rule XIII of the West Virginia Rules for Trial Courts of Record provides that a guardian ad litem shall make a full and independent investigation of the facts involved in the proceeding, and shall make his or her recommendations known to the court. Rules 1.1 and 1.3 of the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct, respectively, require an attorney to provide competent representation to a client, and to act with reasonable diligence and promptness in representing a client."

In child abuse and neglect cases, the best interests of the child are the paramount concern. In re Jeffrey R.L., supra. Therefore, error of substantial proportion was committed when the guardian ad litem was not provided the opportunity to orally articulate his client's best interests. We cannot state that such constitutional error was harmless. This Court will not speculate as to what the arguments of counsel would have been or as to their potential effect on the circuit court.See footnote 7

Two issues should have been addressed below by the parties. First, the record reflects that Kenneth and Christina have a close bond and wish to keep in contact with one another. At the time of the dispositional hearing, they resided in separate foster homes. The parties should have addressed what steps could be taken to preserve their sibling bond--such as visitation rights with each other. In James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991), we stated the Department and the court must make diligent efforts to promote children's continued association with one another. On remand, the circuit court should hear the parties' proposals on this issue.

Second, even though the circuit court decided to terminate Bonita L.'s parental rights, the lower court may still consider whether it is in Kenneth's best interest to have continued visitation with his mother. Concededly, Kenneth does not have a clear right to object to the termination of his mother's parental rights because he has not yet reached the age of fourteen.See footnote 8 However, at the time of the dispositional hearing, Kenneth was approaching eleven years of age. He had earlier stated that he loved his mother and wished to be with her. Kenneth appears to be a bright young man who misses his mother very much and would be devastated at the prospect of never seeing her again. After considering the arguments of the guardian ad litem, the circuit court must determine whether Kenneth is

"of an age of discretion" to object to the termination or to seek continued contact with his mother. See W. Va. Code, 49-6-5.

We find that when parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest.See footnote 9

On remand, the circuit court should hear arguments from both sides on this issue if it decides to terminate Bonita L.'s parental rights to Kenneth.

IV. CONSENT TO ADOPT

Bonita L. and Kenneth also argue the circuit court erred in authorizing the adoption of Christina and Kenneth without including their natural father, Paul David L., in the proceedings. We agree. W. Va. Code, 49-6-1 (1992), sets forth specific notice requirements in abuse and neglect cases.See footnote 10

The petition filed by the Department states "the father of the above-named children is Paul David [L.] who resides somewhere in Parkersburg, but whose exact address is currently unknown; he has had no contact with the above-named children for a number of years." Nothing in the record below indicates the Department attempted to locate the father and notify him pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6-1. The circuit court's order authorizing the Department to consent to the children's adoption without addressing the natural father's parental rights strips him of any parental rights without affording him due process. See Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (No. 22507 6/21/95); In re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973). See also Stanley v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 645, 92 S. Ct. 1208, 31 L.Ed.2d 551 (1972). Perhaps even more importantly, it leaves the status of the children dangling, and the validity of a future adoption subject to challenge. It seems to be a general practice of the Department not to include allegations of abandonment in petitions for abuse and neglect, thus leaving the children in "No Man's Land" with regard to any resolution in their lives.

As we said in Syllabus Point 2 of James M. v. Maynard, supra, abandonment of a child by a parent constitutes compelling circumstances sufficient to justify the denial of an improvement period. Obviously, it also constitutes grounds for termination of parental rights.

Thus, when the Department seeks to terminate parental rights where an absent parent has abandoned the child, allegations of such abandonment should be included in the petition and every effort made to comply with the notice requirements of W. Va. Code, 49-6-1 (1992).

The failure to give reasonable notice is particularly troubling when we consider the fact that the Department believed Paul David L. also resided in Parkersburg and did nothing to notify him. We found such failure to notify reversible error in In re Sutton, 132 W. Va. 875, 880, 53 S.E.2d 839, 842 (1949):

> "Inasmuch as the record discloses that both parents were within the jurisdiction of the court, and that the welfare agency had knowledge of the marriage of the parents and the fact that the father recognized the child as his, we are of opinion that notice should have been given to the parents of the presentation of the petition to the juvenile court seeking the custody of the child on the ground that it was at the time a dependent and neglected child within the meaning of the statute. A parent, in our opinion, cannot be divested of parental rights without notice and opportunity for hearing."

The State argues the natural father can move to protect his rights when and if the Department finds persons to adopt the children. However, we find this argument unpersuasive. It would be ludicrous for this Court to allow this matter to linger while Christina and Kenneth are in foster care. Should they be fortunate enough to form a bond with their foster parents and the foster parents move for adoption, it would be all the more devastating to the children to have to go back into court to litigate whatever rights the natural father may possess. Dangling, unresolved parental rights also have a chilling effect on potential adoptive parents. We choose to resolve this issue in a timely manner rather than to leave this potential timebomb unresolved. Accordingly, based on the above evidence, we find it was reversible error for the circuit court to authorize the Department to consent to the children's adoption without first giving notice to their natural father and attempting to ascertain his rights and intentions.

V. CONCLUSION

Based on the foregoing, we remand this case with directions to the Department to more fully investigate the abuse charges against Bonita L. as they relate to Kenneth. The circuit court should consider this evidence along with the alternative dispositional plans of the parties and set forth specific findings of fact and conclusions of law in its order. Proper notice of these proceedings must be given to Paul David L. before the Department may be authorized to consent to the adoption of the children.

Affirmed, in part, reversed, in part, and remanded with directions.

Footnote 2 Both Bonita L. and the guardian ad litem for Kenneth petitioned for appeal following the circuit court's decision. The appeals were consolidated. While the brief of Bonita L. appears on its face to have been submitted jointly, the guardian ad litem failed to sign the brief and failed to appear before this Court. It is ironic that one assignment of error revolves around the circuit court's refusal to accord the guardian ad litem an independent role in the proceedings when he failed to exercise that role on appeal.

Footnote 3 Bonita L. does not appeal the circuit court's decision to terminate her parental rights to Christina.

Footnote 4 There was evidence that Kenneth had been moved to two or three different homes while in foster care and was having a difficult time adjusting.

Footnote 5 In Donley v. Bracken, 192 W. Va. 383, ___, 452 S.E.2d 699, 703 (1994), we stated:

"If the statutory language is plain and admits of no more than one meaning, and within the constitutional authority of the law-making body which passed it, the duty of interpretation does not arise, and the rules which are to aid ambiguous language need no discussion. State ex rel. Estes v. Egnor, 191 W. Va. 36, 443 S.E.2d 193 (1994)[.]"

Footnote 6 We agree with the circuit court that the facts of this case are most egregious. Bonita L. allowed the repeated sexual abuse of her minor daughter and did nothing to stop James R. She was aware such abuse was occurring for years and aided her boyfriend in performing some of the acts. Kenneth was living in the home when Bonita L. and James R. committed these atrocities. However, there still must be sufficient record evidence demonstrating that his "health or welfare is harmed or threatened" by the conditions existing in the home. Evidence as egregious as that in the instant case may support a finding that a parent is so deficient in the basic parental instinct to protect his or her child(ren) that termination of rights to siblings can be justified on that basis alone. However, this is an issue which the circuit court should examine and make specific findings of fact and conclusions of law.

Footnote 7 We take this opportunity to state that we are troubled by the fact that the guardian ad litem for Kenneth failed to appear before this Court during the scheduled argument in this case. Clearly, it would have been to Kenneth's advantage had his attorney represented him during oral argument and been available to answer the questions of this Court. In Matter of Scottie D., 185 W. Va. 191, 198, 406 S.E.2d 214, 221 (1991), we stated that guardians ad litem have the duty to exercise the child's appellate rights if an appeal is deemed necessary:

"It is well established that '[a]fter judgment adverse to his ward, the guardian ad litem has the right to appeal and the duty to do so if it reasonably appears to be to the advantage of the minor[.]' Robinson v. Gatch, 85 Ohio App. 484, 487, 87 N.E.2d 904, 906 (1949). This is based upon the principle that a guardian ad litem has a duty to represent the child(ren) to whom he or she has been appointed, as effectively as if the guardian ad litem were in a normal lawyer-client relationship."

We note that the guardian ad litem appears to have been diligent in protecting his client's interests below. While we are unaware of the reason this particular attorney did not attend the argument, this Court is disturbed by the cavalier attitude taken by some guardians ad litem in failing to appear before this Court to represent their clients and failing to notify the Court of the reason they cannot attend. We again admonish guardians ad litem that it is their responsibility to represent their clients in every stage of the abuse and/or neglect proceedings. This duty includes appearing before this Court to represent the child during oral arguments. In fact, the guardian ad litem's role to represent the child does not cease until permanent placement of the child is achieved. Syl. pt. 5, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991).

Code, 49-6-5(6) (1992), which states, in part: "Notwithstanding any other provision of this article, the permanent parental rights shall not be terminated if a child fourteen years of age or older or otherwise of an age of discretion as determined by the court, objects to such termination."*

Footnote 9 Such post-termination visitation or other continued contact where determined to be in the best interest of the child could be ordered not as a right of the parent, but rather as a right of the child. See Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W. Va. 448, 388 S.E.2d 322 (1989), and James M. v. Maynard, supra, enunciating right of the child to continued association with those with whom he or she shares an emotional bond.

In cases wherein personal service within West Virginia cannot be obtained after due diligence upon any parent or other custodian, a copy of the petition and notice of the hearing shall be mailed to such person by certified mail, addressee only, return receipt requested, to the last known address of such person. If said person signs the certificate, service shall be complete and said certificate shall be filed as proof of said service with the clerk of the circuit court. If service cannot be obtained by personal service or by certified mail, notice shall be by publication as a Class II legal advertisement in compliance with the provisions of article three [§ 59-3-1 et seq.], chapter fifty-nine of this code. A notice of hearing shall specify the time and place of the hearing, the right to counsel of the child and parents or other custodians at every stage of the proceedings and the fact that such proceedings can result in the permanent termination of the parental rights. Failure to object to defects in the petition and notice shall not be construed as a waiver."

CHIEF JUSTICE DAVIS delivered the Opinion of the Court.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "'"A circuit court, upon motion of a party, by its inherent power to do what is reasonably necessary for the administration of justice, may disqualify a lawyer from a case because the lawyer's representation in the case presents a conflict of interest where the conflict is such as clearly to call in question the fair or efficient administration of justice. Such motion should be viewed with extreme caution because of the interference with the lawyer-client relationship." Syl. Pt. 1, Garlow v. Zakaib, 186 W. Va. 457, 413 S.E.2d 112 (1991).' Syllabus point 2, Musick v. Musick, 192 W. Va. 527, 453 S.E.2d 361 (1994)." Syllabus point 3, State ex rel. Michael A.P. v. Miller, 207 W. Va. 114, 529 S.E.2d 354 (2000).

2. "In reviewing challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, we apply a two-prong deferential standard of review. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard. Questions of law are subject to a de novo review." Syllabus point 2, Walker v. West Virginia Ethics Commission, 201 W. Va. 108, 492 S.E.2d 167 (1997).

3. Because many aspects of a guardian ad litem's representation of a child in an abuse and neglect proceeding comprise duties that are performed by a lawyer on behalf of a client, the rules of professional conduct generally apply to that representation.

4. While a guardian ad litem owes a duty of confidentiality to the child[ren] he or she represents in child abuse and neglect proceedings, this duty is not absolute. Where honoring the duty of confidentiality would result in the child[ren]'s exposure to a high risk of probable harm, the guardian ad litem must make a disclosure to the presiding court in order to safeguard the best interests of the child[ren].

Davis, Chief Justice:

This abuse and neglect case raises the legal question of whether a guardian ad litem owes a duty of confidentiality to his or her infant charge such that, where the infant demands confidentiality with respect to information regarding abuse that the infant discloses to the guardian ad litem, the guardian may be justified in not informing a circuit or family court of the abuse alleged by the infant.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

Testimony presented in this case indicates that on September 17, 2005, a domestic dispute erupted between Linda H. and her boyfriend James B.[1] The dispute allegedly arose from Linda's anger that James had given attention and gifts to Linda's oldest daughter, Christina W., that Linda had desired for herself.[2] During the ensuing altercation, James began to choke Linda. According to Linda, Christina came to her mother's aid by hitting James with a broom while yelling, "let go of my mother or I will tell on you for touching me." Deputy E. P. Parks, of the Mercer County Sheriff's Department, child protective service workers, and Angela Robbins, an in-home service provider assigned to the family, all responded to this incident. Christina W. disclosed to Deputy Parks and Angela Robbins that James B. had been touching her inappropriately. However, Christina later recanted these statements.

Linda was given the option of leaving James in order to maintain custody of her children. Linda declined the offer and her three daughters, Christina W., Sissy W. and Lisa W. were removed from the home.[3] On September 21, 2005, a petition for abuse and neglect was filed based on domestic violence and sexual misconduct by James. A preliminary hearing was held on September 30, 2005, in the Circuit Court of Mercer County. At this hearing, the circuit court found that the children remained at risk due to domestic violence, and indicated that the sexual misconduct allegations required additional investigation.[4] At the time of the preliminary hearing, Christina continued to deny that inappropriate sexual conduct had occurred, and she expressed her desire to visit with her mother and James.[5]

[3]There are no issues involving Sissy W. and Lisa W. presently before this Court.

[4]According to the State, the parties to this case have indicated that the guardian ad litem appointed for the children, Mary Ellen Griffith, was ordered to investigate the allegations. The State acknowledges, however, that such a directive is not clearly expressed in the circuit court's order.

[5]An amended petition was also filed adding the girls' father, Larry W., and outlining the domestic violence in more detail. A motion to terminate the parental rights of Larry W., based upon his incarceration for sexually assaulting a child who is not a party to the instant action, has been taken under advisement by the circuit court. No issues involving

On October 25, 2005, a multi-disciplinary treatment team (hereinafter "MDT") meeting was held. Among those present at the meeting was Mary Ellen Griffith, who had been appointed guardian ad litem for the children. The MDT agreed to a non-custodial improvement period that would include various services for Linda and James,[6] and would also include weekly daytime unsupervised visits between the three girls and both Linda and James.

Later that same day, Ms. Griffith met with Christina and her sisters at the Paul Miller Shelter, which is where the girls had been placed. During the visit, Ms. Griffith spoke privately with Christina and questioned her about her prior allegations of sexual misconduct. Ms. Griffith states that Christina first questioned her regarding the attorney/client privilege and sought assurances that any information she revealed about sexual misconduct by James would not be shared. Christina then advised Ms. Griffith that James had in fact touched her inappropriately. However, Christina reported that she was "okay" and expressed her desire to go home to her mother. She further stated that she would not testify about James' abusive conduct.[7]

At an adjudicatory hearing on November 18, 2005, Linda and James stipulated to the allegations of domestic violence contained in the abuse and neglect petition. The children were adjudged neglected. A post-adjudicatory improvement period was granted to Linda and James. The improvement period was agreed to by all parties, including Ms. Griffith. The goal of the improvement period was reunification of all three girls with Linda and James, and it included unsupervised visits with both adults. The court set the matter for review on February 17, 2006.

In January 2006, prior to a scheduled MDT meeting, Ms. Griffith was advised by Stacy Cockerham, a case-worker, that Christina had disclosed to her James' sexual misconduct, and Christina had also revealed the abuse to Nancy Silvazi, a foster-care agency worker.[8] Christina also informed these two women of her prior disclosure of the abuse to her guardian ad litem, Ms. Griffith.[9] Thereafter, the Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR") petitioned the circuit court to remove Ms. Griffith as guardian ad litem psychological evaluation for Christina. Accordingly, when she later met with Christina, she encouraged Christina to discuss James' abuse with a counselor. According to Ms. Griffith, as of February 13, 2006, the psychological evaluation had not been completed.

[8]Upon learning of the renewed allegations of sexual misconduct, the Department of Health and Human Resources immediately stopped unsupervised visits with James.

[9]At a subsequent MDT meeting, Linda and James were confronted with Christina's renewed statements of sexual misconduct. Both of them denied the allegations, and Linda stated that she would relinquish her parental rights to all three girls.

due to conflict. Following a hearing on February 17, 2006, the circuit court denied the DHHR's motion to remove Ms. Griffith. The circuit court found that the lawyer/client privilege is applicable to the relationship between a child and his or her guardian ad litem, and denied the DHHR's motion to remove Ms. Griffith as guardian ad litem. The DHHR then filed this appeal seeking reversal of the circuit court's order.[10]

II.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

In this case we are asked to review the circuit court's ruling on the DHHR's motion to remove Ms. Griffith. With respect to the disqualification of a lawyer, we have previously held that

[10]On August 21, 2006, Ms. Griffith was appointed Family Court Judge for McDowell and Mercer Counties. Obviously, as a result of this appointment, Ms. Griffith may no longer serve as guardian ad litem in this case. Nevertheless, because the legal issue herein raised is capable of repetition, we may address this technically moot issue. See Syl. pt. 1, Israel by Israel v. West Virginia Secondary Schs. Activities Comm'n, 182 W. Va. 454, 388 S.E.2d 480 (1989) ("Three factors to be considered in deciding whether to address technically moot issues are as follows: first, the court will determine whether sufficient collateral consequences will result from determination of the questions presented so as to justify relief; second, while technically moot in the immediate context, questions of great public interest may nevertheless be addressed for the future guidance of the bar and of the public; and third, issues which may be repeatedly presented to the trial court, yet escape review at the appellate level because of their fleeting and determinate nature, may appropriately be decided."); Syl. pt. 1, State ex rel. M.C.H. v. Kinder, 173 W. Va. 387, 317 S.E.2d 150 (1984) ("A case is not rendered moot even though a party to the litigation has had a change in status such that he no longer has a legally cognizable interest in the litigation or the issues have lost their adversarial vitality, if such issues are capable of repetition and yet will evade review.").

> "'[a] circuit court, upon motion of a party, by its inherent power to do what is reasonably necessary for the administration of justice, may disqualify a lawyer from a case because the lawyer's representation in the case presents a conflict of interest where the conflict is such as clearly to call in question the fair or efficient administration of justice. Such motion should be viewed with extreme caution because of the interference with the lawyer-client relationship.' Syl. Pt. 1, Garlow v. Zakaib, 186 W. Va. 457, 413 S.E.2d 112 (1991)." Syllabus point 2, Musick v. Musick, 192 W. Va. 527, 453 S.E.2d 361 (1994).

Syl. pt. 3, State ex rel. Michael A.P. v. Miller, 207 W. Va. 114, 529 S.E.2d 354 (2000). In reviewing the circuit court's ruling on this matter, we are mindful that > [i]n reviewing challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, we apply a two-prong deferential standard of review. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard. Questions of law are subject to a de novo review.

Syl. pt. 2, Walker v. West Virginia Ethics Comm'n, 201 W. Va. 108, 492 S.E.2d 167 (1997). In this case, the circuit court's decision was based upon a legal determination. Therefore, we apply a de novo standard. See Syl. pt. 1, Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., 194 W. Va. 138, 459 S.E.2d 415 (1995) ("Where the issue on an appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of law or involving the interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review.").

III.

DISCUSSION

The narrow legal question we are asked to resolve in this case is whether a lawyer appointed to serve as guardian ad litem to a child involved in abuse and neglect proceedings owes a duty of confidentiality to the child such that the guardian may not disclose to the presiding court, without the consent of his or her child client, revelations from the child disclosing abuse. To answer this question, we first examine the nature of a lawyer's role in serving as guardian ad litem.

Rule 3(i) of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings defines "[g]uardian ad litem" as "the attorney appointed to represent the child." (Emphasis added). This definition, stating that the guardian is an "attorney" who is to "represent the child," indicates that the role of guardian ad litem is much the same as that of a lawyer representing a client.[11] See, e.g., Black's Law Dictionary 1303-04 (7th ed. 1999) (defining "representation," in part, as "[t]he act or an instance of standing for or acting on

[11]Rule 52(g) of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings similarly refers to a guardian ad litem as the attorney for the child[ren]:

> Continued duties of the child's attorney. The appointment of a CASA representative shall not in any way abrogate the duties and responsibilities imposed by law on the attorney for the child[ren]. The duties and responsibilities of a child's guardian ad litem shall continue until such child has a permanent placement, and the guardian ad litem shall not be relieved of his responsibilities until such permanent placement has been achieved.

(second and third emphasis added).

behalf of another, esp. by a lawyer on behalf of a client").[12] The conclusion that a guardian ad litem serves in a capacity very similar to that of a lawyer representing a client is further supported by W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(a) (2006) (Supp. 2006), which provides in relevant part that "[i]n any proceeding under the provisions of this article, the child . . . shall have the right to be represented by counsel at every stage of the proceedings . . . . Counsel of the child shall be appointed in the initial order." (Emphasis added). See also In re Tyler D., 213 W. Va. 149, 160, 578 S.E.2d 343, 354 (2003) (commenting that "children [in abuse and neglect cases] are entitled to effective representation through a guardian ad litem"); In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 453, 460 S.E.2d 692, 699 (1995) ("[T]he circuit court may not impose unreasonable limitations upon the function of guardians ad litem in representing their clients in accord with the traditions of the adversarial fact-finding process."); In re Scottie D., 185 W. Va. 191, 198, 406 S.E.2d 214, 221 (1991) ("[A] guardian ad litem has a duty to represent the child(ren) to whom he or she has been appointed, as effectively as if the guardian ad litem were in a normal lawyer-client relationship.").[13]

[12]Cf. Syl. pt. 1, Miners in Gen. Group v. Hix, 123 W. Va. 637, 17 S.E.2d 810 (1941), overruled on other grounds by Lee-Norse Co. v. Rutledge, 170 W. Va. 162, 291 S.E.2d 477 (1982) ("In the absence of any definition of the intended meaning of words or terms used in a legislative enactment, they will, in the interpretation of the act, be given their common, ordinary and accepted meaning in the connection in which they are used.").

> There is a clear legislative directive that guardians ad litem . . . be given an opportunity to advocate for their clients in

Likewise, many of the duties required by the "GUIDELINES FOR GUARDIANS AD LITEM IN ABUSE AND NEGLECT CASES" established by this Court and set out in Appendix A of In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993), are those that would be performed by a lawyer representing a client. For example, Rules 8 through 22 appear under the heading "Preparation for and Representation at Adjudicatory and Dispositional Hearing" and require guardians ad litem to perform a wide variety of lawyerly duties. For example, several of the rules require a guardian ad litem to

> 8. Pursue the discovery of evidence, formal and informal.

> 9. File timely and appropriate written motions such as motions for status conference, prompt hearing, evidentiary purpose, psychological examination, home study, and development and neurological study.

child abuse or neglect proceedings. West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a) (1995) states that the circuit court shall give both the petitioner and respondents an opportunity to be heard when proceeding to the disposition of the case. This right must be understood to mean that the circuit court may not impose unreasonable limitations upon the function of guardians ad litem in representing their clients in accord with the traditions of the adversarial fact-finding process.

> 16. Subpoena witnesses for hearings or otherwise prepare testimony or cross-examination of witnesses and ensure that relevant material is introduced.

190 W. Va. at 41, 435 S.E.2d at 179.

Due to the legal nature of a significant portion of the duties of a guardian ad litem, we believe that, as a general rule, the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct, which govern the conduct of lawyers practicing within the State of West Virginia, should apply to the conduct of guardians ad litem.[14] Accordingly, we now hold that, because many aspects of a guardian ad litem's representation of a child in an abuse and neglect proceeding comprise duties that are performed by a lawyer on behalf of a client, the rules of professional conduct generally apply to that representation.

We must emphasize, however, that this is merely a general rule. While it forms

[14]The In re Jeffrey R.L. Court commented that the guidelines for guardians ad litem adopted therein

> encompass some of the basic principles found under our Rules of Professional Conduct. Specifically, Rule 1.1 requires an attorney to "provide competent representation to a client" which "requires the legal knowledge, skill, thoroughness and preparation reasonably necessary for the representation." Furthermore, Rule 1.3 requires a lawyer to "act with reasonable diligence and promptness in representing a client." We believe the guidelines proposed for guardians ad litem essentially reflect these basic rules of practice by which each attorney is bound.

a necessary part of our analysis, it does not answer the specific question herein raised. The question we must resolve today is whether a guardian ad litem appointed in an abuse and neglect case owes a duty of confidentiality to the child he or she is representing such that the guardian ad litem is prohibited from disclosing to the presiding court information regarding abuse that the child wishes to remain confidential.

Ms. Griffith claims she was bound to keep her client's confidences by Rule 1.6(a) of the Rules of Professional Conduct,[15] which states in relevant part, that "[a] lawyer shall not reveal information relating to representation of a client unless the client consents after consultation . . . ." Ms. Griffith urges that this confidentiality in the relationship between a guardian ad litem and an infant furthers the compelling need of the child to have a guardian ad litem with whom he or she can freely communicate. However, we believe that the strict adherence to this rule advocated by Ms. Griffith fails to fully appreciate the complex nature of abuse and neglect proceedings, as well as the multi-faceted duties of guardians ad litem. Indeed, the obligations of a guardian ad litem extend much farther than those anticipated by the typical lawyer/client relationship.

The predominant charge to lawyers representing children involved in abuse and

[15]Because the parties have briefed this case in the context of the Rules of Professional Conduct, our analysis is based upon those rules. We note, however, that the exception to the confidentiality rule for child abuse and neglect cases established in this opinion applies equally to the attorney/client privilege.

neglect cases is that the best interests of the children is of paramount concern. In re Amber Leigh J., 216 W. Va. 266, 272, 607 S.E.2d 372, 378 (2004) (per curiam) ("Of course, [in abuse and neglect cases] the best interests of the child are paramount." (internal quotations and citation omitted)); Syl. pt. 3, in part, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996) ("[T]he primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children."); In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 32, 435 S.E.2d 162, 170 (same); Michael K.T. v. Tina L.T., 182 W. Va. 399, 405, 387 S.E.2d 866, 872 (1989) ("[T]he best interests of the child is the polar star by which decisions must be made which affect children."). Thus, guardians ad litem serve a dual role. In addition to serving as an advocate for the child[ren], they must also fulfil their duty to fully inform themselves of the child[ren]'s circumstances and determine and recommend the outcome that best satisfies the child[ren]'s best interests. This Court recently alluded to the dual capacity of a guardian ad litem in the case of In re Elizabeth A., 217 W. Va. 197, 204, 617 S.E.2d 547, 554 (2005) (per curiam), wherein we observed that "[d]uring the proceedings in an abuse and neglect case, a guardian ad litem is charged with the duty to faithfully represent the interests of the child and effectively advocate on the child's behalf." (Emphasis added). This dual role was likewise recognized in Syllabus point 5 of In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162:

> Each child in an abuse and neglect case is entitled to effective representation of counsel. To further that goal, W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(a) [1992] mandates that a child has a right to be represented by counsel in every stage of abuse and neglect proceedings. Furthermore, Rule XIII of the West Virginia Rules > for Trial Courts of Record[16] provides that a guardian ad litem shall make a full and independent investigation of the facts involved in the proceeding, and shall make his or her recommendations known to the court. Rules 1.1 and 1.3 of the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct, respectively, require an attorney to provide competent representation to a client, and to act with reasonable diligence and promptness in representing a client. The Guidelines for Guardians Ad Litem in Abuse and Neglect cases, which are adopted in this opinion and attached as Appendix A, are in harmony with the applicable provisions of the West Virginia Code, the West Virginia Rules for Trial Courts of Record, and the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct, and provide attorneys who serve as guardians ad litem with direction as to their duties in representing the best interests of the children for whom they are appointed.

(Footnote added).

Thus, the role of guardian ad litem extends beyond that of an advocate and encompasses also a duty to safeguard the best interests of the child[ren] with whose representation the guardian has been charged. Bearing this in mind, we now consider how

---

[16]We pause briefly to note that the Trial Court Rules for Trial Courts of Record have been replaced by the West Virginia Trial Court Rules. Rule 21 of the Trial Court Rules contains guidelines for Guardians Ad Litem; however, Rule 21.01 expressly states that it "does not apply to guardians ad litem appointed in abuse and neglect proceedings." Nevertheless, this Court has continued to follow the principles set out in Syllabus point 5 of In re Jeffrey R.L., including the mandate contained therein that "a guardian ad litem shall make a full and independent investigation of the facts involved in the proceeding, and shall make his or her recommendations known to the court." See, e.g., In re Elizabeth A., 217 W. Va. 197, 617 S.E.2d 547 (2005) (per curiam) (reiterating relevant portion of Syllabus point 5 of In re Jeffrey R.L. as a Syllabus point); In re Emily, 208 W. Va. 325, 339-40, 540 S.E.2d 542, 557 (referring to this Court's "clear and oft-repeated admonitions that . . . guardians are duty-bound to provide guidance to the tribunal charged with determining the subject child(ren)'s ultimate fate" (footnotes omitted)).

the confidentiality provision of Rule 1.6 of the Rules of Professional Conduct impacts upon this role.[17]

Ms. Griffith recognizes that children represented by guardians ad litem are under the disability of age. She contends, however, that the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct and existing case law recognize the ability of competent children to direct their legal representation, which includes, by implication, the competent child's assertion of confidentiality.

Rule 1.14 of the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct addresses a

[17]Rule 1.6 of the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct states:

> (a) A lawyer shall not reveal information relating to representation of a client unless the client consents after consultation, except for disclosures that are impliedly authorized in order to carry out the representation, and except as stated in paragraph (b).
>
> (b) A lawyer may reveal such information to the extent the lawyer reasonably believes necessary:
>
> (1) to prevent the client from committing a criminal act; or
> (2) to establish a claim or defense on behalf of the lawyer in a controversy between the lawyer and the client, to establish a defense to a criminal charge or civil claim against the lawyer based upon conduct in which the client was involved, or to respond to allegations in any proceeding concerning the lawyer's representation of a client.

lawyer's responsibility to a client who is under a disability, including an age disability, and states in relevant part:

> (a) When a client's ability to make adequately considered decisions in connection with the representation is impaired, whether because of minority, mental disability or for some other reason, the lawyer shall, as far as reasonably possible, maintain a normal client-lawyer relationship with the client.

(Emphasis added). The comment to Rule 1.14 elaborates, in part, that

> The normal client-lawyer relationship is based on the assumption that the client, when properly advised and assisted, is capable of making decisions about important matters. When the client is a minor or suffers from a mental disorder or disability, however, maintaining the ordinary client-lawyer relationship may not be possible in all respects. In particular, an incapacitated person may have no power to make legally binding decisions. Nevertheless, a client lacking legal competence often has the ability to understand, deliberate upon, and reach conclusions about matters affecting the client's own well being. Furthermore, to an increasing extent the law recognizes intermediate degrees of competence. For example, children as young as five or six years of age, and certainly those of ten or twelve, are regarded as having opinions that are entitled to weight in legal proceedings concerning their custody. . . .

(Emphasis added). Importantly, however, the lawyer's duty under Rule 1.14 to "maintain a normal client-lawyer relationship with the client" extends only "as far as reasonably possible." Furthermore, the recognition in the comment to that rule that "to an increasing extent the law recognizes intermediate degrees of competence" is tempered by the clarification that a child's opinion as to his or her custody is "entitled to weight in legal proceedings." (Emphasis added). Thus, while the child's opinions are to be given consideration where the child has demonstrated an adequate level of competency, there is no requirement that the child's wishes govern. As this Court explained in In re Lindsey C.,

> Obviously, those recommendations may or may not be identical to those the child would make to the court, left entirely to his or her own choices. However, in the case of a child, justice is clearly best served by requiring that counsel and the court exercise their respective best judgment in all aspects of the case, and that the court have the benefit of counsel's candid and independent assistance in ascertaining the best interests of that child.

196 W. Va. 395, 409, 473 S.E.2d 110, 124 (1995). Clearly, though, the recognition that a child's opinions are entitled to be weighed in the course of the guardian ad litem's representation in no way minimizes the guardian's ultimate duty to safeguard the child's best interests. See, e.g., In re Elizabeth A., 217 W. Va. 197, 205, 617 S.E.2d 547, 555 (2005) (finding that "[t]he guardian ad litem and DHHR were not given a meaningful opportunity to introduce substantive evidence or obtain additional testing necessary to determine the best interests of the two children whom the guardian ad litem was appointed to serve") (footnote omitted). Where a child's wishes are adverse to the course that serves the child's best interests, they simply cannot be followed. See In re Lindsey C., 196 W. Va. 395, 409, 473 S.E.2d 110, 124 ("As we indicated in Jeffrey R.L., counsel for the child is expected to pursue that central purpose [to ascertain and serve the best interests of the child] even when his or her client, the child, may have a different view of what is in the child's best interests."). Nowhere is this reasoning demonstrated more clearly than in a situation where the child's desired course would expose the child to a high risk of probable harm.

Furthermore, in addition to weighing a child's opinion (such as the desire for confidentiality as issue in this case) against the child's best interests, a guardian ad litem must also balance the child's desire for confidentiality with the guardian's duties to the court. As noted above, a guardian ad litem "shall make a full and independent investigation of the facts involved in the proceeding, and shall make his or her recommendations known to the court." Syl. pt. 5, in part, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162.[18] Accordingly, we now hold that while a guardian ad litem owes a duty of confidentiality to the child[ren] he or she represents in child abuse and neglect proceedings, this duty is not absolute. Where honoring the duty of confidentiality would result in the child[ren]'s exposure to a high risk of probable harm, the guardian ad litem must make a disclosure to the presiding court in order to safeguard the best interests of the child[ren].[19]

[18]"'It is well established that the word "shall," in the absence of language . . . showing a contrary intent . . ., should be afforded a mandatory connotation.'" Retail Designs, Inc. v. West Virginia Div. of Highways, 213 W. Va. 494, 500, 583 S.E.2d 449, 455 (2003) (quoting Syl. pt. 1, Nelson v. West Virginia Pub. Employees Ins. Bd., 171 W. Va. 445, 300 S.E.2d 86 (1982)).

[19]We note that a family court or circuit court has the inherent authority to appoint both a lawyer and a guardian ad litem where, in the court's discretion, such appointments are necessary. Additionally, Rule 52 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings provides for the appointment of a Court-Appointed Special Advocate Representative, where such a program is available, "to further the best interests of the child." R. Proc. for Child Abuse & Neglect Proceedings 52(a).

Christina W. revealed to Ms. Griffith that such touching had in fact occurred. Although Christina W. demanded that this information remain confidential, Ms. Griffith's failure to disclose this information to the presiding court resulted in Christina having unsupervised visitation with James B. Until such time as the allegations of sexual abuse could be properly investigated, unsupervised visitation between Christina W. and James B. was most certainly not in Christina's best interest.

In this appeal, DHHR sought to have Ms. Griffith removed as guardian ad litem in this matter. However, the circuit court found that there was no need to remove her because the confidential information, Christina W.'s allegations of sexual abuse, had been brought to the court's attention, and thus, the conflict had been removed. Prior to this opinion, the duties of a lawyer placed in the situation in which Ms. Griffith found herself were not clear. Insofar as this opinion makes clear a lawyer's duties with respect to disclosure of confidential information, and because the court was ultimately made aware of Christine W.'s allegations of abuse, we agree with the circuit court and see no need to remove Ms. Griffith.

IV.

CONCLUSION

While we disagree with the circuit court's conclusion that a guardian ad litem owes an absolute duty of confidentiality to the child[ren] he or she represents in an abuse and neglect proceeding, we find no error in the court's denial of DHHR's motion to remove Ms.

Griffith as guardian ad litem in this matter. Accordingly, the March 1, 2006, order of the Circuit Court of Mercer County is affirmed.

Affirmed.

CHIEF JUSTICE DAVIS delivered the Opinion of the Court.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "'"A circuit court, upon motion of a party, by its inherent power to do what is reasonably necessary for the administration of justice, may disqualify a lawyer from a case because the lawyer's representation in the case presents a conflict of interest where the conflict is such as clearly to call in question the fair or efficient administration of justice. Such motion should be viewed with extreme caution because of the interference with the lawyer-client relationship." Syl. Pt. 1, Garlow v. Zakaib, 186 W. Va. 457, 413 S.E.2d 112 (1991).' Syllabus point 2, Musick v. Musick, 192 W. Va. 527, 453 S.E.2d 361 (1994)." Syllabus point 3, State ex rel. Michael A.P. v. Miller, 207 W. Va. 114, 529 S.E.2d 354 (2000).

2. "In reviewing challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, we apply a two-prong deferential standard of review. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard. Questions of law are subject to a de novo review." Syllabus point 2, Walker v. West Virginia Ethics Commission, 201 W. Va. 108, 492 S.E.2d 167 (1997).

3. Because many aspects of a guardian ad litem's representation of a child in an abuse and neglect proceeding comprise duties that are performed by a lawyer on behalf of a client, the rules of professional conduct generally apply to that representation.

4. While a guardian ad litem owes a duty of confidentiality to the child[ren] he or she represents in child abuse and neglect proceedings, this duty is not absolute. Where honoring the duty of confidentiality would result in the child[ren]'s exposure to a high risk of probable harm, the guardian ad litem must make a disclosure to the presiding court in order to safeguard the best interests of the child[ren].

Davis, Chief Justice:

This abuse and neglect case raises the legal question of whether a guardian ad litem owes a duty of confidentiality to his or her infant charge such that, where the infant demands confidentiality with respect to information regarding abuse that the infant discloses to the guardian ad litem, the guardian may be justified in not informing a circuit or family court of the abuse alleged by the infant.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

Testimony presented in this case indicates that on September 17, 2005, a domestic dispute erupted between Linda H. and her boyfriend James B.[1] The dispute allegedly arose from Linda's anger that James had given attention and gifts to Linda's oldest daughter, Christina W., that Linda had desired for herself.[2] During the ensuing altercation, James began to choke Linda. According to Linda, Christina came to her mother's aid by hitting James with a broom while yelling, "let go of my mother or I will tell on you for touching me." Deputy E. P. Parks, of the Mercer County Sheriff's Department, child protective service workers, and Angela Robbins, an in-home service provider assigned to the family, all responded to this incident. Christina W. disclosed to Deputy Parks and Angela Robbins that James B. had been touching her inappropriately. However, Christina later recanted these statements.

Linda was given the option of leaving James in order to maintain custody of her children. Linda declined the offer and her three daughters, Christina W., Sissy W. and Lisa W. were removed from the home.[3] On September 21, 2005, a petition for abuse and neglect was filed based on domestic violence and sexual misconduct by James. A preliminary hearing was held on September 30, 2005, in the Circuit Court of Mercer County. At this hearing, the circuit court found that the children remained at risk due to domestic violence, and indicated that the sexual misconduct allegations required additional investigation.[4] At the time of the preliminary hearing, Christina continued to deny that inappropriate sexual conduct had occurred, and she expressed her desire to visit with her mother and James.[5]

[3]There are no issues involving Sissy W. and Lisa W. presently before this Court.

[4]According to the State, the parties to this case have indicated that the guardian ad litem appointed for the children, Mary Ellen Griffith, was ordered to investigate the allegations. The State acknowledges, however, that such a directive is not clearly expressed in the circuit court's order.

[5]An amended petition was also filed adding the girls' father, Larry W., and outlining the domestic violence in more detail. A motion to terminate the parental rights of Larry W., based upon his incarceration for sexually assaulting a child who is not a party to the instant action, has been taken under advisement by the circuit court. No issues involving

On October 25, 2005, a multi-disciplinary treatment team (hereinafter "MDT") meeting was held. Among those present at the meeting was Mary Ellen Griffith, who had been appointed guardian ad litem for the children. The MDT agreed to a non-custodial improvement period that would include various services for Linda and James,[6] and would also include weekly daytime unsupervised visits between the three girls and both Linda and James.

Later that same day, Ms. Griffith met with Christina and her sisters at the Paul Miller Shelter, which is where the girls had been placed. During the visit, Ms. Griffith spoke privately with Christina and questioned her about her prior allegations of sexual misconduct. Ms. Griffith states that Christina first questioned her regarding the attorney/client privilege and sought assurances that any information she revealed about sexual misconduct by James would not be shared. Christina then advised Ms. Griffith that James had in fact touched her inappropriately. However, Christina reported that she was "okay" and expressed her desire to go home to her mother. She further stated that she would not testify about James' abusive conduct.[7]

At an adjudicatory hearing on November 18, 2005, Linda and James stipulated to the allegations of domestic violence contained in the abuse and neglect petition. The children were adjudged neglected. A post-adjudicatory improvement period was granted to Linda and James. The improvement period was agreed to by all parties, including Ms. Griffith. The goal of the improvement period was reunification of all three girls with Linda and James, and it included unsupervised visits with both adults. The court set the matter for review on February 17, 2006.

In January 2006, prior to a scheduled MDT meeting, Ms. Griffith was advised by Stacy Cockerham, a case-worker, that Christina had disclosed to her James' sexual misconduct, and Christina had also revealed the abuse to Nancy Silvazi, a foster-care agency worker.[8] Christina also informed these two women of her prior disclosure of the abuse to her guardian ad litem, Ms. Griffith.[9] Thereafter, the Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR") petitioned the circuit court to remove Ms. Griffith as guardian ad litem psychological evaluation for Christina. Accordingly, when she later met with Christina, she encouraged Christina to discuss James' abuse with a counselor. According to Ms. Griffith, as of February 13, 2006, the psychological evaluation had not been completed.

[8]Upon learning of the renewed allegations of sexual misconduct, the Department of Health and Human Resources immediately stopped unsupervised visits with James.

[9]At a subsequent MDT meeting, Linda and James were confronted with Christina's renewed statements of sexual misconduct. Both of them denied the allegations, and Linda stated that she would relinquish her parental rights to all three girls.

due to conflict. Following a hearing on February 17, 2006, the circuit court denied the DHHR's motion to remove Ms. Griffith. The circuit court found that the lawyer/client privilege is applicable to the relationship between a child and his or her guardian ad litem, and denied the DHHR's motion to remove Ms. Griffith as guardian ad litem. The DHHR then filed this appeal seeking reversal of the circuit court's order.[10]

STANDARD OF REVIEW

In this case we are asked to review the circuit court's ruling on the DHHR's motion to remove Ms. Griffith. With respect to the disqualification of a lawyer, we have previously held that

[10]On August 21, 2006, Ms. Griffith was appointed Family Court Judge for McDowell and Mercer Counties. Obviously, as a result of this appointment, Ms. Griffith may no longer serve as guardian ad litem in this case. Nevertheless, because the legal issue herein raised is capable of repetition, we may address this technically moot issue. See Syl. pt. 1, Israel by Israel v. West Virginia Secondary Schs. Activities Comm'n, 182 W. Va. 454, 388 S.E.2d 480 (1989) ("Three factors to be considered in deciding whether to address technically moot issues are as follows: first, the court will determine whether sufficient collateral consequences will result from determination of the questions presented so as to justify relief; second, while technically moot in the immediate context, questions of great public interest may nevertheless be addressed for the future guidance of the bar and of the public; and third, issues which may be repeatedly presented to the trial court, yet escape review at the appellate level because of their fleeting and determinate nature, may appropriately be decided."); Syl. pt. 1, State ex rel. M.C.H. v. Kinder, 173 W. Va. 387, 317 S.E.2d 150 (1984) ("A case is not rendered moot even though a party to the litigation has had a change in status such that he no longer has a legally cognizable interest in the litigation or the issues have lost their adversarial vitality, if such issues are capable of repetition and yet will evade review.").

> "'[a] circuit court, upon motion of a party, by its inherent power to do what is reasonably necessary for the administration of justice, may disqualify a lawyer from a case because the lawyer's representation in the case presents a conflict of interest where the conflict is such as clearly to call in question the fair or efficient administration of justice. Such motion should be viewed with extreme caution because of the interference with the lawyer-client relationship.' Syl. Pt. 1, Garlow v. Zakaib, 186 W. Va. 457, 413 S.E.2d 112 (1991)." Syllabus point 2, Musick v. Musick, 192 W. Va. 527, 453 S.E.2d 361 (1994).

Syl. pt. 3, State ex rel. Michael A.P. v. Miller, 207 W. Va. 114, 529 S.E.2d 354 (2000). In reviewing the circuit court's ruling on this matter, we are mindful that > [i]n reviewing challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, we apply a two-prong deferential standard of review. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard. Questions of law are subject to a de novo review.

Syl. pt. 2, Walker v. West Virginia Ethics Comm'n, 201 W. Va. 108, 492 S.E.2d 167 (1997). In this case, the circuit court's decision was based upon a legal determination. Therefore, we apply a de novo standard. See Syl. pt. 1, Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., 194 W. Va. 138, 459 S.E.2d 415 (1995) ("Where the issue on an appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of law or involving the interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review.").

III.

DISCUSSION

The narrow legal question we are asked to resolve in this case is whether a lawyer appointed to serve as guardian ad litem to a child involved in abuse and neglect proceedings owes a duty of confidentiality to the child such that the guardian may not disclose to the presiding court, without the consent of his or her child client, revelations from the child disclosing abuse. To answer this question, we first examine the nature of a lawyer's role in serving as guardian ad litem.

Rule 3(i) of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings defines "[g]uardian ad litem" as "the attorney appointed to represent the child." (Emphasis added). This definition, stating that the guardian is an "attorney" who is to "represent the child," indicates that the role of guardian ad litem is much the same as that of a lawyer representing a client.[11] See, e.g., Black's Law Dictionary 1303-04 (7th ed. 1999) (defining "representation," in part, as "[t]he act or an instance of standing for or acting on

[11]Rule 52(g) of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings similarly refers to a guardian ad litem as the attorney for the child[ren]:

> Continued duties of the child's attorney. The appointment of a CASA representative shall not in any way abrogate the duties and responsibilities imposed by law on the attorney for the child[ren]. The duties and responsibilities of a child's guardian ad litem shall continue until such child has a permanent placement, and the guardian ad litem shall not be relieved of his responsibilities until such permanent placement has been achieved.

(second and third emphasis added).

behalf of another, esp. by a lawyer on behalf of a client").[12] The conclusion that a guardian ad litem serves in a capacity very similar to that of a lawyer representing a client is further supported by W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(a) (2006) (Supp. 2006), which provides in relevant part that "[i]n any proceeding under the provisions of this article, the child . . . shall have the right to be represented by counsel at every stage of the proceedings . . . . Counsel of the child shall be appointed in the initial order." (Emphasis added). See also In re Tyler D., 213 W. Va. 149, 160, 578 S.E.2d 343, 354 (2003) (commenting that "children [in abuse and neglect cases] are entitled to effective representation through a guardian ad litem"); In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 453, 460 S.E.2d 692, 699 (1995) ("[T]he circuit court may not impose unreasonable limitations upon the function of guardians ad litem in representing their clients in accord with the traditions of the adversarial fact-finding process."); In re Scottie D., 185 W. Va. 191, 198, 406 S.E.2d 214, 221 (1991) ("[A] guardian ad litem has a duty to represent the child(ren) to whom he or she has been appointed, as effectively as if the guardian ad litem were in a normal lawyer-client relationship.").[13]

[12]Cf. Syl. pt. 1, Miners in Gen. Group v. Hix, 123 W. Va. 637, 17 S.E.2d 810 (1941), overruled on other grounds by Lee-Norse Co. v. Rutledge, 170 W. Va. 162, 291 S.E.2d 477 (1982) ("In the absence of any definition of the intended meaning of words or terms used in a legislative enactment, they will, in the interpretation of the act, be given their common, ordinary and accepted meaning in the connection in which they are used.").

> There is a clear legislative directive that guardians ad litem . . . be given an opportunity to advocate for their clients in

Likewise, many of the duties required by the "GUIDELINES FOR GUARDIANS AD LITEM IN ABUSE AND NEGLECT CASES" established by this Court and set out in Appendix A of In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993), are those that would be performed by a lawyer representing a client. For example, Rules 8 through 22 appear under the heading "Preparation for and Representation at Adjudicatory and Dispositional Hearing" and require guardians ad litem to perform a wide variety of lawyerly duties. For example, several of the rules require a guardian ad litem to child abuse or neglect proceedings. West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a) (1995) states that the circuit court shall give both the petitioner and respondents an opportunity to be heard when proceeding to the disposition of the case. This right must be understood to mean that the circuit court may not impose unreasonable limitations upon the function of guardians ad litem in representing their clients in accord with the traditions of the adversarial fact-finding process.

> 16. Subpoena witnesses for hearings or otherwise prepare testimony or cross-examination of witnesses and ensure that relevant material is introduced.

190 W. Va. at 41, 435 S.E.2d at 179.

Due to the legal nature of a significant portion of the duties of a guardian ad litem, we believe that, as a general rule, the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct, which govern the conduct of lawyers practicing within the State of West Virginia, should apply to the conduct of guardians ad litem.[14] Accordingly, we now hold that, because many aspects of a guardian ad litem's representation of a child in an abuse and neglect proceeding comprise duties that are performed by a lawyer on behalf of a client, the rules of professional conduct generally apply to that representation.

We must emphasize, however, that this is merely a general rule. While it forms

[14]The In re Jeffrey R.L. Court commented that the guidelines for guardians ad litem adopted therein

> encompass some of the basic principles found under our Rules of Professional Conduct. Specifically, Rule 1.1 requires an attorney to "provide competent representation to a client" which "requires the legal knowledge, skill, thoroughness and preparation reasonably necessary for the representation." Furthermore, Rule 1.3 requires a lawyer to "act with reasonable diligence and promptness in representing a client." We believe the guidelines proposed for guardians ad litem essentially reflect these basic rules of practice by which each attorney is bound.

a necessary part of our analysis, it does not answer the specific question herein raised. The question we must resolve today is whether a guardian ad litem appointed in an abuse and neglect case owes a duty of confidentiality to the child he or she is representing such that the guardian ad litem is prohibited from disclosing to the presiding court information regarding abuse that the child wishes to remain confidential.

Ms. Griffith claims she was bound to keep her client's confidences by Rule 1.6(a) of the Rules of Professional Conduct,[15] which states in relevant part, that "[a] lawyer shall not reveal information relating to representation of a client unless the client consents after consultation . . . ." Ms. Griffith urges that this confidentiality in the relationship between a guardian ad litem and an infant furthers the compelling need of the child to have a guardian ad litem with whom he or she can freely communicate. However, we believe that the strict adherence to this rule advocated by Ms. Griffith fails to fully appreciate the complex nature of abuse and neglect proceedings, as well as the multi-faceted duties of guardians ad litem. Indeed, the obligations of a guardian ad litem extend much farther than those anticipated by the typical lawyer/client relationship.

[15]Because the parties have briefed this case in the context of the Rules of Professional Conduct, our analysis is based upon those rules. We note, however, that the exception to the confidentiality rule for child abuse and neglect cases established in this opinion applies equally to the attorney/client privilege.

neglect cases is that the best interests of the children is of paramount concern. In re Amber Leigh J., 216 W. Va. 266, 272, 607 S.E.2d 372, 378 (2004) (per curiam) ("Of course, [in abuse and neglect cases] the best interests of the child are paramount." (internal quotations and citation omitted)); Syl. pt. 3, in part, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996) ("[T]he primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children."); In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 32, 435 S.E.2d 162, 170 (same); Michael K.T. v. Tina L.T., 182 W. Va. 399, 405, 387 S.E.2d 866, 872 (1989) ("[T]he best interests of the child is the polar star by which decisions must be made which affect children."). Thus, guardians ad litem serve a dual role. In addition to serving as an advocate for the child[ren], they must also fulfil their duty to fully inform themselves of the child[ren]'s circumstances and determine and recommend the outcome that best satisfies the child[ren]'s best interests. This Court recently alluded to the dual capacity of a guardian ad litem in the case of In re Elizabeth A., 217 W. Va. 197, 204, 617 S.E.2d 547, 554 (2005) (per curiam), wherein we observed that "[d]uring the proceedings in an abuse and neglect case, a guardian ad litem is charged with the duty to faithfully represent the interests of the child and effectively advocate on the child's behalf." (Emphasis added). This dual role was likewise recognized in Syllabus point 5 of In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162:

> Each child in an abuse and neglect case is entitled to effective representation of counsel. To further that goal, W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(a) [1992] mandates that a child has a right to be represented by counsel in every stage of abuse and neglect proceedings. Furthermore, Rule XIII of the West Virginia Rules > for Trial Courts of Record[16] provides that a guardian ad litem shall make a full and independent investigation of the facts involved in the proceeding, and shall make his or her recommendations known to the court. Rules 1.1 and 1.3 of the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct, respectively, require an attorney to provide competent representation to a client, and to act with reasonable diligence and promptness in representing a client. The Guidelines for Guardians Ad Litem in Abuse and Neglect cases, which are adopted in this opinion and attached as Appendix A, are in harmony with the applicable provisions of the West Virginia Code, the West Virginia Rules for Trial Courts of Record, and the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct, and provide attorneys who serve as guardians ad litem with direction as to their duties in representing the best interests of the children for whom they are appointed.

(Footnote added).

Thus, the role of guardian ad litem extends beyond that of an advocate and encompasses also a duty to safeguard the best interests of the child[ren] with whose representation the guardian has been charged. Bearing this in mind, we now consider how

---

[16]We pause briefly to note that the Trial Court Rules for Trial Courts of Record have been replaced by the West Virginia Trial Court Rules. Rule 21 of the Trial Court Rules contains guidelines for Guardians Ad Litem; however, Rule 21.01 expressly states that it "does not apply to guardians ad litem appointed in abuse and neglect proceedings." Nevertheless, this Court has continued to follow the principles set out in Syllabus point 5 of In re Jeffrey R.L., including the mandate contained therein that "a guardian ad litem shall make a full and independent investigation of the facts involved in the proceeding, and shall make his or her recommendations known to the court." See, e.g., In re Elizabeth A., 217 W. Va. 197, 617 S.E.2d 547 (2005) (per curiam) (reiterating relevant portion of Syllabus point 5 of In re Jeffrey R.L. as a Syllabus point); In re Emily, 208 W. Va. 325, 339-40, 540 S.E.2d 542, 557 (referring to this Court's "clear and oft-repeated admonitions that . . . guardians are duty-bound to provide guidance to the tribunal charged with determining the subject child(ren)'s ultimate fate" (footnotes omitted)).

the confidentiality provision of Rule 1.6 of the Rules of Professional Conduct impacts upon this role.[17]

Ms. Griffith recognizes that children represented by guardians ad litem are under the disability of age. She contends, however, that the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct and existing case law recognize the ability of competent children to direct their legal representation, which includes, by implication, the competent child's assertion of confidentiality.

Rule 1.14 of the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct addresses a

lawyer's responsibility to a client who is under a disability, including an age disability, and states in relevant part:

> (a) When a client's ability to make adequately considered decisions in connection with the representation is impaired, whether because of minority, mental disability or for some other reason, the lawyer shall, as far as reasonably possible, maintain a normal client-lawyer relationship with the client.

(Emphasis added). The comment to Rule 1.14 elaborates, in part, that

> The normal client-lawyer relationship is based on the assumption that the client, when properly advised and assisted, is capable of making decisions about important matters. When the client is a minor or suffers from a mental disorder or disability, however, maintaining the ordinary client-lawyer relationship may not be possible in all respects. In particular, an incapacitated person may have no power to make legally binding decisions. Nevertheless, a client lacking legal competence often has the ability to understand, deliberate upon, and reach conclusions about matters affecting the client's own well being. Furthermore, to an increasing extent the law recognizes intermediate degrees of competence. For example, children as young as five or six years of age, and certainly those of ten or twelve, are regarded as having opinions that are entitled to weight in legal proceedings concerning their custody. . . .

(Emphasis added). Importantly, however, the lawyer's duty under Rule 1.14 to "maintain a normal client-lawyer relationship with the client" extends only "as far as reasonably possible." Furthermore, the recognition in the comment to that rule that "to an increasing extent the law recognizes intermediate degrees of competence" is tempered by the clarification that a child's opinion as to his or her custody is "entitled to weight in legal proceedings." (Emphasis added). Thus, while the child's opinions are to be given consideration where the child has demonstrated an adequate level of competency, there is no requirement that the child's wishes govern. As this Court explained in In re Lindsey C.,

> Obviously, those recommendations may or may not be identical to those the child would make to the court, left entirely to his or her own choices. However, in the case of a child, justice is clearly best served by requiring that counsel and the court exercise their respective best judgment in all aspects of the case, and that the court have the benefit of counsel's candid and independent assistance in ascertaining the best interests of that child.

196 W. Va. 395, 409, 473 S.E.2d 110, 124 (1995). Clearly, though, the recognition that a child's opinions are entitled to be weighed in the course of the guardian ad litem's representation in no way minimizes the guardian's ultimate duty to safeguard the child's best interests. See, e.g., In re Elizabeth A., 217 W. Va. 197, 205, 617 S.E.2d 547, 555 (2005) (finding that "[t]he guardian ad litem and DHHR were not given a meaningful opportunity to introduce substantive evidence or obtain additional testing necessary to determine the best interests of the two children whom the guardian ad litem was appointed to serve") (footnote omitted). Where a child's wishes are adverse to the course that serves the child's best interests, they simply cannot be followed. See In re Lindsey C., 196 W. Va. 395, 409, 473 S.E.2d 110, 124 ("As we indicated in Jeffrey R.L., counsel for the child is expected to pursue that central purpose [to ascertain and serve the best interests of the child] even when his or her client, the child, may have a different view of what is in the child's best interests."). Nowhere is this reasoning demonstrated more clearly than in a situation where the child's desired course would expose the child to a high risk of probable harm.

Furthermore, in addition to weighing a child's opinion (such as the desire for confidentiality as issue in this case) against the child's best interests, a guardian ad litem must also balance the child's desire for confidentiality with the guardian's duties to the court. As noted above, a guardian ad litem "shall make a full and independent investigation of the facts involved in the proceeding, and shall make his or her recommendations known to the court." Syl. pt. 5, in part, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162.[18] Accordingly, we now hold that while a guardian ad litem owes a duty of confidentiality to the child[ren] he or she represents in child abuse and neglect proceedings, this duty is not absolute. Where honoring the duty of confidentiality would result in the child[ren]'s exposure to a high risk of probable harm, the guardian ad litem must make a disclosure to the presiding court in order to safeguard the best interests of the child[ren].[19]

[18]"'It is well established that the word "shall," in the absence of language . . . showing a contrary intent . . ., should be afforded a mandatory connotation.'" Retail Designs, Inc. v. West Virginia Div. of Highways, 213 W. Va. 494, 500, 583 S.E.2d 449, 455 (2003) (quoting Syl. pt. 1, Nelson v. West Virginia Pub. Employees Ins. Bd., 171 W. Va. 445, 300 S.E.2d 86 (1982)).

[19]We note that a family court or circuit court has the inherent authority to appoint both a lawyer and a guardian ad litem where, in the court's discretion, such appointments are necessary. Additionally, Rule 52 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings provides for the appointment of a Court-Appointed Special Advocate Representative, where such a program is available, "to further the best interests of the child." R. Proc. for Child Abuse & Neglect Proceedings 52(a).

Christina W. revealed to Ms. Griffith that such touching had in fact occurred. Although Christina W. demanded that this information remain confidential, Ms. Griffith's failure to disclose this information to the presiding court resulted in Christina having unsupervised visitation with James B. Until such time as the allegations of sexual abuse could be properly investigated, unsupervised visitation between Christina W. and James B. was most certainly not in Christina's best interest.

In this appeal, DHHR sought to have Ms. Griffith removed as guardian ad litem in this matter. However, the circuit court found that there was no need to remove her because the confidential information, Christina W.'s allegations of sexual abuse, had been brought to the court's attention, and thus, the conflict had been removed. Prior to this opinion, the duties of a lawyer placed in the situation in which Ms. Griffith found herself were not clear. Insofar as this opinion makes clear a lawyer's duties with respect to disclosure of confidential information, and because the court was ultimately made aware of Christine W.'s allegations of abuse, we agree with the circuit court and see no need to remove Ms. Griffith.

IV.

CONCLUSION

While we disagree with the circuit court's conclusion that a guardian ad litem owes an absolute duty of confidentiality to the child[ren] he or she represents in an abuse and neglect proceeding, we find no error in the court's denial of DHHR's motion to remove Ms.

Griffith as guardian ad litem in this matter. Accordingly, the March 1, 2006, order of the Circuit Court of Mercer County is affirmed.

Affirmed.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. Where the issue on an appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of law or involving an interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review.

2. "Statutes relating to different subjects are not in pari materia. Syllabus point 5, Commercial Credit Corp. v. Citizens National Bank, 148 W. Va. 198, 133 S.E.2d 720 (1963)." Syllabus point 1, Atchinson v. Erwin, 172 W. Va. 8, 302 S.E.2d 78 (1983).

3. Statements by the natural mother in an adoption agreement that the adoptive father acknowledges paternity, when the adoption agreement is subsequently not consummated, does not constitute an acknowledgement of paternity under W. JUDGE FOX sitting by temporary assignment.

Miller, Justice:

In this appeal, we are asked to determine whether language by the mother in a written prenatal adoption agreement stating, that the adoptive father is the natural father, should prevail over blood tests that prove a third person, the appellee, Charlie A.L. is the biological father. See footnote 1 By agreement dated January 8, 1990, the appellant, Chrystal R.M., consented to allow Mr. and Mrs. Ruble to adopt her child. In the agreement, the appellant stated that she "hereby acknowledges that Gregory Emmitt Ruble, . . . is the natural father of said child and agrees to place his name on the initial birth certificate and necessary hospital records at the time of her admission for the birth of the child." See footnote 2 The adoption was never consummated.

In June of 1991, the appellant filed suit against the appellee asserting that he was the biological father, and seeking child support, reimbursement of birth expenses, and attorney fees. See footnote 3 The family law master eventually ordered blood tests to determine the paternity issue. They revealed that Mr. Ruble was not the biological father and that there was a 99.94% probability that the appellee, Charles A.L., was the biological father.

The appellee defended against the paternity action by asserting that the signed and notarized adoption agreement between Mr. and Mrs. Ruble and Chrystal R.M., stating that Mr. Ruble was the father, met the requirements of W. Va. Code, 48A-6-6(b) (1990) which states:

A written acknowledgment by both the man and woman that the man is the father of the named child legally establishes the man as the father of the child for all purposes and child support can be established under the provisions of this chapter.

The family law master concluded that this section was designed to establish paternity where the mother and the putative father acknowledged his paternity, but was not meant to cover adoption agreements. On appeal the circuit court reversed because it determined that the language in the adoption agreement met the requirements of W. Va. Code, 48A-6-6(b) (1990). This appeal clearly presents a question of law involving an interpretation of a statute. Accordingly, we apply the de novo standard of review as set out in syllabus point 1, in part, of Burnside v. Burnside, ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (No. 22399, March 24, 1995) which states that "questions of law and statutory interpretations are subject to a de novo review." See footnote 4

Initially, the appellant argues that the applicable language in the adoption agreement is void and unenforceable citing Wyatt v. Wyatt, 185 W. Va. 472, 475, 408 S.E.2d 51, 54 (1991). There we said that "[t]he duty of a parent to support a child is a basic duty owed by the parent to the child, and a parent cannot waive or contract away the child's right to support." We do not find Wyatt to be applicable simply because the contract for adoption was not consummated. Consequently, the mother neither waived nor contracted away the child's right to support.

We disagree with the legal basis of the circuit court's opinion that under W. Va. Code, 48A-6-6(b) (1990), there had been a formal acknowledgment of paternity. We do not believe that this subsection has some talismanic meaning that requires us to abandon both our logic and common sense. From a purely technical viewpoint, it can be said that the adoption agreement did not carry the "written acknowledgment by both the man and woman" as required by this subsection. Certainly, Mr. Ruble did not admit that he was the natural father because as earlier noted, this statement was made only by the natural mother. See footnote 5

Of more importance, it must be remembered that this was an adoption agreement and it is within this context that we judge its purpose. The purpose of W. Va. Code, 48A-6-6(b) (1990), allowing for acknowledgment of paternity by written agreement, is to enable the biological father to acknowledge this fact without the necessity of going through an expensive and often protracted hearing to establish paternity. This can be seen by reading W. Va. Code, 48A-6-6(a) (1990), which outlines the more cumbersome procedures that must be followed by a putative father seeking to establish paternity. See footnote 6

Moreover, the paternity section, W. Va. Code, 48A-6-1 et seq. (1993) is separate and distinct from the adoption section, W. Va. Code, 48-4-1 et seq. (1985). They serve two entirely different interests, and because of this they are not considered to be in pari materia. We discussed the concept of in pari materia at some length in Manchin v. Dunfree, 174 W. Va. 532, 535-36, 327 S.E.2d 710, 713-14 (1984) and observed that it was a rule of statutory construction. We acknowledged the rule meant that "[s]tatutes which relate to the same subject should be read and applied together. . . ." 174 W. Va. at 535, 327 S.E.2d at 713. We went on in Manchin, to recognize the corollary to the rule as set out in syllabus point 1 of Atchinson v. Erwin, 172 W. Va. 8, 302 S.E.2d 78 (1983) stating that "[s]tatutes relating to different subjects are not in pari materia. [Citations omitted.]" Consequently, we customarily do not consider language in paternity statutes to be applicable to adoption agreements.

Finally, from a public policy standpoint, we do not believe that W. Va. Code, 48A-6-6(b) (1990) can be used to thwart the rights of a natural father. It would be unjust to allow the biological mother to join with another man who is not the biological father and file an acknowledgment under this section which would bar the rights of the biological father. As evidenced by Simmons v. Comer, 190 W. Va. 350, 438 S.E.2d 530 (1993), we have been reluctant to accord a nonbiological father any preferential standing. Simmons dealt with the right of a putative father to claim a parental relationship with a child whose natural mother had represented to him that he was the biological father; she then rejected his attempt to sustain a continuing relationship with the child.

Of more direct importance, however, is the constitutional right accorded to the biological parent not to be deprived of his paternal right without notice and some appropriate due process hearing, as we explained in In re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973), relying on, Stanley v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 645, 92 S.Ct. 1208, 31 L.Ed.2d 551 (1972); see also In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993); Quilloin v. Walcott, 434 U.S. 246, 98 S.Ct. 549, 54 L.Ed.2d 511 (1978); Caban v. Mohammed, 441 U.S. 380, 99 S.Ct. 1760, 60 L.Ed.2d 297 (1979); Lehr v. Robertson, 463 U.S. 248, 103 S.Ct. 2985, 77 L.Ed.2d 614 (1983). But see Michael H. v. Gerald D., 491 U.S. 110, 109 S.Ct. 2333, 105 L.Ed 91 (1989). Thus, we conclude that statements by the natural mother in an adoption agreement that the adoptive father acknowledges paternity, when the adoption agreement is subsequently not consummated, does not constitute an acknowledgement of paternity under W. Va. Code, 48A-6-6(b). Therefore, such statements do not bar a proceeding on her part against the actual biological father to establish paternity.

In the final analysis, this case was a paternity issue. Blood tests were ordered under W. Va. Code, 48A-6-3 (1992) and, as earlier noted, the appellee was found by a 99.94% probability to be the father and the tests excluded Mr. Ruble. Under W. Va. Code, 48A-6-3(a)(3)(1992), such an undisputed finding, when filed, "legally establish(es) the man as the father of the child for all purposes. . . ." See footnote 7 Recently, in acknowledgement of this section, we stated in syllabus point 5 of Mildred L.M. v. John O.F., supra, note 1:

> Under W. Va. Code, 48A-6-3 (1992), undisputed blood or tissue test results indicating a statistical probability of paternity of more than ninety-eight percent are conclusive on the issue of paternity, and the circuit court should enter judgment accordingly.

For the foregoing reasons, we reverse the judgment of the Circuit Court of Wood County and remand this case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

Footnote: 4 The entire text of syllabus point 1 of Burnside v. Burnside, supra, is:

In reviewing challenges to findings made by a family law master that also were adopted by a circuit court, a three-pronged standard of review is applied. Under these circumstances, a final equitable distribution order is reviewed under an abuse of discretion standard; the underlying factual findings are reviewed under a clearly erroneous standard; and questions of law and statutory interpretations are subject to a de novo review.

As the syllabus in Burnside indicates, the circuit court had concurred with the family law master's findings. However, where a disagreement exists as in this case and the issue is one of law a de novo review is still the correct standard.

Footnote: 5 For the text, see supra, note 2. The appellant, Chrystal R.M., stated in the adoption agreement that Mr. Ruble was the natural father. However, Mr. Ruble never explicitly claimed he was the father of Chrystal R.M.'s child.

Footnote: 6 W. Va. Code, 48A-6-6(a) (1990) states:

The natural father of a child may file an application to establish paternity in circuit court when he acknowledges that the child is his or when he has married the mother of the child after the child's birth and upon consent of the mother, or if she is deceased or incompetent, or has surrendered custody, upon the consent of the person or agency having custody of the child or of a court having jurisdiction over the child's custody. The application may be filed in the county where the natural father resides, the child resides, or the child was born. The circuit court, if satisfied that the applicant is the natural father and that establishment of the relationship is for the best interest of the child, shall enter the finding of fact and an order upon its docket, and thereafter the child is the child of the applicant, as though born to him in lawful wedlock.

Footnote: 7 W. Va. Code, 48A-6-3(a)(3) (1992) states:

Undisputed blood or tissue test results which show a statistical probability of paternity of more than ninety-eight percent shall, when filed with the court, legally establish the man as the father of the child for all purposes and child support may be established pursuant to the provisions of this chapter.

Per Curiam:

This case is before this Court upon appeal of a final order of the Circuit Court of Ritchie County entered on January 7, 2000. In that order, the circuit court denied a petition filed by the appellant and petitioner below, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR"), to compel the appellees and respondents below, William and Gayle Clark, individually, and d/b/a Miracle Meadows School, to produce medical and school records of the students enrolled at Miracle Meadows School in connection with an ongoing investigation concerning allegations of abuse and neglect. The DHHR also requested that the appellees be required to produce the students and staff of Miracle Meadows School for interviews with its investigators. In this appeal, the DHHR contends that pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6A-1 to 10 (1977), the circuit court should have ordered the appellees to cooperate with its investigation.

This Court has before it, the petition for appeal, the entire record, and the briefs and argument of counsel. For the reasons set forth below, the final order of the circuit court is affirmed.

I.

On April 16, 1999, the DHHR sought ratification, removal, and temporary custody of four students that were in the care and custody of the Miracle Meadows School. The school is a private facility located in Harrison County, West Virginia,[1] and is operated by a private, not-for-profit corporation.[2] Gayle and William Clark are employed by the corporation as director and pastor of the school. Most of the children that attend the school have behavioral problems and are from out of state. Their parents sign temporary custody agreements providing that Miracle Meadows has temporary custody of their children and the right to seek medical attention for them. The agreement further provides that the children will remain at Miracle Meadows for a minimum of one year and that the school will regulate all contact between the students and their parents. Given these circumstances, the DHHR considers the Clarks along with the staff of Miracle Meadows to be the legal custodians of all students enrolled in the school.

The DHHR's petition for custody was filed after two female students of Miracle Meadows, Shannon M.[3] and Sheayan M., reported that they had been sexually abused by a staff member. The girls disclosed the abuse when they were picked up by the state police after running away from the school on April 13, 1999. The girls were returned to the school after it was agreed that the staff member who

[1]The school has a second location in Ritchie County, West Virginia, where the school's director and pastor reside.

[2]Miracle Meadows School is closely associated with the Seventh Day Adventist Church and is operated under Exemption K of W. Va. Code § 18-8-1 (1995).

[3]We follow our past practice in juvenile and domestic relations cases involving sensitive matters and use initials to identify the children's last names. In the matter of Jonathan P., 182 W.Va. 302, 303 n.1, 387 S.E.2d 537, 538 n.1 (1989).

allegedly abused them would not be permitted back onto the school campus until the DHHR had completed an investigation.

Shortly thereafter, the school contacted the DHHR and reported that the girls had recanted their allegations concerning the sexual abuse. Upon receiving this information, an investigator for the DHHR and a member of the state police returned to the school to question the girls again. At that time, the girls reported that they had been pressured by the school's staff and forced to recant their stories. Both girls indicated that they were afraid to remain at the school. Thus, the DHHR took temporary custody of Shannon M. and Sheayan M.

Upon further investigation, the DHHR determined that two other children at the school had been placed in imminent danger. In particular, the DHHR alleged that Christopher B. had been placed in a five-foot by five-foot secured room and forced to sleep on the floor for a night with a space heater. It was also alleged that Aaron E. had been beaten with a board by the same staff member who allegedly sexually abused Shannon M. and Sheayan M. Both of the boys were removed from the school.

Subsequently, the DHHR filed a petition with the Circuit Court of Ritchie County to compel the appellees to provide the school and medical records of all students enrolled at Miracle Meadows School, and to further produce the students and staff for interviews with the DHHR in connection with its investigation of the allegations of abuse and neglect. An evidentiary hearing on the petition was held on July 29, 1999. After hearing the evidence and considering the memoranda, the circuit court ordered the appellees to produce the requested records for an in camera inspection by the court. The hearing was then recessed until August 3, 1999, when the parties presented their arguments to the circuit court. At that time, the DHHR also informed the court of new allegations concerning another student, Renee S. After considering the arguments, the court directed the DHHR to pursue the allegations concerning Renee S. in Harrison County. The court further ruled that there was no provision in W.Va. Code § 49-1-1, et seq., authorizing the relief sought by the DHHR. The court stated that to require the appellees to provide the requested information would result in a violation of their constitutional rights against self-incrimination, as the information revealed by the records and interviews could result in criminal prosecution.[4]

II.

We begin our analysis of this case by noting that "[w]here the issue on an appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of law or involving an interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review." Syllabus Point 1, Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., 194 W.Va. 138, 459 S.E.2d 415 (1995). As this Court further explained in Syllabus Point 4 of Burgess v. Porterfield, 196 W.Va. 178, 469 S.E.2d 114 (1996): "This Court reviews the circuit court's final order and ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard. We review challenges to findings of fact under a clearly erroneous standard; conclusions of law are reviewed de novo."

[4]It is noted that the circuit court did order the appellees to produce all medical records in their possession relating to Shannon M., Sheayan M., Christopher B., and Aaron E. and to provide a list of the health care providers who may have rendered medical services to these children.

The issue in this case is whether the circuit court erred by refusing to order the appellees to submit the school and medical records of all students attending Miracle Meadows to the DHHR and to further order the appellees to make their students and staff available for interviews. The DHHR contends that it is entitled to this information pursuant to W.Va. Code § 49-6A-9 because it is investigating allegations of abuse and neglect. In response, the appellees argue that the circuit court's order was proper especially in light of the numerous letters written by the parents of the students stating that they did not want their children's records released to the DHHR.

After reviewing the record, we conclude that the DHHR certainly had a duty to investigate the abuse and neglect allegations in this case. However, we do not find that the DHHR was entitled to review the school and medical records of the students who were not the subject of the abuse and neglect petition. Thus, we affirm the decision of the circuit court, but for different reasons.[5]

This Court has previously stated that "[a]s a matter of public policy, the mental health records of children should be treated with particular care to protect the child." Nelson v. Ferguson, 184 W.Va. 198, 202, 399 S.E.2d 909, 913 (1990). In Nelson, this Court recognized that although medical records do not belong in the same class as highly confidential juvenile records, the same policy concerns that keep juvenile records confidential[6] are applicable. Id. "Unfortunately, mental disease often carries with it a stigma similar to that associated with a criminal record" and to protect children from this stigma, their records should remain confidential Id.

[5]The circuit court concluded that the appellees did not have to produce the records because it would violate their right against self-incrimination as the information revealed might lead to criminal prosecution. However, we believe that the appellees' constitutional rights were sufficiently protected by W.Va. Code § 49-6-4 (1984), and therefore, decline to uphold the circuit court's ruling on that basis. See State v. James R. II, 188 W.Va. 44, 422 S.E.2d 521 (1992).

In Syllabus Point 7 of State ex rel. Garden State Newspapers, Inc. v. Hoke, 205 W.Va. 611, 520 S.E.2d 186 (1999), this Court declared that: "This state recognizes a compelling public policy of protecting the confidentiality of juvenile information in all court proceedings." In that case, this Court discussed the need to keep a student's educational records confidential when they are introduced as evidence in court proceedings which are presumptively open to the public. This Court explained that "federal statute and state education regulations and policy generally provide, with limited exceptions, for the confidentiality of students' education records." 205 W.Va. at 620, 520 S.E.2d at 195.

As noted above, the students enrolled at Miracle Meadows are troubled children who apparently have been unable to successfully attend school elsewhere. Miracle Meadows is, in effect, a parochial alternative school. The record in this case contains numerous letters from the parents of these students praising the school and staff for helping their children and expressing disapproval of the DHHR's investigation. For instance, one letter reads:

> We have a concern regarding a hearing called by DHHR to have interviews of staff and students and access to school records. . . . If we felt that [our] daughter was not in a safe environment we would have pulled her out long ago or she would have urged us to take her out. . . . Our desire for you is to . . . deny DHHR access to school records and interviews of the staff and students.

[6]See W.Va. Code § 49-7-1(1999).

Another parent wrote:

> This fine institution accomplishes exactly what its Name implies. It is a miracle that so many lives of these defiant children, most of who have little respect for any authority, can be turned around, so that they may lead meaningful lives and be contributing, caring citizens of our country. . . . I do not want the State involved, nor having access to my daughter's medical, dental, school transcripts, as they have become the property of Miracle Meadows School.

Yet another parent states:

> We sent our son . . . to Miracle Meadows School to teach him self-management. We are satisfied with the results. . . . We will not grant permission to have his records or any other records in possession by the school be made public.

As these letters illustrate, the parents of these students chose to send their children to Miracle Meadows and it is quite evident that they want their children's right of privacy protected. As we noted in Garden State Newspapers, "[t]he right of privacy is a precious right which all Americans fiercely and jealously guard." 205 W.Va. at 619, 520 S.E.2d 194.

Our decisions in Nelson and Garden State Newspapers indicate that these children's records should in fact be kept confidential in accordance with their parents' wishes. However, we cannot ignore the DHHR's duty to investigate allegations of abuse and neglect. W.Va. Code § 49-6A-1 (1977) provides that: "It is the purpose of this article, through the complete reporting of child abuse and neglect, to protect the best interests of the child, to offer protective services in order to prevent any further harm to the child or any other children living in the home[.]" Given these circumstances, we find that absent probable cause to believe that these children were also abused and neglected, the DHHR does not have a right to review the children's medical and school records. Nonetheless, we believe that the DHHR does have the right to interview the children.

W.Va. Code § 49-6A-9 sets forth the general duties and powers of the DHHR and specifically directs that an investigation commence upon notification of suspected child abuse and neglect. As part of the investigation, the DHHR is instructed to interview the child or children within fourteen days of the commencement of the investigation. W.Va. Code § 49-6A-9(b)(3) (1994). In this case, the DHHR commenced an investigation after Shannon M. and Sheayan M. reported that they had been sexually abused at the school. As part of that investigation, the DHHR interviewed other children at the school and some members of the school's staff. Through these interviews, the DHHR determined that Christopher B. and Aaron E. had also been placed in imminent danger. Thus, the DHHR filed a petition to remove these two students from school.

The DHHR maintains that after these children were removed from the school, the appellees became less cooperative and as a result some the staff and children were not interviewed. Thus, they requested that the circuit court order the appellees to make the remaining children and staff available for interviews. After reviewing the record, we believe that the DHHR had ample opportunity to investigate the abuse and neglect allegations. The DHHR's investigators were at the school interviewing the students and staff from April 16, 1999 through April 20, 1999. The DHHR conducted further interviews on May 24 and 26, 1999 and on June 1, 2, and 10, 1999. There is every indication that the DHHR conducted a zealous and thorough investigation. Consequently, we see no basis for allowing the DHHR to conduct further interviews of the students and staff of Miracle Meadows.

Accordingly, for the reasons set forth above, the final order of the Circuit Court of Ritchie County entered on January 7, 2000, is affirmed.

Affirmed.

Supreme Court of the United States
Michael D. CRAWFORD, Petitioner,
v.
WASHINGTON.
No. 02-9410
Argued Nov. 10, 2003.
Decided March 8, 2004.

Chief Judge Rehnquist filed opinion concurring in judgment, in which Justice O'Connor joined.

Petitioner was tried for assault and attempted murder. The State sought to introduce a recorded statement that petitioner's wife Sylvia had made during police interrogation, as evidence that the stabbing was not in self-defense. Sylvia did not testify at trial because of Washington's marital privilege. Petitioner argued that admitting the evidence would violate his Sixth Amendment right to be "confronted with the witnesses against him." Under Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56, 100 S.Ct. 2531, 65 L.Ed.2d 597, that right does not bar admission of an unavailable witness's statement against a criminal defendant if the statement bears "adequate 'indicia of reliability,' " a test met when the evidence either falls within a "firmly rooted hearsay exception" or bears "particularized guarantees of trustworthiness." Id., at 66, 100 S.Ct. 2531. The trial court admitted the statement on the latter ground. The State Supreme Court upheld the conviction, deeming the statement reliable because it was nearly identical to, i.e., interlocked with, petitioner's own statement to the police, in that both were ambiguous as to whether the victim had drawn a weapon before petitioner assaulted him.

Held: The State's use of Sylvia's statement violated the Confrontation Clause because, where testimonial statements are at issue, the only indicium of reliability sufficient to satisfy constitutional demands is confrontation. Pp. 1359-1374.

(a) The Confrontation Clause's text does not alone resolve this case, so this Court turns to the Clause's historical background. That history supports two principles. First, the principal evil at which the Clause was directed was the civil-law mode of criminal procedure, particularly the use of ex parte examinations as evidence against the accused. The Clause's primary object is testimonial hearsay, and interrogations by law enforcement officers fall squarely within that class. Second, the Framers would not have allowed admission of testimonial statements of a witness who did not appear at trial unless he was unavailable to testify and the defendant had had a prior opportunity for cross-examination. English authorities and early state cases indicate that this was the common law at the time of the founding. And the "right ... to be confronted with the witnesses against him," Amdt. 6, is most naturally read as a reference to the common-law right of confrontation, admitting only those exceptions established at the time of the founding. See Mattox v. United States, 156 U.S. 237, 243, 15 S.Ct. 337, 39 L.Ed. 409. Pp. 1359-1367.

(b) This Court's decisions have generally remained faithful to the Confrontation Clause's original meaning.

See, e.g., Mattox, supra. Pp. 1367-1369.

(c) However, the same cannot be said of the rationales of this Court's more recent decisions. See Roberts, supra, at 66, 100 S.Ct. 2531. The Roberts test departs from historical principles because it admits statements consisting of ex parte testimony upon a mere reliability finding. Pp. 1369-1370.

(d) The Confrontation Clause commands that reliability be assessed in a particular manner: by testing in the crucible of cross-examination. Roberts allows a jury to hear evidence, untested by the adversary process, based on a mere judicial determination of reliability, thus replacing the constitutionally prescribed method of assessing reliability with a wholly foreign one. Pp. 1370-1371.

(e) Roberts' framework is unpredictable. Whether a statement is deemed reliable depends on which factors a judge considers and how much weight he accords each of them. However, the unpardonable vice of the Roberts test is its demonstrated capacity to admit core testimonial statements that the Confrontation Clause plainly meant to exclude. Pp. 1371-1372.

(f) The instant case is a self-contained demonstration of Roberts' unpredictable and inconsistent application. It also reveals Roberts' failure to interpret the Constitution in a way that secures its intended constraint on judicial discretion. The Constitution prescribes the procedure for determining the reliability of testimony in criminal trials, and this Court, no less than the state courts, lacks authority to replace it with one of its own devising. Pp. 1372-1374.

Justice SCALIA delivered the opinion of the Court.
Petitioner Michael Crawford stabbed a man who allegedly tried to rape his wife, Sylvia. At his trial, the State played for the jury Sylvia's tape-recorded statement to the police describing the stabbing, even though he had no opportunity for cross-examination. The Washington Supreme Court upheld petitioner's conviction after determining that Sylvia's statement was reliable. The question presented is whether this procedure complied with the Sixth Amendment's guarantee that, "[i]n all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right ... to be confronted with the witnesses against him."

I

On August 5, 1999, Kenneth Lee was stabbed at his apartment. Police arrested petitioner later that night. After giving petitioner and his wife Miranda warnings, detectives interrogated each of them twice. Petitioner eventually confessed that he and Sylvia had gone in search of Lee because he was upset over an earlier incident in which Lee had tried to rape her. The two had found Lee at his apartment, and a fight ensued in which Lee was stabbed in the torso and petitioner's hand was cut.

Petitioner gave the following account of the fight:
"Q. Okay. Did you ever see anything in [Lee's] hands?
"A. I think so, but I'm not positive.
"Q. Okay, when you think so, what do you mean by that?
"A. I could a swore I seen him goin' for somethin' before, right before everything happened. He was like reachin', fiddlin' around down here and stuff ... and I just ... I don't know, I think, this is just a possibility, but I think, I think that he pulled somethin' out and I grabbed for it and that's how I got cut ... but I'm not positive. I, I, my mind goes blank when things like this happen. I mean, I just, I remember things wrong, I remember things that just doesn't, don't make sense to me later." App. 155 (punctuation added).

Sylvia generally corroborated petitioner's story about the events leading up to the fight, but her account of the fight itself was arguably different-particularly with respect to whether Lee had drawn a weapon before petitioner assaulted him:"Q. Did Kenny do anything to fight back from this assault?
"A. (pausing) I know he reached into his pocket ... or somethin' ... I don't know what.
"Q. After he was stabbed?
"A. He saw Michael coming up. He lifted his hand ... his chest open, he might [have] went to go strike his hand out or something and then (inaudible).
"Q. Okay, you, you gotta speak up.
"A. Okay, he lifted his hand over his head maybe to strike Michael's hand down or something and then he put his hands in his ... put his right hand in his right pocket ... took a step back ... Michael proceeded to stab him ... then his hands were like ... how do you explain this ... open arms ... with his hands open and he fell down ... and we ran (describing subject holding hands open, palms toward assailant).
"Q. Okay, when he's standing there with his open hands, you're talking about Kenny, correct?
"A. Yeah, after, after the fact, yes.
"Q. Did you see anything in his hands at that point?
"A. (pausing) um um (no)." Id., at 137 (punctuation added).

The State charged petitioner with assault and attempted murder. At trial, he claimed self-defense. Sylvia did not testify because of the state marital privilege, which generally bars a spouse from testifying without the other spouse's consent. See Wash. Rev.Code § 5.60.060(1) (1994). In Washington, this privilege does not extend to a spouse's out-of-court statements admissible under a hearsay exception, see State v. Burden, 120 Wash.2d 371, 377, 841 P.2d 758, 761 (1992), so the State sought to introduce Sylvia's tape-recorded statements to the police as evidence that the stabbing was not in self-defense. Noting that Sylvia had admitted she led petitioner to Lee's apartment and thus had facilitated the assault, the State invoked the hearsay exception for statements against penal interest, Wash. Rule Evid. 804(b)(3) (2003).

Petitioner countered that, state law notwithstanding, admitting the evidence would violate his federal constitutional right to be "confronted with the witnesses against him." Amdt. 6. According to our description of that right in Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56, 100 S.Ct. 2531, 65 L.Ed.2d 597 (1980), it does not bar admission of an unavailable witness's statement against a criminal defendant if the statement bears "adequate 'indicia of reliability.' " Id., at 66, 100 S.Ct. 2531. To meet that test, evidence must either fall within a "firmly rooted hearsay exception" or bear "particularized guarantees of trustworthiness." Ibid. The trial court here admitted the statement on the latter ground, offering several reasons why it was trustworthy: Sylvia was not shifting blame but rather corroborating her husband's story that he acted in self-defense or "justified reprisal"; she had direct knowledge as an eyewitness; she was describing recent events; and she was being questioned by a "neutral" law enforcement officer. App. 76-77. The prosecution played the tape for the jury and relied on it in closing, arguing that it was "damning evidence" that "completely refutes [petitioner's] claim of self-defense." Tr. 468 (Oct. 21, 1999). The jury convicted petitioner of assault.

The Washington Court of Appeals reversed. It applied a nine-factor test to determine whether Sylvia's statement bore particularized guarantees of trustworthiness, and noted several reasons why it did not: The statement contradicted one she had previously given; it was made in response to specific questions; and at one point she admitted she had shut her eyes during the stabbing. The court considered and rejected the State's argument that Sylvia's statement was reliable because it coincided with petitioner's to such a degree that the two "interlocked." The court determined that, although the two statements agreed about the events leading up to the stabbing, they differed on the issue crucial to petitioner's self-defense claim: "[Petitioner's] version asserts that Lee may have had something in his hand when he stabbed him; but Sylvia's version has Lee grabbing for something only after he has been stabbed." App. 32.

The Washington Supreme Court reinstated the conviction, unanimously concluding that, although Sylvia's statement did not fall under a firmly rooted hearsay exception, it bore guarantees of trustworthiness: " '[W]hen a codefendant's confession is virtually identical [to, i.e., interlocks with,] that of a defendant, it may be deemed reliable.'

" 147 Wash.2d 424, 437, 54 P.3d 656, 663 (2002) (quoting State v. Rice, 120 Wash.2d 549, 570, 844 P.2d 416, 427 (1993)). The court explained:

"Although the Court of Appeals concluded that the statements were contradictory, upon closer inspection they appear to overlap ....

"[B]oth of the Crawfords' statements indicate that Lee was possibly grabbing for a weapon, but they are equally unsure when this event may have taken place. They are also equally unsure how Michael received the cut on his hand, leading the court to question when, if ever, Lee possessed a weapon. In this respect they overlap....

"[N]either Michael nor Sylvia clearly stated that Lee had a weapon in hand from which Michael was simply defending himself. And it is this omission by both that interlocks the statements and makes Sylvia's statement reliable." 147 Wash.2d, at 438-439, 54 P.3d, at 664 (internal quotation marks omitted). FN1

We granted certiorari to determine whether the State's use of Sylvia's statement violated the Confrontation Clause. 539 U.S. 914, 123 S.Ct. 2275, 156 L.Ed.2d 129 (2003).

II

The Sixth Amendment's Confrontation Clause provides that, "[i]n all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right ... to be confronted with the witnesses against him." We have held that this bedrock procedural guarantee applies to both federal and state prosecutions. Pointer v. Texas, 380 U.S. 400, 406, 85 S.Ct. 1065, 13 L.Ed.2d 923 (1965). As noted above, Roberts says that an unavailable witness's out-of-court statement may be admitted so long as it has adequate indicia of reliability-i.e., falls within a "firmly rooted hearsay exception" or bears "particularized guarantees of trustworthiness." 448 U.S., at 66, 100 S.Ct. 2531. Petitioner argues that this test strays from the original meaning of the Confrontation Clause and urges us to reconsider it.

The Constitution's text does not alone resolve this case. One could plausibly read "witnesses against" a defendant to mean those who actually testify at trial, cf. Woodsides v. State, 3 Miss. 655, 664-665 (1837), those whose statements are offered at trial, see 3 J. Wigmore, Evidence § 1397, p. 104 (2d ed.1923) (hereinafter Wigmore), or something in-between, see infra, at 1364. We must therefore turn to the historical background of the Clause to understand its meaning.

The right to confront one's accusers is a concept that dates back to Roman times. See Coy v. Iowa, 487 U.S. 1012, 1015, 108 S.Ct. 2798, 101 L.Ed.2d 857 (1988); Herrmann & Speer, Facing the Accuser: Ancient and Medieval Precursors of the Confrontation Clause, 34 Va. J. Int'l L. 481 (1994). The founding generation's immediate source of the concept, however, was the common law. English common law has long differed from continental civil law in regard to the manner in which witnesses give testimony in criminal trials. The common-law tradition is one of live testimony in court subject to adversarial testing, while the civil law condones examination in private by judicial officers. See 3 W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England 373-374 (1768).

Nonetheless, England at times adopted elements of the civil-law practice. Justices of the peace or other officials examined suspects and witnesses before trial. These examinations were sometimes read in court in lieu of live testimony, a practice that "occasioned frequent demands by the prisoner to have his 'accusers,' i.e. the witnesses against him, brought before him face to face." 1 J. Stephen, History of the Criminal Law of England 326 (1883). In some cases, these demands were refused. See 9 W. Holdsworth, History of English Law 216-217, 228 (3d ed.1944); e.g., Raleigh's Case, 2 How. St. Tr. 1, 15-16, 24 (1603); Throckmorton's Case, 1 How. St. Tr. 869, 875-876 (1554); cf. Lilburn's Case, 3 How. St. Tr. 1315, 1318-1322, 1329 (Star Chamber 1637).

Pretrial examinations became routine under two statutes passed during the reign of Queen Mary in the 16th century, 1 & 2 Phil. & M., c. 13 (1554), and 2 & 3 id., c. 10 (1555). These Marian bail and committal statutes required justices of the peace to examine suspects and witnesses in felony cases and to certify the results to the court. It is doubtful that the original purpose of the examinations was to produce evidence admissible at trial. See J. Langbein, Prosecuting Crime in the Renaissance 21-34 (1974). Whatever the original purpose, however, they came to be used as evidence in some cases, see 2 M. Hale, Pleas of the Crown 284 (1736), resulting in an adoption of continental procedure. See 4 Holdsworth, supra, at 528-530.

The most notorious instances of civil-law examination occurred in the great political trials of the 16th and 17th centuries. One such was the 1603 trial of Sir Walter Raleigh for treason. Lord Cobham, Raleigh's alleged accomplice, had implicated him in an examination before the Privy Council and in a letter. At Raleigh's trial, these were read to the jury. Raleigh argued that Cobham had lied to save himself: "Cobham is absolutely in the King's mercy; to excuse me cannot avail him; by accusing me he may hope for favour." 1 D. Jardine, Criminal Trials 435 (1832). Suspecting that Cobham would recant, Raleigh demanded that the judges call him to appear, arguing that "[t]he Proof of the Common Law is by witness and jury: let Cobham be here, let him speak it. Call my accuser before my face ...." 2 How. St. Tr., at 15-16. The judges refused, id., at 24, and, despite Raleigh's protestations that he was being tried "by the Spanish Inquisition," id., at 15, the jury convicted, and Raleigh was sentenced to death.

One of Raleigh's trial judges later lamented that " 'the justice of England has never been so degraded and injured as by the condemnation of Sir Walter Raleigh.' " 1 Jardine, supra, at 520. Through a series of statutory and judicial reforms, English law developed a right of confrontation that limited these abuses. For example, treason statutes required witnesses to confront the accused "face to face" at his arraignment. E.g., 13 Car. 2, c. 1, § 5 (1661); see 1 Hale, supra, at 306.

Courts, meanwhile, developed relatively strict rules of unavailability, admitting examinations only if the witness was demonstrably unable to testify in person. See Lord Morley's Case, 6 How. St. Tr. 769, 770-771 (H.L.1666); 2 Hale, supra, at 284; 1 Stephen, supra, at 358. Several authorities also stated that a suspect's confession could be admitted only against himself, and not against others he implicated. See 2 W. Hawkins, Pleas of the Crown ch. 46, § 3, pp. 603-604 (T. Leach 6th ed. 1787); 1 Hale, supra, at 585, n. (k); 1 G. Gilbert, Evidence 216 (C. Lofft ed. 1791); cf. Tong's Case, Kel. J. 17, 18, 84 Eng. Rep. 1061, 1062 (1662) (treason). But see King v. Westbeer, 1 Leach 12, 168 Eng. Rep. 108, 109 (1739).

One recurring question was whether the admissibility of an unavailable witness's pretrial examination depended on whether the defendant had had an opportunity to cross-examine him. In 1696, the Court of King's Bench answered this question in the affirmative, in the widely reported misdemeanor libel case of King v. Paine, 5 Mod. 163, 87 Eng. Rep. 584. The court ruled that, even though a witness was dead, his examination was not admissible where "the defendant not being present when [it was] taken before the mayor ... had lost the benefit of a cross-examination." Id., at 165, 87 Eng. Rep., at 585. The question was also debated at length during the infamous proceedings against Sir John Fenwick on a bill of attainder. Fenwick's counsel objected to admitting the examination of a witness who had been spirited away, on the ground that Fenwick had had no opportunity to cross-examine. See Fenwick's Case, 13 How. St. Tr. 537, 591-592 (H.C. 1696) (Powys) ("[T]hat which they would offer is something that Mr. Goodman hath sworn when he was examined ...; sir J.F. not being present or privy, and no opportunity given to cross-examine the person; and I conceive that cannot be offered as evidence ..."); id., at 592 (Shower) ("[N]o deposition of a person can be read, though beyond sea, unless in cases where the party it is to be read against was privy to the examination, and might have cross-examined him .... [O]ur constitution is, that the person shall see his accuser"). The examination was nonetheless admitted on a closely divided vote after several of those present opined that the common-law rules of procedure did not apply to parliamentary attainder proceedings-one speaker even admitting that the evidence would normally be inadmissible. See id., at 603-604 (Williamson); id., at 604-605 (Chancellor of the Exchequer); id., at 607; 3 Wigmore § 1364, at 22-23, n. 54. Fenwick was condemned, but the proceedings "must have burned into the general consciousness the vital importance of the rule securing the right of cross-examination." Id., § 1364, at 22; cf. Carmell v. Texas, 529 U.S. 513, 526-530, 120 S.Ct. 1620, 146 L.Ed.2d 577 (2000).

Paine had settled the rule requiring a prior opportunity for cross-examination as a matter of common law, but some doubts remained over whether the Marian statutes prescribed an exception to it in felony cases. The statutes did not identify the circumstances under which examinations were admissible, see 1 & 2 Phil. & M., c. 13 (1554); 2 & 3

id., c. 10 (1555), and some inferred that no prior opportunity for cross-examination was required. See Westbeer, supra, at 12, 168 Eng. Rep., at 109; compare Fenwick's Case, 13 How. St. Tr., at 596 (Sloane), with id., at 602 (Musgrave). Many who expressed this view acknowledged that it meant the statutes were in derogation of the common law. See King v. Eriswell, 3 T.R. 707, 710, 100 Eng. Rep. 815, 817 (K.B.1790) (Grose, J.) (dicta); id., at 722-723, 100 Eng. Rep., at 823-824 (Kenyon, C.J.) (same); compare 1 Gilbert, Evidence, at 215 (admissible only "by Force 'of the Statute' "), with id., at 65. Nevertheless, by 1791 (the year the Sixth Amendment was ratified), courts were applying the cross-examination rule even to examinations by justices of the peace in felony cases. See King v. Dingler, 2 Leach 561, 562-563, 168 Eng. Rep. 383, 383-384 (1791); King v. Woodcock, 1 Leach 500, 502-504, 168 Eng. Rep. 352, 353 (1789); cf. King v. Radbourne, 1 Leach 457, 459-461, 168 Eng. Rep. 330, 331-332 (1787); 3 Wigmore § 1364, at 23. Early 19th-century treatises confirm that requirement. See 1 T. Starkie, Evidence 95 (1826); 2 id., at 484-492; T. Peake, Evidence 63-64 (3d ed. 1808). When Parliament amended the statutes in 1848 to make the requirement explicit, see 11 & 12 Vict., c. 42, § 17, the change merely "introduced in terms" what was already afforded the defendant "by the equitable construction of the law." Queen v. Beeston, 29 Eng. L. & Eq. R. 527, 529 (Ct.Crim.App.1854) (Jervis, C. J.). FN2

Controversial examination practices were also used in the Colonies. Early in the 18th century, for example, the Virginia Council protested against the Governor for having "privately issued several commissions to examine witnesses against particular men ex parte," complaining that "the person accused is not admitted to be confronted with, or defend himself against his defamers." A Memorial Concerning the Maladministrations of His Excellency Francis Nicholson, reprinted in 9 English Historical Documents 253, 257 (D. Douglas ed.1955). A decade before the Revolution, England gave jurisdiction over Stamp Act offenses to the admiralty courts, which followed civil-law rather than common-law procedures and thus routinely took testimony by deposition or private judicial examination. See 5 Geo. 3, c. 12, § 57 (1765); Pollitt, The Right of Confrontation: Its History and Modern Dress, 8 J. Pub.L. 381, 396-397 (1959). Colonial representatives protested that the Act subverted their rights "by extending the jurisdiction of the courts of admiralty beyond its ancient limits." Resolutions of the Stamp Act Congress § 8th (Oct. 19, 1765), reprinted in Sources of Our Liberties 270, 271 (R. Perry & J. Cooper eds.1959). John Adams, defending a merchant in a high-profile admiralty case, argued: "Examinations of witnesses upon Interrogatories, are only by the Civil Law. Interrogatories are unknown at common Law, and Englishmen and common Lawyers have an aversion to them if not an Abhorrence of them." Draft of Argument in Sewall v. Hancock (Oct. 1768 - Mar. 1769), in 2 Legal Papers of John Adams 194, 207 (L. Wroth & H. Zobel eds.1965).

Many declarations of rights adopted around the time of the Revolution guaranteed a right of confrontation. See Virginia Declaration of Rights § 8 (1776); Pennsylvania Declaration of Rights § IX (1776); Delaware Declaration of Rights § 14 (1776); Maryland Declaration of Rights § XIX (1776); North Carolina Declaration of Rights § VII (1776); Vermont Declaration of Rights Ch. I, § X (1777); Massachusetts Declaration of Rights § XII (1780); New Hampshire Bill of Rights § XV (1783), all reprinted in 1 B. Schwartz, The Bill of Rights: A Documentary History 235, 265, 278, 282, 287, 323, 342, 377 (1971). The proposed Federal Constitution, however, did not. At the Massachusetts ratifying convention, Abraham Holmes objected to this omission precisely on the ground that it would lead to civil-law practices: "The mode of trial is altogether indetermined; ... whether [the defendant] is to be allowed to confront the witnesses, and have the advantage of cross-examination, we are not yet told .... [W]e shall find Congress possessed of powers enabling them to institute judicatories little less inauspicious than a certain tribunal in Spain, ... the Inquisition." 2 Debates on the Federal Constitution 110-111 (J. Elliot 2d ed. 1863). Similarly, a prominent Antifederalist writing under the pseudonym Federal Farmer criticized the use of "written evidence" while objecting to the omission of a vicinage right: "Nothing can be more essential than the cross examining [of] witnesses, and generally before the triers of the facts in question .... [W]ritten evidence ... [is] almost useless; it must be frequently taken ex parte, and but very seldom leads to the proper discovery of truth." R. Lee, Letter IV by the Federal Farmer (Oct. 15, 1787), reprinted in 1 Schwartz, supra, at 469, 473. The First Congress responded by including the Confrontation Clause in the proposal that became the Sixth Amendment.

Early state decisions shed light upon the original understanding of the common-law right. State v. Webb, 2 N.C. 103 (Super. L. & Eq. 1794) (per curiam), decided a mere three years after the adoption of the Sixth Amendment, held that depositions could be read against an accused only if they were taken in his presence. Rejecting a broader reading of the English authorities, the court held: "[I]t is a rule of the common law, founded on natural justice, that no man shall be prejudiced by evidence which he had not the liberty to cross examine." Id., at 104.

Similarly, in State v. Campbell, 30 S.C.L. 124, 1844 WL 2558 (App. L. 1844), South Carolina's highest law court excluded a deposition taken by a coroner in the absence of the accused. It held: "[I]f we are to decide the question by the established rules of the common law, there could not be a dissenting voice. For, notwithstanding the death of the witness, and whatever the respectability of the court taking the depositions, the solemnity of the occasion and the weight of the testimony, such depositions are ex parte, and, therefore, utterly incompetent." Id., at 125. The court said that one of the "indispensable conditions" implicitly guaranteed by the State Constitution was that "prosecutions be carried on to the conviction of the accused, by witnesses confronted by him, and subjected to his personal examination." Ibid.

Many other decisions are to the same effect. Some early cases went so far as to hold that prior testimony was inadmissible in criminal cases even if the accused had a previous opportunity to cross-examine. See Finn v. Commonwealth, 26 Va. 701, 708 (1827); State v. Atkins, 1 Tenn. 229 (Super. L. & Eq. 1807) (per curiam). Most courts rejected that view, but only after reaffirming that admissibility depended on a prior opportunity for cross-examination. See United States v. Macomb, 26 F.Cas. 1132, 1133 (No. 15,702) (CC Ill. 1851); State v. Houser, 26 Mo. 431, 435-436 (1858); Kendrick v. State, 29 Tenn. 479, 485-488 (1850); Bostick v. State, 22 Tenn. 344, 345-346 (1842); Commonwealth v. Richards, 35 Mass. 434, 437 (1837); State v. Hill, 20 S.C.L. 607, 608-610 (App. 1835); Johnston v. State, 10 Tenn. 58, 59 (Err. & App. 1821). Nineteenth-century treatises confirm the rule. See 1 J. Bishop, Criminal Procedure § 1093, p. 689 (2d ed. 1872); T. Cooley, Constitutional Limitations.

III

This history supports two inferences about the meaning of the Sixth Amendment.

First, the principal evil at which the Confrontation Clause was directed was the civil-law mode of criminal procedure, and particularly its use of ex parte examinations as evidence against the accused. It was these practices that the Crown deployed in notorious treason cases like Raleigh's; that the Marian statutes invited; that English law's assertion of a right to confrontation was meant to prohibit; and that the founding-era rhetoric decried. The Sixth Amendment must be interpreted with this focus in mind.

Accordingly, we once again reject the view that the Confrontation Clause applies of its own force only to in-court testimony, and that its application to out-of-court statements ntroduced at trial depends upon "the law of Evidence for the time being." 3 Wigmore § 1397, at 101; accord, Dutton v. Evans, 400 U.S. 74, 94, 91 S.Ct. 210, 27 L.Ed.2d 213 (1970) (Harlan, J., concurring in result). Leaving the regulation of out-of-court statements to the law of evidence would render the Confrontation Clause powerless to prevent even the most flagrant inquisitorial practices. Raleigh was, after all, perfectly free to confront those who read Cobham's confession in court.

This focus also suggests that not all hearsay implicates the Sixth Amendment's core concerns. An off-hand, overheard remark might be unreliable evidence and thus a good candidate for exclusion under hearsay rules, but it bears little resemblance to the civil-law abuses the Confrontation Clause targeted. On the other hand, ex parte examinations might sometimes be admissible under modern hearsay rules, but the Framers certainly would not have condoned them.

The text of the Confrontation Clause reflects this focus. It applies to "witnesses" against the accused-in other words, those who "bear testimony." 1 N. Webster, An American Dictionary of the English Language (1828). "Testimony," in turn, is typically "[a] solemn declaration or affirmation made for the purpose of establishing or proving some fact." Ibid. An accuser who makes a formal statement to government officers bears testimony in a sense that a person who makes a casual remark to an acquaintance does not. The constitutional text, like the history underlying the common-law right of confrontation, thus reflects an especially acute concern with a specific type of out-of-court statement.

Various formulations of this core class of "testimonial" statements exist: "ex parte in-court testimony or its functional equivalent-that is, material such as affidavits, custodial examinations, prior testimony that the defendant was unable to cross-examine, or similar pretrial statements that declarants would reasonably expect to be used prosecutorially," Brief for Petitioner 23; "extrajudicial statements ... contained in formalized testimonial materials, such as affidavits, depositions, prior testimony, or confessions," White v. Illinois, 502 U.S. 346, 365, 112 S.Ct. 736, 116 L.Ed.2d 848 (1992) (THOMAS, J., joined by SCALIA, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment); "statements that were made under circumstances which would lead an objective witness reasonably to believe that the statement would be available for use at a later trial," Brief for National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers et al. as Amici Curiae 3. These formulations all share a common nucleus and then define the Clause's coverage at various levels of abstraction around it. Regardless of the precise articulation, some statements qualify under any definition-for example, ex parte testimony at a preliminary hearing.

Statements taken by police officers in the course of interrogations are also testimonial under even a narrow standard. Police interrogations bear a striking resemblance to examinations by justices of the peace in England. The statements are not sworn testimony, but the absence of oath was not dispositive. Cobham's examination was unsworn, see 1 Jardine, Criminal Trials, at 430, yet Raleigh's trial has long been thought a paradigmatic confrontation violation, see, e.g., Campbell, 30 S.C.L. at 130. Under the Marian statutes, witnesses were typically put on oath, but suspects were not. See 2 Hale, Pleas of the Crown, at 52. Yet Hawkins and others went out of their way to caution that such unsworn confessions were not admissible against anyone but the confessor. See supra, at 1360. FN3

That interrogators are police officers rather than magistrates does not change the picture either. Justices of the peace conducting examinations under the Marian statutes were not magistrates as we understand that office today, but had an essentially investigative and prosecutorial function. See 1 Stephen, Criminal Law of England, at 221; Langbein, Prosecuting Crime in the Renaissance, at 34-45. England did not have a professional police force until the 19th century, see 1 Stephen, supra, at 194-200, so it is not surprising that other government officers performed the investigative functions now associated primarily with the police. The involvement of government officers in the production of testimonial evidence presents the same risk, whether the officers are police or justices of the peace.

In sum, even if the Sixth Amendment is not solely concerned with testimonial hearsay, that is its primary object, and interrogations by law enforcement officers fall squarely within that class. FN4

The historical record also supports a second proposition: that the Framers would not have allowed admission of testimonial statements of a witness who did not appear at trial unless he was unavailable to testify, and the defendant had had a prior opportunity for cross-examination. The text of the Sixth Amendment does not suggest any open-ended exceptions from the confrontation requirement to be developed by the courts. Rather, the "right ... to be confronted with the witnesses against him," Amdt. 6, is most naturally read as a reference to the right of confrontation at common law, admitting only those exceptions established at the time of the founding. See Mattox v. United States, 156 U.S. 237, 243, 15 S.Ct. 337, 39 L.Ed. 409 (1895); cf. Houser, 26 Mo., at 433-435. As the English authorities above reveal, the common law in 1791 conditioned admissibility of an absent witness's examination on unavailability and a prior opportunity to cross-examine. The Sixth Amendment therefore incorporates those limitations. The numerous early state decisions applying the same test confirm that these principles were received as part of the common law in this country. FN5

We do not read the historical sources to say that a prior opportunity to cross-examine was merely a sufficient, rather than a necessary, condition for admissibility of testimonial statements. They suggest that this requirement was dispositive, and not merely one of several ways to establish reliability. This is not to deny, as THE CHIEF JUSTICE notes, that "[t]here were always exceptions to the general rule of exclusion" of hearsay evidence. Post, at 1377. Several had become well established by 1791. See 3 Wigmore § 1397, at 101; Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 13, n. 5. But there is scant evidence that exceptions were invoked to admit testimonial statements against the accused in a criminal case. FN6 MOST OF THE HEARSAy exceptions covered statements that by their nature were not testimonial-for example, business records or statements in furtherance of a conspiracy. We do not infer from these that the Framers thought exceptions would apply even to prior testimony. Cf. Lilly v. Virginia, 527 U.S. 116, 134, 119 S.Ct. 1887, 144 L.Ed.2d 117 (1999) (plurality opinion) ("[A]ccomplices' confessions that inculpate a criminal defendant are not within a firmly rooted exception to the hearsay rule"). FN7

Our case law has been largely consistent with these two principles. Our leading early decision, for example, involved a deceased witness's prior trial testimony. Mattox v. United States, 156

U.S. 237, 15 S.Ct. 337, 39 L.Ed. 409 (1895). In allowing the statement to be admitted, we relied on the fact that the defendant had had, at the first trial, an adequate opportunity to confront the witness: "The substance of the constitutional protection is preserved to the prisoner in the advantage he has once had of seeing the witness face to face, and of subjecting him to the ordeal of a cross-examination. This, the law says, he shall under no circumstances be deprived of ...." Id., at 244, 15 S.Ct. 337.

Our later cases conform to Mattox's holding that prior trial or preliminary hearing testimony is admissible only if the defendant had an adequate opportunity to cross-examine. See Mancusi v. Stubbs, 408 U.S. 204, 213-216, 92 S.Ct. 2308, 33 L.Ed.2d 293 (1972); California v. Green, 399 U.S. 149, 165-168, 90 S.Ct. 1930, 26 L.Ed.2d 489 (1970); Pointer v. Texas, 380 U.S., at 406-408, 85 S.Ct. 1065; cf. Kirby v. United States, 174 U.S. 47, 55-61, 19 S.Ct. 574, 43 L.Ed. 890 (1899). Even where the defendant had such an opportunity, we excluded the testimony where the government had not established unavailability of the witness. See Barber v. Page, 390 U.S. 719, 722-725, 88 S.Ct. 1318, 20 L.Ed.2d 255 (1968); cf. Motes v. United States, 178 U.S. 458, 470-471, 20 S.Ct. 993, 44 L.Ed. 1150 (1900). We similarly excluded accomplice confessions where the defendant had no opportunity to cross-examine. See Roberts v. Russell, 392 U.S. 293, 294-295, 88 S.Ct. 1921, 20 L.Ed.2d 1100 (1968) (per curiam); Bruton v. United States, 391 U.S. 123, 126-128, 88 S.Ct. 1620, 20 L.Ed.2d 476 (1968); Douglas v. Alabama, 380 U.S. 415, 418-420, 85 S.Ct. 1074, 13 L.Ed.2d 934 (1965). In contrast, we considered reliability factors beyond prior opportunity for cross-examination when the hearsay statement at issue was not testimonial. See Dutton v. Evans, 400 U.S., at 87-89, 91 S.Ct. 210 (plurality opinion).

Even our recent cases, in their outcomes, hew closely to the traditional line. Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S., at 67-70, 100 S.Ct. 2531, admitted testimony from a preliminary hearing at which the defendant had examined the witness. Lilly v. Virginia, supra, excluded testimonial statements that the defendant had had no opportunity to test by cross-examination. And Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171, 181-184, 107 S.Ct. 2775, 97 L.Ed.2d 144 (1987), admitted statements made unwittingly to a Federal Bureau of Investigation informant after applying a more general test that did not make prior cross-examination an indispensable requirement. FN8

Lee v. Illinois, 476 U.S. 530, 106 S.Ct. 2056, 90 L.Ed.2d 514 (1986), on which the State relies, is not to the contrary. There, we rejected the State's attempt to admit an accomplice confession. The State had argued that the confession was admissible because it "interlocked" with the defendant's. We dealt with the argument by rejecting its premise, holding that "when the discrepancies between the statements are not insignificant, the codefendant's confession may not be admitted." Id., at 545, 106 S.Ct. 2056. Respondent argues that "[t]he logical inference of this statement is that when the discrepancies between the statements are insignificant, then the codefendant's statement may be admitted." Brief for Respondent 6. But this is merely a possible inference, not an inevitable one, and we do not draw it here. If Lee had meant authoritatively to announce an exception-previously unknown to this Court's jurisprudence-for interlocking confessions, it would not have done so in such an oblique manner. Our only precedent on interlocking confessions had addressed the entirely different question whether a limiting instruction cured prejudice to codefendants from admitting a defendant's own confession against him in a joint trial. See Parker v. Randolph, 442 U.S. 62, 69-76, 99 S.Ct. 2132, 60 L.Ed.2d 713 (1979) (plurality opinion), abrogated by Cruz v. New York, 481 U.S. 186, 107 S.Ct. 1714, 95 L.Ed.2d 162 (1987).

Our cases have thus remained faithful to the Framers' understanding: Testimonial statements of witnesses absent from trial have been admitted only where the declarant is unavailable, and only where the defendant has had a prior opportunity to cross-examine. FN9

Although the results of our decisions have generally been faithful to the original meaning of the Confrontation Clause, the same cannot be said of our rationales. Roberts conditions the admissibility of all hearsay evidence on whether it falls under a "firmly rooted hearsay exception" or bears "particularized guarantees of trustworthiness." 448 U.S., at 66, 100 S.Ct. 2531. This test departs from the historical principles identified above in two respects. First, it is too broad: It applies the same mode of analysis whether or not the hearsay consists of ex parte testimony. This often results in close constitutional scrutiny in cases that are far removed from the core concerns of the Clause. At the same time, however, the test is too narrow: It admits statements that do consist of ex parte testimony upon a mere finding of reliability. This malleable standard often fails to protect against paradigmatic confrontation violations.

Members of this Court and academics have suggested that we revise our doctrine to reflect more accurately the original understanding of the Clause. See, e.g., Lilly, 527 U.S., at 140-143, 119 S.Ct. 1887 (BREYER, J., concurring); White, 502 U.S., at 366, 112 S.Ct. 736 (THOMAS J., joined by SCALIA, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment); A. Amar, The Constitution and Criminal Procedure 125-131 (1997); Friedman, Confrontation: The Search for Basic Principles, 86 Geo. L.J. 1011 (1998). They offer two proposals: First, that we apply the Confrontation Clause only to testimonial statements, leaving the remainder to regulation by hearsay law-thus eliminating the overbreadth referred to above. Second, that we impose an absolute bar to statements that are testimonial, absent a prior opportunity to cross-examine-thus eliminating the excessive narrowness referred to above.

In White, we considered the first proposal and rejected it. 502 U.S., at 352-353, 112 S.Ct. 736. Although our analysis in this case casts doubt on that holding, we need not definitively resolve whether it survives our decision today, because Sylvia Crawford's statement is testimonial under any definition. This case does, however, squarely implicate the second proposal.

Where testimonial statements are involved, we do not think the Framers meant to leave the Sixth Amendment's protection to the vagaries of the rules of evidence, much less to amorphous notions of "reliability." Certainly none of the authorities discussed above acknowledges any general reliability exception to the common-law rule. Admitting statements deemed reliable by a judge is fundamentally at odds with the right of confrontation. To be sure, the Clause's ultimate goal is to ensure reliability of evidence, but it is a procedural rather than a substantive guarantee. It commands, not that evidence be reliable, but that reliability be assessed in a particular manner: by testing in the crucible of cross-examination. The Clause thus reflects a judgment, not only about the desirability of reliable evidence (a point on which there could be little dissent), but about how reliability can best be determined. Cf. 3 Blackstone, Commentaries, at 373 ("This open examination of witnesses ... is much more conducive to the clearing up of truth"); M. Hale, History and Analysis of the Common Law of England 258 (1713) (adversarial testing "beats and bolts out the Truth much better").

The Roberts test allows a jury to hear evidence, untested by the adversary process, based on a mere judicial determination of reliability. It thus replaces the constitutionally prescribed method of assessing reliability with a wholly foreign one. In this respect, it is very different from exceptions to the Confrontation Clause that make no claim to be a surrogate means of assessing reliability. For example, the rule of forfeiture by wrongdoing (which we accept) extinguishes confrontation claims on essentially equitable grounds; it does not purport to be an alternative means of determining reliability. See Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145, 158-159, 25 L.Ed. 244 (1879).

The Raleigh trial itself involved the very sorts of reliability determinations that Roberts authorizes. In the face of Raleigh's repeated demands for confrontation, the prosecution responded with many of the arguments a court applying Roberts might invoke today: that Cobham's statements were self-inculpatory, 2 How. St. Tr., at 19, that they were not made in the heat of passion, id., at 14, and that they were not "extracted from [him] upon any hopes or promise of Pardon," id., at 29. It is not plausible that the Framers' only objection to the trial was that Raleigh's judges did not properly weigh these factors before sentencing him to death. Rather, the problem was that the judges refused to allow Raleigh to confront Cobham in court, where he could cross-examine him and try to expose his accusation as a lie.

Dispensing with confrontation because testimony is obviously reliable is akin to dispensing with jury trial because a defendant is obviously guilty. This is not what the Sixth Amendment prescribes.

The legacy of Roberts in other courts vindicates the Framers' wisdom in rejecting a general reliability exception. The framework is so unpredictable that it fails to provide meaningful protection from even core confrontation violations.

Reliability is an amorphous, if not entirely subjective, concept. There are countless factors bearing on whether a statement is reliable; the nine-factor balancing test applied by the Court of Appeals below is representative. See, e.g., People v. Farrell, 34 P.3d 401, 406-407 (Colo.2001) (eight-factor test). Whether a statement is deemed reliable depends heavily on which factors the judge considers and how much weight he accords each of them. Some courts wind up attaching the same significance to opposite facts. For example, the Colorado Supreme Court held a statement more reliable because its inculpation of the defendant was "detailed," id., at 407, while the Fourth Circuit found a statement more reliable because the portion implicating another was "fleeting," United States v. Photogrammetric Data Servs., Inc., 259 F.3d 229, 245 (C.A.4 2001). The Virginia Court of Appeals found a statement more reliable because the witness was in custody and charged with a crime (thus making the statement more obviously against her penal interest), see Nowlin v. Commonwealth, 40 Va.App. 327, 335-338, 579 S.E.2d 367, 371-372 (2003), while the Wisconsin Court of Appeals found a statement more reliable because the witness was not in custody and not a suspect, see State v. Bintz, 2002 WI App. 204, ¶ 13, 257 Wis.2d 177, 187, ¶ 13, 650 N.W.2d 913, 918, ¶ 13. Finally, the Colorado Supreme Court in one case found a statement more reliable because it was given "immediately after" the events at issue, Farrell, supra, at 407, while that same court, in another case, found a statement more reliable because two years had elapsed, Stevens v. People, 29 P.3d 305, 316 (Colo.2001).

The unpardonable vice of the Roberts test, however, is not its unpredictability, but its demonstrated capacity to admit core testimonial statements that the Confrontation Clause plainly meant to exclude. Despite the plurality's speculation in Lilly, 527 U.S., at 137, 119 S.Ct. 1887, that it was "highly unlikely" that accomplice confessions implicating the accused could survive Roberts, courts continue routinely to admit them. See Photogrammetric Data Servs., supra, at 245-246; Farrell, supra, at 406-408; Stevens, supra, at 314-318; Taylor v. Commonwealth, 63 S.W.3d 151, 166-168 (Ky.2001); State v. Hawkins, No. 2001-P-0060, 2002 WL 31895118, ¶ ¶ 34-37, *6 (Ohio App., Dec. 31, 2002); Bintz, supra, ¶ ¶ 7-14, 257 Wis.2d, at 183-188, 650 N.W.2d, at 916-918; People v. Lawrence, 55 P.3d 155, 160-161 (Colo.App.2001); State v. Jones, 171 Or.App. 375, 387-391, 15 P.3d 616, 623-625 (2000); State v. Marshall, 136 Ohio App.3d 742, 747-748, 737 N.E.2d 1005, 1009 (2000); People v. Schutte, 240 Mich.App. 713, 718-721, 613 N.W.2d 370, 376-377 (2000); People v. Thomas, 313 Ill.App.3d 998, 1005-1007, 246 Ill.Dec. 593, 730 N.E.2d 618, 625-626 (2000); cf. Nowlin, supra, at 335-338, 579 S.E.2d, at 371-372 (witness confessed to a related crime); People v. Campbell, 309 Ill.App.3d 423, 431-432, 242

Ill.Dec. 694, 699, 721 N.E.2d 1225, 1230 (1999) (same). One recent study found that, after Lilly, appellate courts admitted accomplice statements to the authorities in 25 out of 70 cases-more than one-third of the time. Kirst, Appellate Court Answers to the Confrontation Questions in Lilly v. Virginia, 53 Syracuse L.Rev. 87, 105 (2003). Courts have invoked Roberts to admit other sorts of plainly testimonial statements despite the absence of any opportunity to cross-examine. See United States v. Aguilar, 295 F.3d 1018, 1021-1023 (C.A.9 2002) (plea allocution showing existence of a conspiracy); United States v. Centracchio, 265 F.3d 518, 527-530 (C.A.7 2001) (same); United States v. Dolah, 245 F.3d 98, 104-105 (C.A.2 2001) (same); United States v. Petrillo, 237 F.3d 119, 122-123 (C.A.2 2000) (same); United States v. Moskowitz, 215 F.3d 265, 268-269 (C.A.2 2000) (per curiam) (same); United States v. Gallego, 191 F.3d 156, 166-168 (C.A.2 1999) (same); United States v. Papajohn, 212 F.3d 1112, 1118-1120 (C.A.8 2000) (grand jury testimony); *United States v. To add insult to injury, some of the courts that admit untested testimonial statements find reliability in the very factors that make the statements testimonial. As noted earlier, one court relied on the fact that the witness's statement was made to police while in custody on pending charges-the theory being that this made the statement more clearly against penal interest and thus more reliable. Nowlin, supra, at 335-338, 579 S.E.2d, at 371-372. Other courts routinely rely on the fact that a prior statement is given under oath in judicial proceedings. E.g., Gallego, supra, at 168 (plea allocution); Papajohn, supra, at 1120 (grand jury testimony). That inculpating statements are given in a testimonial setting is not an antidote to the confrontation problem, but rather the trigger that makes the Clause's demands most urgent. It is not enough to point out that most of the usual safeguards of the adversary process attend the statement, when the single safeguard missing is the one the Confrontation Clause demands.

Roberts ' failings were on full display in the proceedings below. Sylvia Crawford made her statement while in police custody, herself a potential suspect in the case. Indeed, she had been told that whether she would be released "depend[ed] on how the investigation continues." App. 81. In response to often leading questions from police detectives, she implicated her husband in Lee's stabbing and at least arguably undermined his self-defense claim. Despite all this, the trial court admitted her statement, listing several reasons why it was reliable. In its opinion reversing, the Court of Appeals listed several other reasons why the statement was not reliable. Finally, the State Supreme Court relied exclusively on the interlocking character of the statement and disregarded every other factor the lower courts had considered. The case is thus a self-contained demonstration of Roberts' unpredictable and inconsistent application.

Each of the courts also made assumptions that cross-examination might well have undermined. The trial court, for example, stated that Sylvia Crawford's statement was reliable because she was an eyewitness with direct knowledge of the events. But Sylvia at one point told the police that she had "shut [her] eyes and ... didn't really watch" part of the fight, and that she was "in shock." App. 134. The trial court also buttressed its reliability finding by claiming that Sylvia was "being questioned by law enforcement, and, thus, the [questioner] is ... neutral to her and not someone who would be inclined to advance her interests and shade her version of the truth unfavorably toward the defendant." Id., at 77. The Framers would be astounded to learn that ex parte testimony could be admitted against a criminal defendant because it was elicited by "neutral" government officers. But even if the court's assessment of the officer's motives was accurate, it says nothing about Sylvia's perception of her situation. Only cross-examination could reveal that.

The State Supreme Court gave dispositive weight to the interlocking nature of the two statements-that they were both ambiguous as to when and whether Lee had a weapon. The court's claim that the two statements were equally ambiguous is hard to accept. Petitioner's statement is ambiguous only in the sense that he had lingering doubts about his recollection: "A. I could a swore I seen him goin' for somethin' before, right before everything happened .... [B]ut I'm not positive." Id., at 155. Sylvia's statement, on the other hand, is truly inscrutable, since the key timing detail was simply assumed in the leading question she was asked: "Q. Did Kenny do anything to fight back from this assault?" Id., at 137 (puncuation added). Moreover, Sylvia specifically said Lee had nothing in his hands after he was stabbed, while petitioner was not asked about that.

The prosecutor obviously did not share the court's view that Sylvia's statement was ambiguous-he called it "damning evidence" that "completely refutes [petitioner's] claim of self-defense." Tr. 468 (Oct. 21, 1999). We have no way of knowing whether the jury agreed with the prosecutor or the court. Far from obviating the need for cross-examination, the "interlocking" ambiguity of the two statements made it all the more imperative that they be tested to tease out the truth.

We readily concede that we could resolve this case by simply reweighing the "reliability factors" under Roberts and finding that Sylvia Crawford's statement falls short. But we view this as one of those rare cases in which the result below is so improbable that it reveals a fundamental failure on our part to interpret the Constitution in a way that secures its intended constraint on judicial discretion. Moreover, to reverse the Washington Supreme Court's decision after conducting our own reliability analysis would perpetuate, not avoid, what the Sixth Amendment condemns. The Constitution prescribes a procedure for determining the reliability of testimony in criminal trials, and we, no less than the state courts, lack authority to replace it with one of our own devising.

We have no doubt that the courts below were acting in utmost good faith when they found reliability. The Framers, however, would not have been content to indulge this assumption. They knew that judges, like other government officers, could not always be trusted to safeguard the rights of the people; the likes of the dread Lord Jeffreys were not yet too distant a memory. They were loath to leave too much discretion in judicial hands. Cf. U.S. Const., Amdt. 6 (criminal jury trial); Amdt. 7 (civil jury trial); Ring v. Arizona, 536 U.S. 584, 611-612, 122 S.Ct. 2428, 153 L.Ed.2d 556 (2002) (SCALIA, J., concurring). By replacing categorical constitutional guarantees with open-ended balancing tests, we do violence to their design. Vague standards are manipulable, and, while that might be a small concern in run-of-the-mill assault prosecutions like this one, the Framers had an eye toward politically charged cases like Raleigh's-great state trials where the impartiality of even those at the highest levels of the judiciary might not be so clear. It is difficult to imagine Roberts' providing any meaningful protection in those circumstances.

Where nontestimonial hearsay is at issue, it is wholly consistent with the Framers' design to afford the States flexibility in their development of hearsay law-as does Roberts, and as would an approach that exempted such statements from Confrontation Clause scrutiny altogether. Where testimonial evidence is at issue, however, the Sixth Amendment demands what the common law required: unavailability and a prior opportunity for cross-examination. We leave for another day any effort to spell out a comprehensive definition of "testimonial." FN10 Whatever else the term covers, it applies at a minimum to prior testimony at a preliminary hearing, before a grand jury, or at a former trial; and to police interrogations. These are the modern practices with closest kinship to the abuses at which the Confrontation Clause was directed.

In this case, the State admitted Sylvia's testimonial statement against petitioner, despite the fact that he had no opportunity to cross-examine her. That alone is sufficient to make out a violation of the Sixth Amendment. Roberts notwithstanding, we decline to mine the record in search of indicia of reliability. Where testimonial statements are at issue, the only indicium of reliability sufficient to satisfy constitutional demands is the one the Constitution actually prescribes: confrontation.

The judgment of the Washington Supreme Court is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

FN* The syllabus constitutes no part of the opinion of the Court but has been prepared by the Reporter of Decisions for the convenience of the reader. See United States v. Detroit Timber & Lumber Co., 200 U.S. 321, 337, 26 S.Ct. 282, 50 L.Ed. 499

FN1. The court rejected the State's argument that guarantees of trustworthiness were unnecessary since petitioner waived his confrontation rights by invoking the marital privilege. It reasoned that "forcing the defendant to choose between the marital privilege and confronting his spouse presents an untenable Hobson's choice." 147 Wash.2d, at 432, 54 P.3d, at 660. The State has not challenged this holding here. The State also has not challenged the Court of Appeals' conclusion (not reached by the State Supreme Court) that the confrontation violation, if it occurred, was not harmless. We express no opinion on these matters.

FN2. There is some question whether the requirement of a prior opportunity for cross-examination applied as well to statements taken by a coroner, which were also authorized by the Marian statutes. See 3 Wigmore § 1364, at 23 (requirement "never came to be conceded at all in England"); T. Peake, Evidence 64, n. (m) (3d ed. 1808) (not finding the point "expressly decided in any reported case"); State v. Houser, 26 Mo. 431, 436 (1858) ("there may be a few cases ... but the authority of such cases is questioned, even in [England], by their ablest writers on common law"); State v. Campbell, 30 S.C.L. 124, 130 (App. L. 1844) (point "has not ... been plainly adjudged, even in the English cases"). Whatever the English rule, several early American authorities flatly rejected any special status for coroner statements. See Houser, supra, at 436; Campbell, supra, at 130; T. Cooley, Constitutional Limitations *318.

FN3. These sources-especially Raleigh's trial-refute THE CHIEF JUSTICE's assertion, post, at 1375 (opinion concurring in judgment), that the right of confrontation was not particularly concerned with unsworn testimonial statements. But even if, as he claims, a general bar on unsworn hearsay made application of the Confrontation Clause to unsworn testimonial statements a moot point, that would merely change our focus from direct evidence of original meaning of the Sixth Amendment to reasonable inference. We find it implausible that a provision which concededly condemned trial by sworn ex parte affidavit thought trial by unsworn ex parte affidavit perfectly OK. (The claim that unsworn testimony was self-regulating because jurors would disbelieve it, cf. post, at 1374, n. 1, is belied by the very existence of a general bar on unsworn testimony.) Any attempt to determine the application of a constitutional provision to a phenomenon that did not exist at the time of its adoption (here, allegedly, admissible unsworn testimony) involves some degree of estimation-what THE CHIEF JUSTICE calls use of a "proxy," post, at 1375-but that is hardly a reason not to make the estimation as accurate as possible. Even if, as THE CHIEF JUSTICE mistakenly asserts, there were no direct evidence of how the Sixth Amendment originally applied to unsworn testimony, there is no doubt what its application would have been.

FN4. We use the term "interrogation" in its colloquial, rather than any technical legal, sense. Cf. Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. 291, 300-301, 100 S.Ct. 1682, 64 L.Ed.2d 297 (1980). Just as various definitions of "testimonial" exist, one can imagine various definitions of "interrogation," and we need not select among them in this case. Sylvia's recorded statement, knowingly given in response to structured police questioning, qualifies under any conceivable definition.

FN5. THE CHIEF JUSTICE claims that English law's treatment of testimonial statements was inconsistent at the time of the framing, post, at 1376, but the examples he cites relate to examinations under the Marian statutes. As we have explained, to the extent Marian examinations were admissible, it was only because the statutes derogated from the common law. See supra, at 1361. Moreover, by 1791 even the statutory-derogation view had been rejected with respect to justice-of-the-peace examinations-explicitly in King v. Woodcock, 1 Leach 500, 502-504, 168 Eng. Rep. 352, 353 (1789), and King v. Dingler, 2 Leach 561, 562-563, 168 Eng. Rep. 383, 383-384 (1791), and by implication in King v. Radbourne, 1 Leach 457, 459-461, 168 Eng. Rep. 330, 331-332 (1787).
None of THE CHIEF JUSTICE's citations proves otherwise. King v. Westbeer, 1 Leach 12, 168 Eng. Rep. 108 (1739), was decided a half-century earlier and cannot be taken as an accurate statement of the law in 1791 given the directly contrary holdings of Woodcock and Dingler. Hale's treatise is older still, and far more ambiguous on this point, see 1 M. Hale, Pleas of the Crown 585-586 (1736); some who espoused the requirement of a prior opportunity for cross-examination thought it entirely consistent with Hale's views. See Fenwick's Case, 13 How. St. Tr. 537, 602 (H.C. 1696) (Musgrave). The only timely authority THE CHIEF JUSTICE cites is King v. Eriswell, 3 T.R. 707, 100 Eng. Rep. 815 (K.B.1790), but even that decision provides no substantial support. Eriswell was not a criminal case at all, but a Crown suit against the inhabitants of a town to charge them with care of an insane pauper. Id., at 707-708, 100 Eng. Rep., at 815-816. It is relevant only because the judges discuss the Marian statutes in dicta. One of them, Buller, J., defended admission of the pauper's statement of residence on the basis of authorities that purportedly held ex parte Marian examinations admissible. Id., at 713-714, 100 Eng. Rep., at 819. As evidence writers were quick to point out, however, his authorities said no such thing. See Peake, Evidence, at 64, n. (m) ("Mr. J. Buller is reported to have said that it was so settled in 1 Lev. 180, and Kel. 55; certainly nothing of the kind appears in those books"); 2 T. Starkie, Evidence 487-488, n. (c) (1826) ("Buller, J. ... refers to Radbourne's case ...; but in that case the deposition was taken in the hearing of the prisoner, and of course the question did not arise" (citation omitted)). Two other judges, Grose, J., and Kenyon, C. J., responded to Buller's argument by distinguishing Marian examinations as a statutory exception to the common-law rule, but the context and tenor of their remarks suggest they merely assumed the accuracy of Buller's premise without independent consideration, at least with respect to examinations by justices of the peace. See 3 T. R., at 710, 100 Eng. Rep., at 817 (Grose, J.); id., at 722-723, 100 Eng. Rep., at 823-824 (Kenyon, C. J.). In fact, the case reporter specifically notes in a footnote that their assumption was erroneous.

See id., at 710, n. (c), 100 Eng. Rep., at 817, n. (c). Notably, Buller's position on pauper examinations was resoundingly rejected only a decade later in King v. Ferry Frystone, 2 East 54, 55, 102 Eng. Rep. 289 (K.B.1801) ("The point ... has been since considered to be so clear against the admissibility of the evidence ... that it was abandoned by the counsel ... without argument"), further suggesting that his views on evidence were not mainstream at the time of the framing.

In short, none of THE CHIEF JUSTICE's sources shows that the law in 1791 was unsettled even as to examinations by justices of the peace under the Marian statutes. More importantly, however, even if the statutory rule in 1791 were in doubt, the numerous early state-court decisions make abundantly clear that the Sixth Amendment incorporated the common-law right of confrontation and not any exceptions the Marian statutes supposedly carved out from it. See supra, at 13-14; see also supra, at 11, n. 2 (coroner statements). The common-law rule had been settled since Paine in 1696. See King v. Paine, 5 Mod. 163, 165, 87 Eng. Rep. 584, 585 (K.B.).

FN6. The one deviation we have found involves dying declarations. The existence of that exception as a general rule of criminal hearsay law cannot be disputed. See, e.g., Mattox v. United States, 156 U.S. 237, 243-244, 15 S.Ct. 337, 39 L.Ed. 409 (1895); King v. Reason, 16 How. St. Tr. 1, 24-38 (K.B.1722); 1 D. Jardine, Criminal Trials 435 (1832); Cooley, Constitutional Limitations, at *318; 1 G. Gilbert, Evidence 211 (C. Lofft ed. 1791); see also F. Heller, The Sixth Amendment 105 (1951) (asserting that this was the only recognized criminal hearsay exception at common law). Although many dying declarations may not be testimonial, there is authority for admitting even those that clearly are. See Woodcock, supra, at 501-504, 168 Eng. Rep., at 353-354; Reason, supra, at 24-38; Peake, Evidence, at 64; cf. Radbourne, supra, at 460-462, 168 Eng. Rep., at 332-333. We need not decide in this case whether the Sixth Amendment incorporates an exception for testimonial dying declarations. If this exception must be accepted on historical grounds, it is sui generis.

FN7. We cannot agree with THE CHIEF JUSTICE that the fact "[t]hat a statement might be testimonial does nothing to undermine the wisdom of one of these [hearsay] exceptions." Post, at 1377. Involvement of government officers in the production of testimony with an eye toward trial presents unique potential for prosecutorial abuse-a fact borne out time and again throughout a history with which the Framers were keenly familiar. This consideration does not evaporate when testimony happens to fall within some broad, modern hearsay exception, even if that exception might be justifiable in other circumstances.

FN8. One case arguably in tension with the rule requiring a prior opportunity for cross-examination when the proffered statement is testimonial is White v. Illinois, 502 U.S. 346, 112 S.Ct. 736, 116 L.Ed.2d 848 (1992), which involved, inter alia, statements of a child victim to an investigating police officer admitted as spontaneous declarations. Id., at 349-351, 112 S.Ct. 736. It is questionable whether testimonial statements would ever have been admissible on that ground in 1791; to the extent the hearsay exception for spontaneous declarations existed at all, it required that the statements be made "immediat[ely] upon the hurt received, and before [the declarant] had time to devise or contrive any thing for her own advantage." Thompson v. Trevanion, Skin. 402, 90 Eng. Rep. 179 (K.B.1694). In any case, the only question presented in White was whether the Confrontation Clause imposed an unavailability requirement on the types of hearsay at issue. See 502 U.S., at 348-349, 112 S.Ct. 736. The holding did not address the question whether certain of the statements, because they were testimonial, had to be excluded even if the witness was unavailable. We "[took] as a given ... that the testimony properly falls within the relevant hearsay exceptions." Id., at 351, n. 4, 112 S.Ct. 736.

FN9. THE CHIEF JUSTICE complains that our prior decisions have "never drawn a distinction" like the one we now draw, citing in particular Mattox v. United States, 156 U.S. 237, 15 S.Ct. 337, 39 L.Ed. 409 (1895), Kirby v. United States, 174 U.S. 47, 19 S.Ct. 574, 43 L.Ed. 890 (1899), and United States v. Burr, 25 F.Cas. 187 (No. 14,694) (CC Va. 1807) (Marshall, C. J.). Post, at 4-6. But nothing in these cases contradicts our holding in any way. Mattox and Kirby allowed or excluded evidence depending on whether the defendant had had an opportunity for cross-examination. Mattox, supra, at 242-244, 15 S.Ct. 337; Kirby, supra, at 55-61, 19 S.Ct. 574. That the two cases did not extrapolate a more general class of evidence to which that criterion applied does not prevent us from doing so now. As to Burr, we disagree with THE CHIEF JUSTICE's reading of the case. Although Chief Justice Marshall made one passing reference to the Confrontation Clause, the case was fundamentally about the hearsay rules governing statements in furtherance of a conspiracy. The "principle so truly important" on which "inroad[s]" had been introduced was the "rule of evidence which rejects mere hearsay testimony." See 25 F.Cas., at 193. Nothing in the opinion concedes exceptions to the Confrontation Clause's exclusion of testimonial statements as we use the term. THE CHIEF JUSTICE fails to identify a single case (aside from one minor, arguable exception, see supra, at 1368, n. 8), where we have admitted testimonial statements based on indicia of reliability other than a prior opportunity for cross-examination. If nothing else, the test we announce is an empirically accurate explanation of the results our cases have reached.

Finally, we reiterate that, when the declarant appears for cross-examination at trial, the Confrontation Clause places no constraints at all on the use of his prior testimonial statements. See California v. Green, 399 U.S. 149, 162, 90 S.Ct. 1930, 26 L.Ed.2d 489 (1970). It is therefore irrelevant that the reliability of some out-of-court statements " 'cannot be replicated, even if the declarant testifies to the same matters in court.' " Post, at 1377 (quoting United States v. Inadi, 475 U.S. 387, 395, 106 S.Ct. 1121, 89 L.Ed.2d 390 (1986)). The Clause does not bar admission of a statement so long as the declarant is present at trial to defend or explain it. (The Clause also does not bar the use of testimonial statements for purposes other than establishing the truth of the matter asserted. See Tennessee v. Street, 471 U.S. 409, 414, 105 S.Ct. 2078, 85 L.Ed.2d 425 (1985).)

FN10. We acknowledge THE CHIEF JUSTICE's objection, post, at 1378, that our refusal to articulate a comprehensive definition in this case will cause interim uncertainty. But it can hardly be any worse than the status quo. See supra, at 1371-1372, and cases cited. The difference is that the Roberts test is inherently, and therefore permanently, unpredictable.

Chief Justice REHNQUIST, with whom Justice O'CONNOR joins, concurring in the judgment.

I dissent from the Court's decision to overrule Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56, 100 S.Ct. 2531, 65 L.Ed.2d 597 (1980). I believe that the Court's adoption of a new interpretation of the Confrontation Clause is not backed by sufficiently persuasive reasoning to overrule long-established precedent. Its decision casts a mantle of uncertainty over future criminal trials in both federal and state courts, and is by no means necessary to decide the present case.

The Court's distinction between testimonial and nontestimonial statements, contrary to its claim, is no better rooted in history than our current doctrine. Under the common law, although the courts were far from consistent, out-of-court statements made by someone other than the accused and not taken under oath, unlike ex parte depositions or affidavits, were generally not considered substantive evidence upon which a conviction could be based. FN1 See, e.g., King v. Brasier, 1 Leach 199, 200, 168 Eng. Rep. 202 (K.B.1779); see also J. Langbein, Origins of Adversary Criminal Trial 235-242 (2003); G. Gilbert, Evidence 152 (3d ed. 1769). FN2 TESTIMONIAL STATEments such as accusatory statements to police officers likely would have been disapproved of in the 18th century, not necessarily because they resembled*ex parte* affidavits or depositions as the Court reasons, but more likely than not because they were not made under oath. FN3 SEE KING V. woodcock, 1 Leach 500, 503, 168 eng. rep. 352, 353 (1789) (noting that a statement taken by a justice of the peace may not be admitted into evidence unless taken under oath). Without an oath, one usually did not get to the second step of whether confrontation was required.

Thus, while I agree that the Framers were mainly concerned about sworn affidavits and depositions, it does not follow that they were similarly concerned about the Court's broader category of testimonial statements. See 1 N. Webster, An American Dictionary of the English Language (1828) (defining "Testimony" as "[a] solemn declaration or affirmation made for the purpose of establishing or proving some fact. Such affirmation in judicial proceedings, may be verbal or written, but must be under oath " (emphasis added)). As far as I can tell, unsworn testimonial statements were treated no differently at common law than were nontestimonial statements, and it seems to me any classification of statements as testimonial beyond that of sworn affidavits and depositions will be somewhat arbitrary, merely a proxy for what the Framers might have intended had such evidence been liberally admitted as substantive evidence like it is today. FN4

I therefore see no reason why the distinction the Court draws is preferable to our precedent. Starting with Chief Justice Marshall's interpretation as a Circuit Justice in 1807, 16 years after the ratification of the Sixth Amendment, United States v. Burr, 25 F.Cas. 187, 193 (No. 14,694) (CC Va. 1807), continuing with our cases in the late 19th century, Mattox v. United States, 156 U.S. 237, 243-244, 15 S.Ct. 337, 39 L.Ed. 409 (1895); Kirby v. United States, 174 U.S. 47, 54-57, 19 S.Ct. 574, 43 L.Ed. 890 (1899), and through today, e.g., White v. Illinois, 502 U.S. 346, 352-353, 112 S.Ct. 736, 116 L.Ed.2d 848 (1992), we have never drawn a distinction between testimonial and nontestimonial statements. And for that matter, neither has any other court of which I am aware. I see little value in trading our precedent for an imprecise approximation at this late date.

I am also not convinced that the Confrontation Clause categorically requires the exclusion of testimonial statements. Although many States had their own Confrontation Clauses, they were of recent vintage and were not interpreted with any regularity before 1791. State cases that recently followed the ratification of the Sixth Amendment were not uniform; the Court itself cites state cases from the early 19th century that took a more stringent view of the right to confrontation than does the Court, prohibiting former testimony even if the witness was subjected to cross-examination. See ante, at 1363 (citing Finn v. Commonwealth, 26 Va. 701, 708 (1827); State v. Atkins, 1 Tenn. 229 (Super. L. & Eq. 1807) (per curiam)).

Nor was the English law at the time of the framing entirely consistent in its treatment of testimonial evidence. Generally ex parte affidavits and depositions were excluded as the Court notes, but even that proposition was not universal. See King v. Eriswell, 3 T.R. 707, 100 Eng. Rep. 815 (K.B.1790) (affirming by an equally divided court the admission of an ex parte examination because the declarant was unavailable to testify); King v. Westbeer, 1 Leach 12, 13, 168 Eng. Rep. 108, 109 (1739) (noting the admission of an ex parte affidavit); see also 1 M. Hale, Pleas of the Crown 585-586 (1736) (noting that statements of “accusers and witnesses” which were taken under oath could be admitted into evidence if the declarant was “dead or not able to travel”). Wigmore notes that sworn examinations of witnesses before justices of the peace in certain cases would not have been excluded until the end of the 1700's, 5 Wigmore § 1364, at 26-27, and sworn statements of witnesses before coroners became excluded only by statute in the 1800's, see ibid.; id., § 1374, at 59. With respect to unsworn testimonial statements, there is no indication that once the hearsay rule was developed courts ever excluded these statements if they otherwise fell within a firmly rooted exception. See, e.g., Eriswell, supra, at 715-719 (Buller, J.), 720 (Ashhurst, J.), 100 Eng. Rep., at 819-822 (concluding that an ex parte examination was admissible as an exception to the hearsay rule because it was a declaration by a party of his state and condition). Dying declarations are one example. See, e.g., Woodcock, supra, at 502-504, 168 Eng. Rep., at 353-354; King v. Reason, 16 How. St. Tr. 1, 22-23 (K.B.1722).

Between 1700 and 1800 the rules regarding the admissibility of out-of-court statements were still being developed. See n. 1, supra. There were always exceptions to the general rule of exclusion, and it is not clear to me that the Framers categorically wanted to eliminate further ones. It is one thing to trace the right of confrontation back to the Roman Empire; it is quite another to conclude that such a right absolutely excludes a large category of evidence. It is an odd conclusion indeed to think that the Framers created a cut-and-dried rule with respect to the admissibility of testimonial statements when the law during their own time was not fully settled.

To find exceptions to exclusion under the Clause is not to denigrate it as the Court suggests. Chief Justice Marshall stated of the Confrontation Clause: "I know of no principle in the preservation of which all are more concerned. I know none, by undermining which, life, liberty and property, might be more endangered. It is therefore incumbent on courts to be watchful of every inroad on a principle so truly important." Burr, 25 F.Cas., at 193. Yet, he recognized that such a right was not absolute, acknowledging that exceptions to the exclusionary component of the hearsay rule, which he considered as an "inroad" on the right to confrontation, had been introduced. See ibid.

Exceptions to confrontation have always been derived from the experience that some out-of-court statements are just as reliable as cross-examined in-court testimony due to the circumstances under which they were made. We have recognized, for example, that co-conspirator statements simply "cannot be replicated, even if the declarant testifies to the same matters in court." United States v. Inadi, 475 U.S. 387, 395, 106 S.Ct. 1121, 89 L.Ed.2d 390 (1986). Because the statements are made while the declarant and the accused are partners in an illegal enterprise, the statements are unlikely to be false and their admission "actually furthers the 'Confrontation Clause's very mission' which is to 'advance the accuracy of the truth-determining process in criminal trials.' " Id., at 396, 106 S.Ct. 1121 (quoting Tennessee v. Street, 471 U.S. 409, 415, 105 S.Ct. 2078, 85 L.Ed.2d 425 (1985) (some internal quotation marks omitted)). Similar reasons justify the introduction of spontaneous declarations, see White, 502 U.S., at 356, 112 S.Ct. 736, statements made in the course of procuring medical services, see ibid., dying declarations, see Kirby, supra, at 61, 19 S.Ct. 574, and countless other hearsay exceptions. That a statement might be testimonial does nothing to undermine the wisdom of one of these exceptions.

Indeed, cross-examination is a tool used to flesh out the truth, not an empty procedure. See Kentucky v. Stincer, 482 U.S. 730, 737, 107 S.Ct. 2658, 96 L.Ed.2d 631 (1987) ("The right to cross-examination, protected by the Confrontation Clause, thus is essentially a 'functional' right designed to promote reliability in the truth-finding functions of a criminal trial"); see also Maryland v. Craig, 497 U.S. 836, 845, 110 S.Ct. 3157, 111 L.Ed.2d 666 (1990) ("The central concern of the Confrontation Clause is to ensure the reliability of the evidence against a criminal defendant by subjecting it to rigorous testing in the context of an adversary proceeding before the trier of fact"). "[I]n a given instance [cross- examination may] be superfluous; it may be sufficiently clear, in that instance, that the statement offered is free enough from the risk of inaccuracy and untrustworthiness, so that the test of cross-examination would be a work of supererogation." 5 Wigmore § 1420, at 251. In such a case, as we noted over 100 years ago, "The law in its wisdom declares that the rights of the public shall not be wholly sacrificed in order that an incidental benefit may be preserved to the accused." Mattox, 156 U.S., at 243, 15 S.Ct. 337; see also Salinger v. United States, 272 U.S. 542, 548, 47 S.Ct. 173, 71 L.Ed. 398 (1926). By creating an immutable category of excluded evidence, the Court adds little to a trial's truth-finding function and ignores this longstanding guidance.

In choosing the path it does, the Court of course overrules Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56, 100 S.Ct. 2531, 65 L.Ed.2d 597 (1980), a case decided nearly a quarter of a century ago. Stare decisis is not an inexorable command in the area of constitutional law, see Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U.S. 808, 828, 111 S.Ct. 2597, 115 L.Ed.2d 720 (1991), but by and large, it "is the preferred course because it promotes the evenhanded, predictable, and consistent development of legal principles, fosters reliance on judicial decisions, and contributes to the actual and perceived integrity of the judicial process," id., at 827, 111 S.Ct. 2597. And in making this appraisal, doubt that the new rule is indeed the "right" one should surely be weighed in the balance. Though there are no vested interests involved, unresolved questions for the future of everyday criminal trials throughout the country surely counsel the same sort of caution. The Court grandly declares that "[w]e leave for another day any effort to spell out a comprehensive definition of 'testimonial,' " ante, at 1374. But the thousands of federal prosecutors and the tens of thousands of state prosecutors need answers as to what beyond the specific kinds of "testimony" the Court lists, see ibid., is covered by the new rule. They need them now, not months or years from now. Rules of criminal evidence are applied every day in courts throughout the country, and parties should not be left in the dark in this manner.

To its credit, the Court's analysis of "testimony" excludes at least some hearsay exceptions, such as business records and official records. See ante, at 1367. To hold otherwise would require numerous additional witnesses without any apparent gain in the truth-seeking process. Likewise to the Court's credit is its implicit recognition that the mistaken application of its new rule by courts which guess wrong as to the scope of the rule is subject to harmless-error analysis. See ante, at 1359, n. 1.

But these are palliatives to what I believe is a mistaken change of course. It is a change of course not in the least necessary to reverse the judgment of the Supreme Court of Washington in this case. The result the Court reaches follows inexorably from Roberts and its progeny without any need for overruling that line of cases. In Idaho v. Wright, 497 U.S. 805, 820-824, 110 S.Ct. 3139, 111 L.Ed.2d 638 (1990), we held that an out-of-court statement was not admissible simply because the truthfulness of that statement was corroborated by other evidence at trial. As the Court notes, ante, at 1373, the Supreme Court of Washington gave decisive weight to the "interlocking nature of the two statements." No re-weighing of the "reliability factors," which is hypothesized by the Court, ibid.,, is required to reverse the judgment here. A citation to Idaho v. Wright, supra, would suffice. For the reasons stated, I believe that this would be a far preferable course for the Court to take here.

FN1. Modern scholars have concluded that at the time of the founding the law had yet to fully develop the exclusionary component of the hearsay rule and its attendant exceptions, and thus hearsay was still often heard by the jury. See Gallanis, The Rise of Modern Evidence Law, 84 Iowa L.Rev. 499, 534-535 (1999); Mosteller, Remaking Confrontation Clause and Hearsay Doctrine Under the Challenge of Child Sexual Abuse Prosecutions, 1993 U. Ill. L.Rev. 691, 738-746. In many cases, hearsay alone was generally not considered sufficient to support a conviction; rather, it was used to corroborate sworn witness testimony. See 5 J. Wigmore, Evidence § 1364, pp. 17, 19-20, 19, n. 33 (J. Chadbourn rev.1974) (hereinafter Wigmore) (noting in the 1600's and early 1700's testimonial and nontestimonial hearsay was permissible to corroborate direct testimony); see also J. Langbein, Origins of Adversary Criminal Trial 238-239 (2003). Even when unsworn hearsay was proffered as substantive evidence, however, because of the predominance of the oath in society, juries were largely skeptical of it. See Landsman, Rise of the Contentious Spirit: Adversary Procedure in Eighteenth Century England, 75 Cornell L.Rev. 497, 506 (1990) (describing late 17th-century sentiments); Langbein, Criminal Trial before the Lawyers, 45 U. Chi. L.Rev. 263, 291-293 (1978). In the 18th century, unsworn hearsay was simply held to be of much lesser value than were sworn affidavits or depositions.

FN2. Gilbert's noted in 1769:
"Hearsay is no Evidence ... though a Person Testify what he hath heard upon Oath, yet the Person who spake it was not upon Oath; and if a Man had been in Court and said the same Thing and had not sworn it, he had not been believed in a Court of Justice; for all Credit being derived from Attestation and Evidence, it can rise no higher than the Fountain from whence it flows, and if the first Speech was without Oath, an Oath that there was such a Speech makes it no more than a bare speaking, and so of no Value in a Court of Justice, where all Things were determined under the Solemnities of an Oath ....”

FN3. Confessions not taken under oath were admissible against a confessor because “ ‘the most obvious Principles of Justice, Policy, and Humanity’ ” prohibited an accused from attesting to his statements. 1 G. Gilbert, Evidence 216 (C. Lofft ed. 1791). Still, these unsworn confessions were considered evidence only against the confessor as the Court points out, see ante, at 1365, and in cases of treason, were insufficient to support even the conviction of the confessor, 2 W. Hawkins, Pleas of the Crown, ch. 46, § 4, p. 604, n. 3 (T. Leach 6th ed. 1787).

FN4. The fact that the prosecution introduced an unsworn examination in 1603 at Sir Walter Raleigh's trial, as the Court notes, see ante, at 1365, says little about the Court's distinction between testimonial and nontestimonial statements. Our precedent indicates that unsworn testimonial statements, as do some nontestimonial statements, raise confrontation concerns once admitted into evidence, see, e.g., Lilly v. Virginia, 527 U.S. 116, 119 S.Ct. 1887, 144 L.Ed.2d 117 (1999); Lee v. Illinois, 476 U.S. 530, 106 S.Ct. 2056, 90 L.Ed.2d 514 (1986), and I do not contend otherwise. My point is not that the Confrontation Clause does not reach these statements, but rather that it is far from clear that courts in the late 18th century would have treated unsworn statements, even testimonial ones, the same as sworn statements.

JUSTICE SCOTT delivered the Opinion of the Court.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. The provisions of West Virginia Code § 48A-4-17 (1999) are clear in their intent. Failure to comply with the ten-day period for filing exceptions to a recommended order of a family law master, barring a timely filing of and approval of one ten-day extension period, is fatal with regard to preserving those exceptions for appeal.

2. "In reviewing the findings of fact and conclusions of law of a circuit court supporting a civil contempt order, we apply a three-pronged standard of review. We review the contempt order under an abuse of discretion standard; the underlying factual findings are reviewed under a clearly erroneous standard; and questions of law and statutory interpretations are subject to a de novo review." Syl. Pt. 1, Carter v. Carter, 196 W.Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996).

3. "Where the purpose to be served by imposing a sanction for contempt is to compel compliance with a court order by the contemner [sic] so as to benefit the party bringing the contempt action by enforcing, protecting, or assuring the right of that party under the order, the contempt is civil. Syl. Pt. 2, State ex rel. Robinson v. Michael, 166 W.Va. 660, 276 S.E.2d 812 (1981).

4. "Although Rules 11, 16, and 37 of the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure do not formally require any particular procedure, before issuing a sanction, a court must ensure it has an adequate foundation either pursuant to the rules or by virtue of its inherent powers to exercise its authority. The Due Process Clause of Section 10 of Article III of the West Virginia Constitution requires that there exist a relationship between the sanctioned party's misconduct and the matters in controversy such that the transgression threatens to interfere with the rightful decision of the case. Thu a court must ensure any sanction imposed is fashioned to address the identified harm caused by the party's misconduct." Syl. Pt. 1, Bartles v. Hinkle, 196 W.Va. 381, 472 S.E.2d 827 (1996).

5. "In formulating the appropriate sanction, a court shall be guided by equitable principles. Initially, the court must identify the alleged wrongful conduct and determine if it warrants a sanction. The court must explain its reasons clearly on the record if it decides a sanction is appropriate To determine what will constitute an appropriate sanction, the court may consider the seriousness of th conduct, the impact the conduct had in the case and in the administration of justice, any mitigating circumstances, and whether the conduct was an isolated occurrence or was a pattern of wrongdoing throughout the case." Syl. Pt. 2, Bartles v. Hinkle, 196 W.Va. 381, 472 S.E.2d 827 (1996).

6. Before imposing sanctions for filing frivolous pleadings and advancing frivolous arguments, a trial court must give the alleged contemnor notice and an opportunity to be heard on the questions of frivolousness, appropriate sanctions, and, if an award of attorney's fees is to be made, on the necessity and reasonableness of such fees. At the conclusion of such hearing, the trial court must make sufficient findings of fact and conclusions of law to enable the appellate court to conduct a meaningful review.

7. A modification of child custody, without notice and hearing, cannot be ordered to result concurrently with a prospective instance of forbidden conduct.

Scott, Justice:

This consolidated case presents issues surrounding three orders entered by the Circuit Court of Monroe County[1] in connection with Appellant Dorothy Kyle Czaja's (now Wright's) attempt to modify the original grant of unsupervised visitation to Appellee Mark Czaja. In case number 27316

[1]Judge Irons was the presiding judge in this case until Appellant filed a motion seeking his disqualification. This Court appointed Judge Kirkpatrick by order dated April 5, 1999, after Judge Irons voluntarily recused himself in response to the disqualification motion.

Appellant seeks a reversal of an order entered by Judge Irons on March 3, 1999, through which Appellant and her counsel were found to be in contempt of court for failure to obey the lower court's orders concerning visitation. Through case number 27317, Appellant seeks a reversal of an order entered by Judge Irons on February 9, 1999, denying Appellant's exceptions to the November 23, 1998, Recommended Order of the family law master concerning Appellant's motion to restrict Appellee to supervised visitation. In the third case, number 27318, Appellant seeks a reversal of an order entered by Judge Kirkpatrick on June 17, 1999, through which the circuit court found Appellant in contempt for failure to comply with court-ordered visitation; denied Appellant's Rule 59(a) New Trial motion pertaining to the March 3, 1999, ruling of Judge Irons; and denied Appellant's Rule 60(b)(1) and (b) (6) Motions for Relief from Judgment as to the visitation directives set forth in the February 9, 1999, order. After considering the arguments raised in conjunction with the submitted record in this matter, we affirm, in part, and reverse, in part, and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

I. Factual and Procedural Background

As a limited factual background to this highly-charged and heavily-litigated domestic case, the parties were married on November 25, 1988. During the course of their marriage, two children were born: Julianna, on August 29, 1989, and Mark, on July 25, 1991. Following their separation on August 12, 1993, divorce proceedings were initiated and a final order of divorce was entered on December 12, 1996.[2] Pursuant to the final order, Appellant was awarded custody of the two minor children and Appellee was granted visitation that comprised alternating weekends and holidays, as well as two separate three-week periods in the summer.

Beginning with the filing of Appellant's petition to modify visitation[3] on April 2, 1997, the issue of Appellee's entitlement to his original grant of unsupervised visitation rights has been the subject of continuous litigation. When the circuit court denied her motion to modify visitation rights,[4] Appellant refused to permit Appellee to exercise his visitation rights scheduled for August 3, 1997, to August 24, 1997. Appellee filed a motion for contempt, and during the course of the September 2, 1997, contempt hearing, Appellant alleged, for the first time,[5] that Appellee had improperly touched his seven-year-old daughter in June of 1997.[6] Based on this allegation, Judge Irons referred the matter to

[2]On July 29, 1997, this Court refused Appellant's petition for appeal from the final order of divorce. Judge Irons observed in his February 9, 1999, order that many of the same allegations that Appellant asserts in support of her motion to modify visitation were raised previously in her petition for appeal from the final divorce order.

[3]As grounds for the petition to modify, Appellant cited a December 13, 1994, hearing during the divorce proceedings wherein she raised allegations concerning Appellee's personal behavior and his ability to properly care for the parties' children. As an additional ground, Appellant referenced her testimony at that same hearing concerning Appellee's relationship with a fifteen-year-old female student in 1986, while Appellee was employed by the Monroe County school system, and more than two years before the parties' marriage.

[4]The motion was denied by order dated July 9, 1997.

[5]In its September 11, 1997, order, the circuit court states that Appellant did not report this incident to Child Protective Services and did not include this allegation as part of her pleadings.

[6]Appellant alleged that Appellee had fondled Julianna's breast.

Child Protective Services ("CPS") for an investigation[7] and the court directed, by order dated November 6, 1997, that Appellee would have unsupervised daytime visitation pending the outcome of the CPS investigation. On January 20, 1998, CPS submitted a one-paragraph report to Judge Irons, in which caseworker Stephanie Lester states that she "was unable to substantiate abuse to the children by" Appellee. Ms. Lester did, however, recommend supervised visitation; this recommendation was based solely on the "risk of maltreatment" due to Appellee's sexual relationship with a minor student in 1986. See supra note 3.

Following the issuance of the CPS report, Appellant again refused to permit Appellee to exercise his visitation rights with his children in February 1998.[8] By order dated February 11, 1998, Judge Irons referred these visitation issues to Family Law Master Wiley. Following four days of hearings in October 1998, FLM Wiley issued his Recommended Order on November 23, 1998, in which he recommended that Appellant's motion for supervised visitation be denied based on his conclusion that no credible evidence of sexual abuse had been established. He further recommended that Appellee be permitted to have a certain amount of makeup visitation to offset the visitation Appellant had denied him.[9] We observe that during the pendency of the referral to the FLM and the

[7]See W.Va. Code § 49-6A-1 to -10 (1999).

[8]In a motion to suspend unsupervised visitation, filed January 30, 1998, Appellant stated that she "has respectfully suspended visitation and . . . cannot in consideration of the safety and best interests of her children allow further unsupervised visitation . . . ."

[9]The FLM concluded that Appellee had been denied 69 days of visitation as a result of Appellant's obstructive efforts.

issuance of a decision, Appellee had no visitation with his children.[10] Not until an order was entered o December 21, 1998, directing supervised visitation[11] did Appellee gain the right to see his children following the circuit court's suspension of unsupervised visitation in February 1998.[12]

The circuit court, by order entered February 9, 1999, denied[13] Appellant's exceptions to the FLM's recommendations and directed that Appellee's previous grant of unsupervised visitation should be restored.[14] Notwithstanding the court's order, Appellant refused to deliver the children at the designated place on three successive Friday evenings--February 12, 19, and 26, 1999--which forced Appellee to file another contempt motion.[15] At the March 1, 1999, hearing on Appellee's motion, the

[10]This Court is both troubled and perplexed that such a lengthy period of time passed --almost eleven months--during which no visitation took place between Appellee and his children. Since Appellant only asked for the cessation of unsupervised visitation through her January 30, 1998, motion, we must question why no efforts were taken on the part of Appellee or the lower court to instigate supervised visitation at a time earlier than December 21, 1998.

[11]The supervised visitation was to take place at the Family Refuge Center in Lewisburg, West Virginia, pending further order of the circuit court.

[12]The lower court's decision to require supervised visitation in December 1998 appears to have been prompted by the lower court's outstanding consideration of Appellant's exceptions to the recommended decision of the FLM and the consequent lack of finality with regard to the FLM decision. The order reflects that Appellant did not object to supervised visitation.

[13]Despite the lower court's considered opinion that the exceptions were waived due to their untimely filing, the circuit court did in fact consider and deny the exceptions in conjunction with its decision that the FLM's Recommended Order should be nonetheless reviewed due to the serious nature of the allegations raised by Appellant.

[14]In this same order, the lower court also approved the makeup visitation specified by the FLM.

[15]The verified petition for contempt was filed with the lower court on February 16, 1999.

lower court found both Appellant and her counsel to be in contempt of court orders concerning visitation and required Appellant's counsel to pay opposing counsel's fees.[16]

On June 14, 1999, Judge Kirkpatrick[17] heard argument in conjunction with Appellant's post-ruling motions, through which she sought a reversal of the March 3, 1999, contempt order and relief from the visitation requirements set forth in the February 9, 1999, order. After considering the evidence presented, the circuit court denied Appellant's Rule 59 and Rule 60 motions and granted Appellee's March 8, 1999, separate motion for contempt for Appellant's failure to comply with the visitation directives set out in multiple orders.[18] As part of its June 17, 1999, order reflecting these rulings, the lower court outlined a mechanism which expressly authorizes the sheriff, following a contemplated court hearing, to take physical custody of the parties' children for the purpose of transporting same to Appellee in the event that Appellant prospectively decides to deny visitation right to Appellee.

[16]The March 3, 1999, order directs that Appellant's counsel, and not Appellant, is responsible for paying $3,052.50 to Susan Hewman and $3,000 to R. Brandon Johnson. These fees represent those amounts incurred by Appellee during the period of February 9, 1999, through March 1, 1999.

[17]See supra note 1.

[18]Those orders from which Appellee sought findings of contempt were entered respectively on February 9, 1999; February 26, 1999; and March 3, 1999.

It is from these orders of February 9, 1999, March 3, 1999, and June 17, 1999, that Appellant brings this consolidated appeal. Each appeal will be separately discussed in chronological fashion with reference to the entry date of the respective order from which the appeal is taken.

II. Discussion

A. Appeal No. 27317--February 9, 1999, Order

The circuit court's order which is the subject of this appeal concerns the lower court's review of and adoption of the findings and recommendations of FLM Wiley. Appellee argues that Appellant failed to timely file her exceptions to the FLM's Recommended Order and has thereby failed to preserve her exceptions for appeal purposes. We agree.

The statutory provision which governs the filing of exceptions to decisions of family law masters is West Virginia Code § 48A-4-17 (1999). That section provides that: "Failure to timely file the petition [of exceptions to the FLM's recommended order] shall constitute a waiver of exceptions, unless the petitioner, prior to the expiration of the ten-day period, moves for and is granted an extensio of time from the circuit court."[19] Id. (emphasis supplied). In its February 9, 1999, order, the circuit court ruled that:

[19]Rule 22 of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Law provides, in pertinent part, that: "The ten-day period for filing a petition for review under chapter 48A, article 4, section 17 of the Code . . . shall commence on the date on which the parties are served with the notice and recommended order . . . ."

> The recommended decision was served on the Plaintiff by mail on November 23, and the Plaintiff had until December 7, 1998 to file exceptions to this decision. Plaintiff subsequently filed a notice of extension of time to file exceptions, thereby extending the time for the filing of exceptions to December 17, 1998. Plaintiff did not actually file her exceptions until December 28, 1998.

Appellant maintains that the lower court was in error with regard to its ruling that her exceptions were untimely filed. She contends that the original date from which the ten-day period for filing extensions typically would be calculated--November 23, 1998, in this case--was not the proper date. Arguing that the FLM erred in not initially sending a copy of his recommended order to the guardian ad litem, Appellant notes that the FLM's decision was re-served on the parties and the guardian ad litem on December 3, 1998, by notice of that date with an indication that December 17, 1998, was the deadline for filing exceptions. Since Appellant filed and received a ten-day extension fo filing her exceptions, she contends that her pleading was not due to be filed until December 27, ten day after the December 17, 1998, deadline contained in the second notice issued by the FLM. We find several flaws in Appellant's self-serving deadline fashioning.

First and foremost, both of the named parties to this action were served with the notice and recommended order on November 23, 1998. While the original notice was not made a part of the record, there are numerous other pleadings submitted which indicate that the filing date for the exceptions pursuant to the first notice was December 7, 1998.[20] On the date those exceptions were due--December 7, 1998-- Appellant filed notice of her request for a ten-day extension, as permitted under West Virginia Code § 48A-4-17 and Rule 23 of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Law. In the December 7, 1998, order granting Appellant's ten-day extension, the lower court expressly deleted[21] language which had specified that Appellant had "until December, 27, 1998" to file her exceptions. Given the circuit court's actions in striking the date she supplied for filing exceptions, we reject Appellant's argument that she had until December 27, 1998, to file those exceptions. The circuit court clearly granted Appellant one additional ten-day period to file her exceptions and that period commenced on December 7, 1998, and ended on December 17, 1998.[22]

The oversight on the part of the FLM in sending a copy of his recommended order to the guardian ad litem simply cannot be used offensively by Appellant[23] to expand the statutorily-

[20]Appellant herself refers to this date as being the "original due date" in her petition for review of and statement of exceptions to the FLM's recommended order, which she filed on December 28, 1998.

[22]In her attempt to use the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Law to her advantage, Appellant has overlooked Rule 23 which sets forth that "[o]nly one ten-day extension may be granted." Appellant sought and obtained that one ten-day extension which began on December 7, 1998.

[23]Appellant's counsel was the party who sought to have the recommended order re-noticed to "cure" the alleged "defect in service." Even this re-noticing appears to be tactically motivated. In her notice seeking an extension of time for the filing of her exceptions, Appellant inserted a footnote stating that: "Notice of Recommended Order originally issued November 23, 1998, and reissued on December 3, 1998, to cure defect in service." Not only do we disagree with Appellant's characterization of the failure to serve the guardian ad litem as a "defect in service," but we question Appellant's designation of the guardian ad litem as a party within the meaning of Rule 21(c) of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for provided period for filing her exceptions. Moreover, since both the named parties were timely and properly served with both notice and the recommended decision on November 23, 1998, there is no reason for suggesting that Appellant should be permitted to benefit by a later deadline that should have attached only to the guardian ad litem in the event he would have desired to file exceptions to the recommended decision of the FLM.[24] Upon our review of the record, this Court is left with a palpable sense that Appellant's counsel was trying to "buy" time in any fashion possible for filing Appellant's exceptions.[25]

The provisions of West Virginia Code § 48A-4-17 are clear in their intent. Failure to comply with the ten-day period for filing exceptions to a recommended order of a family law master, barring a timely filing of and approval of one ten-day extension period, is fatal with regard to preservin those exceptions for appeal. See W.Va.R.Prac.&Proc.Fam.Law 23. The record in this case demonstrates that the lower court, in striking Appellant's attempt to further lengthen her exception-filir

Family Law. That rule requires that the recommended order "shall be served on all parties who have appeared or on their attorneys of record." Certainly, the guardian ad litem should be served with a copy of the recommended order, both as a matter of professional courtesy and to permit zealous advocacy where appropriate, but the guardian ad litem's participatory role appears to be more as an advocate rather than as a party. See In re Scottie D., 185 W.Va. 191, 198, 406 S.E.2d 214, 221 (1991).

[24]No exceptions were filed by the guardian ad litem.

[25]Given the great length to which counsel discusses all the deadlines as part of Appellant's exceptions to the Recommended Order, it appears that counsel was acutely aware of and concerned about having missed the deadline for timely filing Appellant's exceptions. Complaining about how difficult it was to get the exceptions filed during the holiday season, Appellant's counsel states that he had to "sacrific[e] his Christmas holiday" in order to complete the exceptions, but then instructs: "This recitation is not intended to elicit sympathy for counsel."

period from the language of the December 7, 1998, order, clearly announced its position that the extension granted was not, as Appellant advocates, until December 27, 1998, but was instead, until December 17, 1998. Since Appellant admits that she did not file her exceptions until December 28, 1998, her exceptions were indisputably filed outside the statutorily-established time frame for preserving those exceptions for appeal. See W.Va. Code § 48A-4-17.

Just as we are unpersuaded that Appellant timely filed her exceptions, we are similarly unconvinced by Appellant's argument that the lower court's consideration of Appellant's exceptions amounted to a waiver of the statutory proscription set forth in West Virginia Code § 48A-4-17. The lower court made clear in its February 9, 1999, order that,

> [a]though the Plaintiff's [Appellant's] exceptions are untimely and are not entitled to any consideration by this Court, because the Plaintiff is seeking supervised visitation, under a theory that the children would [be] at risk, if the Defendant [Appellee] were allowed to have unsupervised visitation, the Court has proceeded to review the exceptions, out of an abundance of precaution, in order to determine if there is any merit to the exceptions.

The lower court could not, simply by virtue of its decision to review Appellant's exceptions "out of an abundance of precaution," have abrogated the statutory language which mandates in nondiscretionary terms that a "[f]ailure to timely file the petition shall constitute a waiver of exceptions." W.Va. Code § 48A-4-17 (emphasis supplied). Judge Irons made clear that his decision to review the exceptions was prompted by concern that the serious nature of the allegations warranted the court's scrutiny notwithstanding Appellant's failure to properly preserve those exceptions for appellate purposes.

In an arguably analogous case, this Court upheld a lower court's review of a FLM's recommended decision where no exceptions had been filed and the parties had thus waived their right to file exceptions. In John D.K. v. Polly A.S.,190 W.Va. 254, 438 S.E.2d 46 (1993), this Court construed the statutory predecessor to West Virginia Code § 48A-4-17,[26] which contained the same mandatory language concerning waiver of exceptions, and determined that the lower court could review the evidence underlying a FLM's order despite the parties' statutory waiver of their right to file exceptions. See 190 W.Va. at 258, 438 S.E.2d at 50. Just as the circuit court felt compelled to engage in a review[27] in John D.K. despite the absence of filed exceptions, Judge Irons similarly conducted his review of Appellant's evidence out of a sense of judicial obligation. In the instant case, the circuit court, like the FLM, found no credible evidence of sexual abuse which would have warranted supervised visitation.[28] The lower court's consideration of the exceptions, and its denial of [27]The court in John D.K. actually went a step further and conducted an evidentiary proceeding. See 190 W.Va. at 257, 438 S.E.2d at 49.

[28]This Court set forth the standard which must be met before supervised visitation is required in syllabus point two of Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W.Va. 341, 438 S.E.2d 521 (1992):

> Prior to ordering supervised visitation pursuant to W.Va. Code, 48-2-15(b)(1) [1991], if there is an allegation involving whether one of the parents sexually abused the child involved, a family law master or circuit court must make a finding with respect to whether that parent sexually abused the child. A finding that sexual abuse has occurred must be supported by credible evidence. The family law master or circuit court may condition such supervised visitation upon the offending parent seeking treatment. Prior to ordering supervised visitation, the family law master or circuit court should weigh the risk of harm of such visitation or the deprivation of any visitation to the parent who allegedly committed the same, does not nullify the statutory waiver which resulted from Appellant's untimely filing of her exceptions. Based on our conclusion that Appellant failed to preserve her exceptions to the FLM's Recommended Order, we do not address the substance of those exceptions. See W.Va. Code § 48A-4-17.

> sexual abuse against the risk of harm of such visitation to the child. Furthermore, the family law master or circuit court should ascertain that the allegation of sexual abuse under these circumstances is meritorious and if made in the context of the family law proceeding, that such allegation is reported to the appropriate law enforcement agency or prosecutor for the county in which the alleged sexual abuse took place. . . .

Conducting its review under this standard, the circuit court concluded that the FLM was correct in not requiring supervised visitation since there was no credible evidence of any sexual abuse by Appellee to the children. The circuit court states in its February 9, 1999, order:

> There was no direct testimony of sexual abuse by the Defendant [Appellee], directed toward either child, other then [sic] that of the Plaintiff [Appellant]; there was no testimony from the children to the effect the Defendant had abused either child; and there was no expert testimony on this point, even though this Court had previously referred the children and the parties for a psychological evaluation. Other then [sic] the hearsay testimony of the Plaintiff, concerning the allegation of fondling, all other testimony of sexual abuse concerned events predating the separation, in 1994. This is particularly significant, in light of Plaintiff's obligation to show a change of circumstances, in order to modify an existing visitation order.

At the center of this appeal are the rulings made by Judge Irons following a March 1, 1999, hearing[29] on Appellee's contempt motion following Appellant's denial of visitation to Appellee i February 1999. Finding Appellant in contempt for her failure to abide by the provisions of three order setting forth specific visitation directives,[30] the lower court imposed a fine of $50 per day for each of thirteen days[31] of visitation denied to Appellee for a total fine of $650. Appellant raises numerous procedural challenges[32] to the lower court's contempt ruling and argues additionally that the fine imposed converted the civil contempt proceeding into a criminal matter. As we announced in syllabus

[29]At the outset of our discussion of this appeal we note that only a small portion of the March 1, 1999, hearing transcript was originally filed with this Court. Item No. 48 of the amended designation of the record corresponds to a March 16, 1999, "Notice of Filing of Portion of Transcript of March 1, 1999, Hearing" which includes only pages 21 through 40. In response to this Court's stated concern that a complete transcript had not been included as part of the designated record, Appellee submitted post oral argument a complete transcript of the March 1, 1999, hearing. In fairness to Appellant, there appears to be a discrepancy between the date of the notice listed on the amended designated record--April 10, 1999--and the date of the notice included as part of Item No. 48--March 16, 1999.

[31]Those dates of missed visitation include February 12, 13, 14, 26, 27, 28 and seven days of missed makeup visitation.

[32]One such procedural challenge which we reject out-of-hand is her contention that the lower court was without authority to enter the March 3, 1999, contempt order since Appellant's filing of a Motion for New Trial under Rule 59(a) in conjunction with the lower court's February 9, 1999, order, denying her exceptions to the FLM's Recommended Decision, invoked an automatic stay under Rule 62(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure. Appellant reasons that the visitation directives set forth in the February 9, 1999, order could not be enforced vis-a-vis the contempt order based on her filing of the new trial motion. Critically, the order from which Appellant sought a new hearing was a denial of her petition to modify visitation. The circuit court's denial of Appellant's motion to modify impliedly continued the previously-ordered visitation pursuant to the final order of divorce entered in 1996. We simply cannot sanction the offensive use of a procedural mechanism intended to postpone enforcement of a judgment in a manner unintended by the rule--to support Appellant's position that she had no obligation to comply with directives concerning visitation pending a ruling on her Rule 59(a) motion.

point one of Carter v. Carter, 196 W.Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996), the following standard governs our review of civil contempt cases:

> In reviewing the findings of fact and conclusions of law of a circuit court supporting a civil contempt order, we apply a three-pronged standard of review. We review the contempt order under an abuse of discretion standard; the underlying factual findings are reviewed under a clearly erroneous standard; and questions of law and statutory interpretations are subject to a de novo review.

Appellant contends that the circuit court lacked jurisdiction to enter a contempt ruling based on her allegation that she was served with a copy of the order to show cause setting a time for the hearing, but not an accompanying petition for contempt. She also asserts a notice problem with regard to the fact that she was not informed that the circuit court would consider evidence as to any visitation denials other than that which was denied on February 12, 1999, or any court orders other than the one entered on February 9, 1999. Like Judge Kirkpatrick, who reviewed these same issues in conjunction with Appellant's post-ruling motions, we agree that the essence of Appellant's procedural challenge to the contempt ruling is notice-based, rather than jurisdictional in nature. In his June 17, 1999, order, Judge Kirkpatrick ruled, when considering Appellant's motion for relief from the March 3, 1999, contempt ruling:

> The undersigned special judge observes that the issue outlined by plaintiff's counsel is actually a claimed problem relating to notice. At the present hearing of June 14, 1999, the court learned that plaintiff asserts that she was served only a copy of the Order to Show Cause, with no petition attached. Upon an examination of the court file, the court is of the opinion that the Order to Show Cause alone provided the plaintiff with significant actual knowledge of a contempt matter to be heard on March 1, 1999, so as to be generally informed of the > proceedings. Combining such factor with the additional fact that plaintiff's counsel of record admitted at the hearing of June 14 that he did receive a copy of the petition, via United States Mail, cured any defect of notice which may have existed in connection with the March 1, 1999 hearing. The transcript of record clearly indicates that neither the plaintiff or [sic] her counsel suffered from surprise in regard to the visitation issues raised at this hearing. (emphasis supplied)

Just as Judge Kirkpatrick was convinced that Appellant was fully-informed of the nature of the contempt proceedings, our review of the record similarly reveals no impediment to enforcement of the contempt ruling arising from any notice-based concerns.[33]

Given the interrelatedness of each of the visitation denials and the core similarity of the legal issue presented by such denials, we would be hard-pressed to find a constitutionally significant notice problem with regard to the court's consideration of each instance where visitation was denied after the entry of the February 9, 1999, order, rather than limiting its ruling to only those missed visitations that were expressly delineated on the petition for contempt.[34] Like Appellant's claims concerning the deadline for filing exceptions to the FLM's order, we find this one to be overly technica

[33]We reject outright the existence of any subject matter jurisdictional flaw in the contempt ruling. Clearly, the lower court had jurisdiction to consider the entry of a contempt ruling that emanated from a previous order which it had entered. See W.Va. Code § 48-2-22 (1999).

[34]Because the petition for contempt only included the visitation denied on February 12, 1999, Appellant argues that the lower court erred in permitting Appellee to introduce evidence concerning charges other than those originally filed against her. See Doctors Mem'l Hosp., Inc. v. Woodruff, 165 W.Va. 324, 267 S.E.2d 620 (1980). We reject this argument since the charge at issue--visitation denial--was a type of "charge" over which the lower court had continuing jurisdiction and because there is no question that Appellant was "fully and plainly informed" as to the nature of the charge that was being brought against her. Syl. Pt. 2, in part, State ex rel. Hoosier Eng'g Co. v. Thornton, 137 W.Va. 230, 72 S.E.2d 203 (1952).

and aimed solely at avoiding the effects of a deleterious ruling. Appellant's attempt to convince us tha the lower court abused its discretion in entering the contempt ruling by expanding the dates of missed visitation to encompass all those dates between the entry of the February 9, 1999, order and the March 1, 1999, hearing is unavailing. In this Court's opinion, the lower court would have been remiss were it to have limited its contempt ruling to the one date of denied visitation specified in the petition. Moreover, the lower court's arguable expansion of the scope of the contempt proceeding to include those dates where visitation denial occurred subsequent to the filing of the contempt petition was with the circuit court's "plenary power to order and enforce a noncustodial parent's visitation rights with his or her children." Syl. Pt. 2, in part, Carter, 196 W.Va. at 241, 470 S.E.2d at 195.

A circuit court's authority to enter a contempt ruling in a domestic matter is governed by the provisions of West Virginia Code § 48-2-22 (1999). Advocating a construction of the statutory provisions which would defeat the lower court's finding of contempt, Appellant argues that the lower court failed to adhere to the requirement imposed by subsection twenty-two by not first making a finding that she had a method available for purging herself of the contempt. Contrary to her contentions, subsection 22(b) is not written in terms of requiring the court to first make a finding regarding the contemnor's ability to purge herself before imposing a contempt sanction. The statute is stated in conditional terms: "[I]f the court further finds the person has the ability to purge himself of contempt, the court shall afford the contemnor a reasonable time and method whereby he may purge himself of contempt." W.Va. Code § 48-2-22(b). Thus, the statute only mandates the identification of a method and reasonable time for purging "if" the lower court determines that purging can be accomplished. Clearly, under the circumstances for which contempt was found in this case--thirteen instances of refused visitation--Appellant could not have been found by the circuit court to be capable of purging herself of those dates where visitation had already been denied.[35]

While citing no law in support of this proposition, Appellant contends that by imposing a fine Judge Irons converted the civil contempt proceeding into a criminal matter.[36] In a recent opinion addressing the use of West Virginia Code § 48-2-22 in connection with enforcement of visitation rights this Court both characterized and affirmed the entry of a contempt ruling, which included a $300 fine, as civil. See Carter, 196 W.Va. at 242-43, 470 S.E.2d at 196-97. Likewise, in State ex rel. Lambert v. Stephens, 200 W.Va. 802, 490 S.E.2d 891 (1997), this Court, in discussing the distinctions between civil and criminal contempt, stated: "Another appropriate sanction in civil contempt cases is a order requiring the contemner to pay a fine as a form of compensation or damages to the party aggrieved by the contemptuous conduct."[37] Id. at [35]This Court in State ex rel. Robinson v. Michael, 166 W.Va. 660, 276 S.E.2d 812 (1981), discussed how the absence of an ability for an individual to purge himself of contempt (such as an inability to pay an arrearage) does not convert the matter to a criminal contempt. Id. at 671-72, 276 S.E.2d at 819 n.11. We observed, citing a Florida Supreme Court decision, that an "'ability to comply' could be based on a showing that the contemner [sic] 'previously had the ability to comply but divested himself of that ability through his fault or neglect designed to frustrate the intent and purpose of the order' as well as by a showing of present ability." Id. (citing Faircloth v. Faircloth, 339 So.2d 650, 651 (Fla. 1976)).

[36]See W.Va. Code § 61-5-26 (1997) (authorizing fines as a penalty for summary criminal contempt).

[37]Because the March 3, 1999, order directs Appellee to pay her $650 fine to the court, we assume that the lower court did not intend to turn over these funds to Appellee and that therefore, the levied fine was not compensatory in nature. While the non-compensatory nature of the fine might suggest that the contempt proceeding was criminal, this distinction, upon analysis, is without significance. The quintessence of any argument which seeks to box a contempt ruling as criminal, rather than civil, is the enhanced procedural protections which attach to a criminal contempt proceeding. See Int'l Union, United Mine Workers v. Bagwell, 512 U.S. 821, 826-27 (1994) (identifying such protections as including notice of charges, assistance of counsel, right to present a defense, privilege against self-incrimination, right to proof beyond a reasonable doubt, and the right to a jury trial for "serious" criminal contempts involving imprisonment of more than six months, and holding that since "[m]ost contempt sanctions share punitive and coercive characteristics . . . the fundamental question underlying the distinction between civil and criminal contempts is what process is due for the imposition of any particular contempt sanction"). Given the reduced need for "extensive, impartial factfinding" in civil contempt proceedings, these protections are typically viewed as less critical in a civil setting. Id. at 833. Because there was a minimal factfinding role for the lower court to play in this case, as the issue of denied visitation was, for the most part, admitted, any arguable denial of the procedural protections invoked in criminal contempt proceedings is without the necessary prejudicial effect to require reversal. See United States v. United Mine Workers, 330 U.S. 258, 295 (1947).

Both scholars and courts have acknowledged that "the categories, 'civil' and 'criminal' contempt, are unstable in theory and problematic in practice." Bagwell, 512 U.S. at 845 (quoting Gompers v. Bucks Stove & Range Co., 221 U.S. 418 (1911)) (J., Ginsburg, concurring); see also Earl C. Dudley, Jr., Getting Beyond the Civil/Criminal Distinction: A New Approach to the Regulation of Indirect Contempts, 79 Va.L.Rev. 1025 (1993). The difficulty intrinsic to any attempt to neatly package contempt rulings into civil or criminal classifications stems from the fact that "[c]ivil contempt proceedings, although primarily remedial, also 'vindicat[e] . . . the court's authority'; and criminal contempt proceedings, although designed 'to vindicate the authority of the law,' may bestow 'some incidental benefit' upon the complainant, because 'such punishment tends to prevent a repetition of the disobedience.'" Bagwell, 512 U.S. at 845 (quoting Gompers, 221 U.S. at 443) (J., Ginsburg, concurring).

Admittedly, West Virginia Code § 48-2-22 does not address the imposition of fines as a sanction for a civil contempt ruling. Such authority for assessing fines in a civil contempt setting arises from the inherent authority of the court to enforce its orders. Bartles, 196 W.Va. at 389, 472 S.E.2d at 835; see also Mackler Prods, Inc. v. Cohen, 146 F.3d 126, 129 (2nd Cir. 1998) (stating that "the power of a court to punish for contempt may be 'inherent'" but noting that penalties are determined by Congress) (citing Ex Parte Robinson, 86 U.S. (19 Wall.)). We recognized in Bartles that "[t]he choice of imposition of sanctions for failing to comply with a court order lies with the trial court, and we will not lightly disturb that decision." 193 W.Va. at 389, 472 S.E.2d at 835. Moreover, in examining the provisions of West Virginia Code § 48-2-22, it is clear that the statute itself contemplates a fusing of criminal and civil contempts as subsection b permits a trial court to "treat a finding of criminal contempt as a civil contempt." W.Va. Code § 48-2-22(b).

We further recognize the arguable impotence that a circuit court has with regard to imposing an 806, 490 S.E.2d at 895 (citing Syl. Pt. 3, State ex rel. Robinson v. Michael, 166 W.Va. at 660-61, 276 S.E.2d at 813). Thus, we find the law well-settled regarding the assessment of fines as a permissible sanction for civil contempt rulings. See also United States v. United Mine Workers, 330 U.S. 258, 303-04 (1947) (discussing use of fines in civil contempt proceedings for purpose of compensating party or to coerce compliance with court order).

Appellant circuitously reasons that, because the circuit court failed to impose a sanction that included a method for purging the contempt, the civil contempt proceeding necessarily was transformed into a criminal matter. This argument fails because the determination of whether a contempt is civil or criminal is made with reference to the purpose being served by the imposition of th effective means to both sanction a contumacious party's flagrant violation of court orders regarding indiscrete issues, such as visitation directives, and, at the same time, to compel compliance with those orders. Short of incarceration, the lower court had no other means of coercing Appellant into complying with the court's directives concerning visitation. While this case does not present the opportunity for this Court to reconsider the continued viability of its decision in Hendershot v. Hendershot, 164 W.Va. 190, 263 S.E.2d 90 (1980), with regard to our ruling that jury trials are required whenever a circuit court intends to incarcerate a contemnor, we question whether that ruling comports with the reasoning of the United States Supreme Court decisions which only require jury trials where the criminal contempt can be viewed as "serious" based on the length of the incarceratory period, with "serious" being defined as involving a period of incarceration that minimally spans six months. See Bagwell, 512 U.S. at 827; Taylor v. Hayes, 418 U.S. 488, 495 (1974) (holding that "petty contempt like other petty criminal offenses may be tried without a jury and that contempt of court is a petty offense when the penalty actually imposed does not exceed six months or a longer penalty has not been expressly authorized by statute); Bloom v. State of Illinois, 391 U.S. 194, 207 (1968) (segmenting right to jury trials between those contempts which qualify as petty offenses based on nominal period of incarceration and contempts where sentence renders offense "serious," without specifying bright line rule as to what sentence length necessarily converts offense into "serious" category, and observing that "[p]rosecutions for contempt play a significant role in the proper functioning of our judicial system"). We leave that issue for another day since the lower court did not impose the penalty of incarceration in this case.

sanction rather than the nature of the sanction imposed.[38] Robinson, 166 W.Va. at 670, 276 S.E.2d at 818; accord Stephens, 200 W.Va. at 806, 490 S.E.2d at 895. In syllabus point two of Robinson this Court explained: "Where the purpose to be served by imposing a sanction for contempt is to compel compliance with a court order by the contemner [sic] so as to benefit the party bringing the contempt action by enforcing, protecting, or assuring the right of that party under the order, the contempt is civil."[39] 166 W.Va. at 660, 276 S.E.2d at 813. Since the contempt ruling arose from, and was directed at, compelling compliance with an existing order concerning visitation to be afforded Appellee the purpose of the sanction was clearly consonant with the objectives underlying civil contempt.

While we find no procedural impediment to the imposition of a ruling of summary contempt against Appellant's counsel based on the record before us,[40] we find error with regard to the [38]Whereas we previously looked to the penalty imposed (e.g. jail term with opportunity for purging vs. without and determinate vs. indeterminate sentencing) in labeling contempt matters, this Court altered that approach beginning with Robinson and now examines the purpose of the sanction, rather than the sanction itself, to identify the nature of the contempt ruling. Cf. Floyd v. Watson, 163 W.Va. 65, 73-74, 254 S.E.2d 687, 692 (1979) to Robinson, 166.Va. at 670, 276 S.E.2d at 818. Note, however, that this Court has, on more than one occasion, commented on the "indistinct" line which separates civil and criminal contempt proceedings. See Robinson, 166 W.Va. at 662-69, 276 S.E.2d at 814-17.

[39]In contrast, when the sanction is aimed at an "'affront to the dignity or authority of the court, or to preserve or restore order in the court or respect for the court, the contempt is criminal.'" Stephens, 200 W.Va. at 806, 490 S.E.2d at 895 (quoting Syl. Pt. 4, in part, Robinson, 166 W.Va. at 661, 276 S.E.2d at 813).

[40]The record reveals that the contempt ruling against Appellant's counsel resulted when Appellant, asserting her Fifth Amendment right, refused to answer the trial court's questions despite assurances from the court that no jail term would result from her testimony since this was a civil contempt proceeding and counsel refused to accept the lower court's ruling. Counsel was fined $150 for three initial refusals to "sit down" and then an additional $50 later in the proceeding when counsel kept insisting that he be allowed lower court's award of attorney's fees and costs against said counsel. During the March 1, 1999, hearing, Judge Irons decided, sua sponte, to award attorney's fees to Appellee's counsel that were incurred between the entry of the February 9, 1999, order and the March 1, 1999, hearing. As its basis for awarding attorney's fees, the lower court states in the March 3, 1999, order: "[T]he frivolous filings by plaintiff's counsel since the entry of the February 9, 1999 Order herein."[41] Appellant argues, and we agree, that the lower court was required to provide him with notice and an opportunity to be heard on the issue of sanctions being awarded, apparently under Rule 11 of the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure, before levying such sanctions against him.

The sole authority cited by the lower court for its entry of an order awarding attorney's fees against Appellant is this Court's decision in Daily Gazette Co. v. Canady, 175 W.Va. 249, 332 S.E.2d 262 (1985). While that decision clearly recognized the authority of a court, both inherent and rule-based, to assess attorney's fees,[42] we nonetheless admonished that "[l]ike other sanctions, to read the "Code" into the record. While we recognize the need for zealous advocacy on the part of trial counsel, we also appreciate the need for counsel to respect the temporal finality of the lower court's ruling pending appeal. The transcript from the March 1, 1999, hearing demonstrates conduct that is sufficiently disrepectful to the circuit court to warrant a summary contempt finding. See W.Va. Code § 61-5-26; Syl. Pt. 2, State v. Boyd, 166 W.Va. 690, 276 S.E.2d 829 (1981). Further evidence of both direct and indirect disrespectfulness is evidenced by the finding in the March 3, 1999, order that Appellant's counsel "has improperly advised his client . . . to disobey the Orders of this Court and in so doing to display blatant disrespect for this Court and its Orders."

[41]The court further states that Appellant's counsel's "actions have required defendant's attorneys to respond and to schedule hearings and make court appearances in response to said frivolous pleadings."

[42]This Court held in the syllabus of Canady that:

attorney's fees certainly should not be assessed lightly or without fair notice and an opportunity for a hearing on the record." Id. at 251, 332 S.E.2d at 264. In this case, the lower court decided to award attorney's fees and then, without providing Appellant's counsel an opportunity to address either Appellee's entitlement to fees or the reasonableness of the fee award itself, the circuit court approved an order prepared by Appellee's counsel, which directed that $6080.50 in cumulative fees and costs were to be paid by Appellant's counsel within seven days.

In failing to accord Appellant's counsel an opportunity to respond to the lower court's basis for assessing fees and costs, the most basic of all protections inherent to our judicial system has been violated. Even a cursory reading of Rule 11, which permits sanctions to be awarded against counsel for pleadings that are either not supported in law or fact or are wrongly filed for harassment, cost-enhancement purposes, or to promote delay, demonstrates that a circuit court must still afford the party, whose conduct has spawned the need to consider sanctions, "notice and a reasonable opportunity to respond." W.Va.R.Civ.P.11(c). We observed in State ex rel. Dodrill v. Egnor, 198 W.Va. 409, 481 S.E.2d 504 (1996), that "ordinarily a party about to be sanctioned is given an opportunity to explain the default or to argue for a lesser penalty." > A court may order payment by an attorney to a prevailing party reasonable attorney fees and costs incurred as the result of his or her vexatious, wanton, or oppressive assertion of a claim or defense that cannot be supported by a good faith argument for the application, extension, modification, or reversal of existing law.

record in this case demonstrates that the lower court merely announced its decision to award attorney's fees and did not permit any argument to be heard on this issue.

In syllabus points one and two of Bartles v. Hinkle, 196 W.Va. 381, 472 S.E.2d 827 (1996), we addressed the underlying procedural concerns inherent to an award of sanctions:

> Although Rules 11, 16, and 37 of the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure do not formally require any particular procedure, before issuing a sanction, a court must ensure it has an adequate foundation either pursuant to the rules or by virtue of its inherent powers to exercise its authority. The Due Process Clause of Section 10 of Article III of the West Virginia Constitution requires that there exist a relationship between the sanctioned party's misconduct and the matters in controversy such that the transgression threatens to interfere with the rightful decision of the case. Thus, a court must ensure any sanction imposed is fashioned to address the identified harm caused by the party's misconduct.
> In formulating the appropriate sanction, a court shall be guided by equitable principles. Initially, the court must identify the alleged wrongful conduct and determine if it warrants a sanction. The court must explain its reasons clearly on the record if it decides a sanction is appropriate. To determine what will constitute an appropriate sanction, the court may consider the seriousness of the conduct, the impact the conduct had in the case and in the administration of justice, any mitigating circumstances, and whether the conduct was an isolated occurrence or was a pattern of wrongdoing throughout the case.

In rendering its award of attorney's fees, the lower court failed to heed basic due process principles of notice and opportunity to be heard, as well as the foundational relationship concerns discussed in Bartles.

While we do not question the lower court's authority to subject Appellant's counsel to sanctions in the form of attorney's fees, we cannot approve the summary method by which Judge Irons concluded that attorney's fees were warranted and then permitted Appellee's counsel to submit their fees, without any opportunity for Appellant to challenge the reasonableness of such fees. Before imposing sanctions for filing frivolous pleadings and advancing frivolous arguments, a trial court must give the alleged contemnor notice and an opportunity to be heard on the questions of frivolousness, appropriate sanctions, and, if an award of attorney's fees is to be made, on the necessity and reasonableness of such fees. At the conclusion of such hearing, the trial court must make sufficient findings of fact and conclusions of law to enable the appellate court to conduct a meaningful review. Accordingly, we find that the lower court abused its discretion in imposing the sanction of attorney's fees by not first permitting Appellant's counsel an opportunity to be heard on the issue underlying the trial court's award of sanctions and by not holding a hearing on the reasonableness of the fees. See Bartles, 196 W.Va. at 389-90, 472 S.E.2d at 835-36. On remand, the lower court is directed to conduct a hearing for the purpose of permitting Appellant's counsel an opportunity to respond to the circuit court's position regarding the frivolous pleadings counsel filed between February 9, 1999, and March 1, 1999, and if sanctions in the form of attorney's fees are still deemed appropriate by the lower court, Appellee's counsel should address the reasonableness of the fees submitted and Appellant's counsel should then be provided an opportunity to challenge the submitted fees on the ground of reasonableness.[43] See Syl. Pt. 4, Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co. v. Pitrolo, 176 W.Va. 190, 342 S.E.2d 156 (1986).

C. Appeal No. 27318--June 17, 1999, Order

Through this appeal, Appellant asserts error with regard to the lower court's denial of her motions seeking post-ruling relief with regard to the March 3, 1999, contempt ruling and concernin the visitation directives set forth in the February 9, 1999, order. Also challenged is the lower court's finding of contempt against Appellant for violating various orders addressing exercise of Appellee's visitation rights.

As support for her Rule 59(a) motion seeking a new "trial" with regard to the March 3, 1999, contempt ruling, Appellant asserted that she had not been served with the petition for contempt. Dispensing with this "jurisdictional" challenge, the lower court reframed Appellant's concerns as actually involving issues of notice, and concluded that there was no merit to Appellant's averments sin her counsel admitted to receiving the contempt petition.[44] The circuit court found additionally that Appellant was not "surprised" by the visitation issues considered in that proceeding. We find no error with regard to the denial of the Rule 59(a) motion. Judge Kirkpatrick also found no merit to Appellant's Rule 60 (b) (1) and (b) (6) challenges to the February 9, 1999, order adopting the [43]Appellant claims that the aggregate award of fees is excessive.

[44]Judge Kirkpatrick's June 17, 1999, order, reflects that Judge Irons noted for the record during the March 1, 1999, hearing that the court file contained a return showing that Appellant was "regularly served" with the contempt pleadings.

recommended order of FLM Wiley.[45] For the same reasons we did not address Appellant's assignments of error pertinent to the February 9, 1999, order, we likewise do not address the denial of motions seeking post-ruling relief from this same order.[46]

Although we find no error with regard to Judge Kirkpatrick's entry of a contempt ruling against Appellant for her admitted failure to comply with the visitation directives set forth in multiple orders,[47] the mechanism set in place "designed to restore the relationship between father and children" in the event that Appellant chooses to prospectively deny visitation requires certain modifications. The June 17, 1999, order provides that:

> Although the court does not anticipate that the plaintiff [Appellant] will now continue to prevent visitation; out of an abundance of precaution and in view of past actions, the undersigned does set forth hereafter a mechanism to be utilized upon failure of the plaintiff to follow the visitation directive. . . .
> So, in the event of a further instance of denial of unsupervised visitation by the plaintiff, the court will invoke the following procedure as a remedial, not punitive, measure designed to restore the relationship between father and children:
> 1. A prompt hearing upon notice will be scheduled in Monroe County before the undersigned to determine whether or not the defendant [Appellee] was enabled to exercise his visitation prescribed herein.
> 2. If it is established that the defendant was further denied his specified visitation by plaintiff, the care, custody and control of these children shall be transferred forthwith from the plaintiff to the defendant.

[45]Judge Kirkpatrick distilled all of Appellant's challenges to the lower court's adoption of the Recommended Order as emanating from "a strong difference of opinion between the plaintiff and the court" as to the need for supervised visitation.

[46]See Section II.B. discussing statutory waiver of exceptions to FLM Recommended Order.

[47]Those orders were entered on February 9, 24, and 26, 1999.

> 3. The Sheriff of Monroe County will be directed to retrieve and transport these children to the home of the defendant to effect this custody arrangement.
> 4. At such hearing, the plaintiff will be determined afforded visitation privileges to be

As justification for its four-pronged method of resolving future instances of visitation denial, the lower court cited this Court's decision in Arbogast v. Arbogast, 174 W.Va. 498, 327 S.E.2d 675 (1984). Judge Kirkpatrick refers to the following passage from that decision:

> The custody change does not appear to have been ordered because of any isolated or technical disregard of the district court's authority, but because Jacquelyn consistently and willfully refused to allow her son any contact with the Arbogast family, denying her son the right to know and share the companionship, affection and society of his father and his parental grandparents. A mother's "very act of preventing . . . children of tender age from seeing and being with their father is an act so inconsistent with the best interests of the children as to, per se, raise a strong probability that the mother is unfit to act as custodial parent.

Id. at 505, 327 S.E.2d at 682. By focusing solely on the above-quoted language, the lower court obscures the fact that, in Arbogast, this Court was enforcing a modification of custody that had already been ordered by a Kansas court. Since our actions in that case were governed by the Parental Kidnaping Prevention Act,[48] Arbogast is clearly inapposite. Our decision in that case cannot be read as sanctioning a modification of custody based solely on visitation denial.[49]

[49]Clearly, a West Virginia court could rely upon continued denial of visitation to modify a previous custody ruling assuming adherence to the appropriate procedures. See W.Va. Code § 48-2-15(e).

Since a change in legal custody can only result pursuant to the statutory procedures set forth in West Virginia Code § 48-2-15(e) (1999), which entail the filing of a motion seeking a change i custody and presume a hearing on such motion, the mechanism included in the June 17, 1999, order wrongly suggests circumvention of the statutorily-required method of obtaining a custody modification While the order correctly requires a hearing following notice to the parties on the issue of denied visitation, the order continues by directing, in mandatory terms, that legal custody shall forthwith be transferred from Appellant to Appellee upon proof of denied visitation. A modification of child custody, without notice and hearing, cannot be ordered to result concurrently with a prospective instance of forbidden conduct. Certainly, one parent's continued refusal to permit the non-custodial parent to exercise his/her visitation rights could be considered by the court upon a proper motion for a change in custody. A modification in custody cannot result, however, simply by virtue of a visitation denial. Because any modification must result from a petition, followed by a hearing on the evidence ar can only be ordered following compliance with the standard established for custody modifications,[51] th lower court erred through its prospective directive that would authorize the sheriff to "retrieve and transport" the parties children as a remedial measure intended to "coerce" Appellant into compliance with the visitation directives already in place.[52] Accordingly, item numbers two, three, and four must be omitted from the list of procedures set in place by Judge Kirkpatrick to address future denials of visitation. Upon deletion of these conditions from the June 17, 1999, contempt ruling, the order is properly sustainable, given Appellant's admissions with regard to the visitation denials which are the subject of the contempt ruling.

Based on the foregoing, the February 9, 1999, order of the Circuit Court of Monroe County is hereby affirmed; the March 3, 1999, order of the Circuit Court of Monroe County is reversed as to the award of attorney's fees and remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion, but otherwise affirmed; and the June 17, 1999, order of the Circuit Court of Monroe County is reversed as to the mechanism designated for transferring physical and legal custody upon a prospective visitation denial and remanded for entry of an order omitting such mechanism, but otherwise affirmed.

1. "'"The exercise of discretion by a trial court in awarding custody of a minor child will not be disturbed on appeal unless that discretion has been abused; however, where the trial court's ruling does not reflect a discretionary decision but is based upon an erroneous application of the law and is clearly wrong, the ruling will be reversed on appeal." Workman, Chief Justice:

This case is before the Court upon the appeal of the Petitioners D.B.[1] (hereinafter "the Petitioner grandfather") and D.B.[2](hereinafter "the Petitioner grandmother") from the February 27, 2014, final order of the Circuit Court of Mingo County, West Virginia, denying their[3] petition for guardianship of their granddaughter, F.R.[4] The Petitioners contend that the circuit court erred: 1) in finding that the Temporary Agreed Order granting the Petitioners temporary custody of the child terminated at the commencement of the guardianship hearing; 2) in ordering transfer of the custody of the child to the Respondent

[1]Because this case involves a child and sensitive matters, we follow our practice of using initials to refer to the parties. See W. Va. R. App. P. 40(e); State v. Edward Charles L., 183 W. Va. 641, 645 n.1, 398 S.E.2d 123, 127 n.1 (1990).

[2]The Petitioner grandmother is not the child's biological maternal grandmother. She had been in a long-term relationship with the Petitioner grandfather and married him after he filed a petition for guardianship. While the initial petition was filed by the Petitioner grandfather, it was later amended to also include the Petitioner grandmother. Consequently, we refer to the grandparents collectively as the Petitioners throughout the opinion.

[3]The petition for guardianship did not expressly indicate whether temporary or permanent guardianship was being sought. The initial petition, prior to adding the Petitioner grandmother, simply sought to have the Petitioner grandfather be granted legal guardianship of the infant child.

[4]The child remains in the legal and physical custody of the Petitioners. By order entered March 12, 2014, the final ordered entered February 27, 2014, was stayed pending appeal, and the parties were instructed to follow the Agreed Temporary Order regarding custody and visitation.

father, J.R. (hereinafter also referred to as "the Respondent father"), the child's biological father, without requiring clear and convincing evidence of the Respondent father's fitness as a parent; 3) by ignoring the opinions of the Petitioners' expert witness, Dr. Amelia Santiago, the child's treating physician; and 4) by ignoring the Petitioners' clear and convincing evidence that a change of custody of the child would constitute a significant detriment to the child.[5] Upon review of the parties' briefs[6] and oral arguments, the appendix record and all other matters submitted before this Court, we find that the circuit court erred in failing to apply the standard enunciated by this Court in Overfield v. Collins, 199 W. Va. 27, 483 S.E.2d 27 (1996). We therefore reverse the circuit court's decision and remand the case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

I. FACTS

B.B. and the Respondent father were in a relationship. They had a child, F.R.,

[5]Despite the assigned errors, the Petitioners' main argument centers upon the circuit court returning the child to the Respondent father's custody without requiring the Respondent father to prove that he was a fit parent. It is this error that we find warrants reversal and remand by this Court.

[6]The summary response filed by the guardian ad litem indicates that "upon information and belief, the [Respondent] father . . . has obtained employment in the northern part of the state and only comes home on the weekends." There were also concerns about the lack of child-proofing in the home, the instability of people living in the home, the number of animals the father has and the fact that the father only has a motorcycle for transportation. He also has made no concrete arrangements for child care and, according to status updates, there is a continued concern about his smoking around his daughter because of her asthma.

who is now three years old. B.B. died in a single vehicle accident on July 12, 2012.

According to the undisputed testimony of the Petitioner grandfather at the guardianship hearing, B.B. and F.R. resided with the Petitioners from the time F.R. was three months old until about a month before B.B.'s death,[7] when she and F.R. moved in with B.B.'s mother.[8]

Following B.B.'s death, the Petitioner grandfather filed a petition for guardianship on July 24, 2012, which the Respondent father answered.[9] On October 1, 2012, the parties entered into an Agreed Temporary Order, wherein they agreed that the Petitioner grandfather was the "Temporary Guardian of the infant," F.R. The Respondent father also agreed to temporary weekend visitation and a guardian ad litem was appointed for the child. The language of the order provides that "the parties had reached a temporary parenting agreement until a Final Evidentiary Hearing could be held by the Court."

[7]The circuit court found in its February 27, 2014, order that B.B. and the Respondent father shared custodial responsibility over F.R. until B.B. died; however, the evidence in the appendix record fails to support this finding.

[8]B.B. lived with her mother while she was looking for employment and the Petitioner grandfather stated that during the month, she and F.R. went back and forth between B.B.'s mother's home and his home.

[9]See supra note two.

The evidentiary hearing[10] referred to in the Agreed Temporary Order did not occur until over a year later on December 18, 2013.[11] According to Rebecca Marcum with Child Protective Services ("CPS"), who testified at the hearing, as a result of the guardianship petition being filed, CPS received an order from the court[12] "to open up a case and do a family function assessment" on the Respondent father. Ms. Marcum testified that they were able to substantiate domestic violence between the Respondent father and B.B.

The first instance of domestic violence occurred on February 24, 2011, five months before F.R.'s birth. Ms. Marcum testified that the Respondent father admitted that he stopped B.B.'s car and "took her keys and her cell phone and was hitting her and she filed an EPO [or Emergency Protective Order] and stated that she feared for her life and F[.R.]'s life."

About a month later, in March of 2011, there was another domestic violence incident. Ms. Marcum testified that the Respondent father admitted to hitting B.B. after the [10]The Honorable John L. Cummings, a senior status judge, was appointed by the West Virginia Supreme Court to hear cases in Mingo County at the time of the evidentiary hearing.

[11]There is no explanation in the record for why the evidentiary hearing referenced in the Agreed Temporary Order did not occur until over a year after the order was entered.

[12]It is unclear from the appendix record why then-Judge Michael Thornsbury ordered CPS to open a case in this matter. It may have been due to the allegation in the petition for guardianship that the Respondent "was arrested for Domestic Battery and Child Neglect creating risk of injury . . . ."

Respondent father became mad when B.B. laughed at him after he accused her of stealing items from him. The Respondent father told Ms. Marcum that he did not know that B.B. was pregnant at the time he hit her.

Ms. Marcum was also prepared to testify regarding an August 31, 2011, incident of domestic violence between the Respondent father and B.B. It was during Ms. Marcum's testimony, however, that the circuit court, sua sponte, questioned the relevancy of the testimony, stating that the court didn't "think it [wa]s relevant to the issue . . . [of] the guardianship between" the Respondent father and the Petitioners. The circuit court questioned "the relevance of what occurred in regard to any form of domestic violence after the death of B[.B.] on . . . July 12, 2012." The circuit court again stated: "If B[.B.] was still alive and if this were a domestic case, this would be very relevant; however, after her death that cause, in effect, ceases with her death. I'm going to sustain the objection as to relevance."

Despite the circuit court instructing the Petitioners' counsel not to go any further into the domestic violence incidents because "they do not count as far as the relevance," the circuit court did allow a proffer of what the testimony would be concerning the August 31, 2011, incident. The Petitioners' counsel then proffered that the evidence would establish that the Respondent father admitted to shooting a BB into a car when B.B.

and the child were inside the car. The circuit court also allowed the Petitioner grandfather to testify about the incident involving the BB gun. The Petitioner grandfather testified that he observed his daughter's car after the incident and took photographs of the car. The Petitioner grandfather also testified that his grandchild was inside the vehicle at the time of the incident. The Respondent father testified and admitted that he told Ms. Marcum that he shot at B.B.'s car. He, however, denied knowing that the child was in car. The Respondent father testified that the child was not in the car at the time he shot the BB gun at the vehicle.

There was also evidence of an incident involving domestic violence that occurred on April 5, 2012.[13] Deputy Barry Moore with the Mingo County Sheriff's Department testified that he investigated an incident in which the Respondent father struck B.B. with a flashlight and then followed her car in a threatening and erratic fashion while F.R., who was then nine months old, was in the car. The Respondent father was charged with domestic battery and child neglect creating a risk of injury. The Respondent father served time for domestic battery, but the child neglect charge was dismissed as part of a plea deal.

In addition to the domestic violence incidents, Ms. Marcum also testified regarding a home visit to the Respondent father's house in which she found the Respondent father's mother, a caregiver of the child on occasion,[14] under the influence of oxycodone. Ms. Marcum testified that when she went to the Respondent father's mother's job to interview her, his mother also appeared to be under the influence while at work. Drug testing was conducted on the Respondent father's mother and she tested positive for oxycodone. She subsequently quit participating in random drug testing. Additionally, Ms. Marcum testified that the Respondent father's mother's husband was uncooperative and was aggressive at times. He refused to undergo any random drug testing. The Respondent father agreed that neither of these individuals would be appropriate care givers for the child.[15]

Ms. Marcum testified to the following report made as a result of her investigation:

> "There is history of severe domestic violence between J[.R.] and B[.B.] However, B[.B.] is now deceased and J[.R.] is not in another relationship for worker to be able to evaluate him presently. J[.R.] was exposed to domestic violence from an early age. Worker substantiated emotional abuse due to domestic violence in the presence of the child. Worker feels that J[.R.] lacks impulse control and does not think before he acts. J[.R.] has a history of not protecting his child and placing [14]The Respondent father's mother did not live in the same home with the Respondent father.

[15]There was also testimony that the Respondent father shared his home with an ailing grandmother and a brother, who was affected by a severe traumatic brain injury. During oral argument it was disclosed that the Respondent father's grandmother had passed away. Moreover, Ms. Marcum testified that the ailing brother would not be an appropriate caregiver for the child.

> her in dangerous situations by exposing her to domestic violence when his anger becomes out of control."

Despite this report, Ms. Marcum also testified on cross-examination when asked if the Respondent father was an appropriate caregiver: "He was very compliant. He cooperated, he completed parenting, he completed adult life skills, he completed anger management. We can't say that he's not an appropriate care giver." She further testified that "[h]ypothetically, if a parent cooperates and they complete their services and they show a change, then, yes, we recommend reunification."[16]

Finally, Ms. Marcum testified that she found that the Petitioners were appropriate guardians for F.R. She further testified that the child had bonded with the Petitioner grandmother and calls her "mommy."

The Respondent father testified and admitted to engaging in domestic violence with B.B. and that it continued after F.R.'s birth. The Respondent father also testified that on August 9, 2013, during a scheduled visitation, he was arrested for driving a motorcycle sixty miles an hour in a forty-five mile an hour zone. During this episode, his daughter was in the care and custody of his mother. He testified that he did not know that his mother was taking oxycodone, but also acknowledged that his mother was not a "primary caregiver for my daughter." Further, the Respondent father agreed that his stepfather, grandmother and brother were not appropriate caregivers for the child. The Respondent father acknowledged that F.R. was very close to the Petitioners. He also testified that if he had custody of his daughter he would not eliminate the relationship F.R. had with the Petitioners.

Lastly, there was significant testimony from F.R.'s board certified pediatrician, Amelia J. Santiago, concerning the child's asthma. Dr. Santiago testified that F.R. was diagnosed with asthma on December 19, 2012. The doctor stated that she had seen the child several times before and after the diagnosis. Dr. Santiago stated that the child's asthma could be exacerbated by secondhand smoke from cigarettes. This testimony was relevant because both the Respondent father and his grandmother were cigarette smokers. Dr. Santiago testified that she believed that the child had reoccurring exacerbation of asthma due to exposure to smoke. Specifically, Dr. Santiago testified:

> It has been accepted for quite awhile now that second hand smoke or passive smoking is bad for children because it impairs their ability to fight and move the mucous in their lungs, so we have always for more than twenty years we have recommended that children with their small lung capacity not be exposed to any cigarette smoke . . . . This has been accepted in the medical community . . . .

Dr. Santiago was challenged on cross-examination concerning her lack of "any actual physical, scientific or first hand knowledge that th[e] child was ever exposed to second hand smoke[.]" The doctor acknowledged that she had not witnessed the child being exposed to secondhand smoke; however, the Petitioners had informed her that the child was being exposed to cigarette smoke during the child's visits with the Respondent father.

Regarding F.R.'s asthma and her doctor's testimony that she should not be around secondhand smoke, the Respondent father admitted to smoking, but said he did so only on the front porch. He said he typically smokes about a half-pack of cigarettes when his daughter is with him. He also testified that on at least one occasion he took the child outside with him when he smoked, stating "[i]t's an open porch. The wind blows thr[ough]."

On February 27, 2014, almost three months after the evidentiary hearing concluded, the circuit court entered its final order denying the petition for guardianship. Specifically, the circuit court, in reaching its decision, found the following standard enunciated in the syllabus of Whiteman v. Robinson, 145 W. Va. 685, 116 S.E.2d 691 (1960), to be applicable and controlling:

> A parent has the natural right to the custody of his or her infant child and, unless the parent is an unfit person because of misconduct, neglect, immorality, abandonment, or other dereliction of duty, or has waived such right, or by agreement or otherwise has transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody, the right of the parent to the custody of his or her infant child will be recognized and enforced by the courts.

The circuit court then found that the Agreed Temporary Order, which named the Petitioner grandfather as F.R.'s guardian "dissolved by its own language on December 18, 2013, at the commencement of the First Evidentiary Hearing[]" and that there was "no grant of temporary custody . . . in place at the time of the Final Evidentiary Hearing." The circuit court again, "[a]pplying Whiteman" found that "the [R]espondent [father] has not 'waived such right [to custody of his child], or by agreement or otherwise has transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody . . . ,' of his child to anyone."

The circuit court further found, regarding the child's asthma, that "Dr. Santiago opined that the asthma was caused and exacerbated by the inhalation of second-hand smoke." The circuit court, however, also found that because the doctor "did not have the foundational knowledge to know what either caused the asthma or exacerbated it[,]"and that because the child also suffered "asthma exacerbation" when in the care of the Petitioners, who did not smoke, these facts "tended to show how attenuated the connection between the second-hand smoke and the asthma exacerbation is."[17] The circuit court also made a specific finding that "the Respondent father, when smoking, does so in an open area where the child could only have minimal exposure."

The circuit court additionally found it had heard testimony from three witnesses

[17]According to the appendix record, Dr. Santiago is a licensed, board certified pediatrician, who practiced in the Mingo County area for more than thirty years. She was certainly qualified to give her medical opinion concerning the child's asthma being aggravated by secondhand smoke. Moreover, contrary to the circuit court's finding that the doctor testified that the child's asthma was caused by secondhand smoking, the record shows that Dr. Santiago never testified to that and, accordingly, this factual finding by the circuit court is erroneous.

> three[18] instances of domestic violence between the Respondent father and his former wife.[19] The first incident resulted in an Emergency Protective Order being entered against the Respondent [father] in Wyoming County, West Virginia[,] on February 24, 2011 (Case Number 11-D-49). The next incident resulted in an Emergency Protective Order being entered against the Respondent [father] in Wyoming County, West Virginia[,] on September 3, 2011 (Case Number 11-D-263). The last incident resulted in the Respondent [father] pleading guilty to a Domestic Battery charge in Mingo County, West Virginia[,] with dismissal of the felony child neglect creating a risk of injury (Case Number 12-M-484 and 12-F-151).

(Footnote added). Regarding the foregoing finding, the circuit court, however, failed to include its determination during the evidentiary hearing that it found the evidence irrelevant. As the circuit court ruled during the hearing, "if B[.B.]was still alive and if this were a domestic case, this would be very relevant; however, after her death that cause, in effect, ceases with her death." Notwithstanding its determination that the evidence of domestic violence was irrelevant, the circuit court found that "[h]owever applying the Whiteman standard," that "the Respondent [father] is not 'an unfit person because of misconduct, neglect, immorality, abandonment, or other dereliction of duty,' despite the three incidents [of domestic violence]."

[18]Notwithstanding evidence of four instances of domestic violence, the circuit court only referenced and discussed three having determined that the incident involving a BB gun was not relevant.

[19]The circuit court erroneously found that the Respondent father and B.B. had been married. There was no evidence to support this finding.

The circuit court then found that the Petitioners had "failed to prove by clear and convincing evidence" that their appointment as guardians was in the child's best interest. The court also based its decision on its determination that none of the five circumstances listed in West Virginia Code § 44-10-3(f)(1-5) (2014) (providing for appointment and termination of guardian for minor) to establish guardianship had been met and, therefore, the Petitioners failed to meet their burden under the statute and case law.

II. Standard of Review

In syllabus point two of In re Antonia R.A., 228 W. Va. 380, 719 S.E.2d 850 (2011), this Court applied the following standard of review to a case involving a petition for guardianship:

> "'The exercise of discretion by a trial court in awarding custody of a minor child will not be disturbed on appeal unless that discretion has been abused; however, where the trial court's ruling does not reflect a discretionary decision but is based upon an erroneous application of the law and is clearly wrong, the ruling will be reversed on appeal.' Syllabus point 2, Funkhouser v. Funkhouser, 158 W. Va. 964, 216 S.E.2d 570 (1975), superseded by statute on other grounds as stated in David M. v. Margaret M., 182 W. Va. 57, 385 S.E.2d 912 (1989)." Syl. Pt. 1, In re Abbigail Faye B., 222 W. Va. 466, 665 S.E.2d 300 (2008).

Further, "'[w]here the issue on an appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of law or involving an interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review.' Syllabus point 1, Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., 194 W. Va. 138, 459 S.E.2d 415 (1995)." In re Abbigail Faye B., 222 W. Va. at 469, 665 S.E.2d at 303, Syl. Pt. 2.

Applying the above-mentioned standards, we examine the issues before us.

III. Discussion of Law

The issue upon which this case turns is whether the circuit court erred in ordering transfer of the custody of the child to the Respondent father, the child's biological father, without requiring clear and convincing evidence of his fitness as a parent. The Petitioners argue that the circuit court incorrectly placed the burden of proof upon the Petitioners to prove that the Respondent father was unfit to parent the child. Instead, the Petitioners assert that because the Respondent father had transferred custody of the child to the Petitioners, the law requires him to prove by clear and convincing evidence that he is a fit parent. See Overfield, 199 W. Va. at 29, 483 S.E.2d at 29, Syl. Pt. 2. Further, the Petitioners contend that due to the instances of domestic violence, as well as other evidence introduced during the evidentiary hearing, the Respondent father failed to establish his fitness as a parent by clear and convincing evidence. In contrast, the Respondent father asserts that the circuit court correctly determined that he was a fit parent.

Generally, one seeking the appointment as a guardian for a minor child carries the burden of proof as set forth in West Virginia Code § 44-10-3:

> (f) The court may appoint a guardian for a minor if the court finds by clear and convincing evidence that the appointment is in the minor's best interest and:
> (1) The parents consent;
> (2) The parents' rights have been previously terminated;
> (3) The parents are unwilling or unable to exercise their parental rights;
> (4) The parents have abandoned their rights by a material failure to exercise them for a period of more than six months; or > (5) There are extraordinary circumstances that would, in all reasonable likelihood, result in serious detriment to the child if the petition is denied.
>
> (g) Whether or not one or more of the conditions of subsection (f) have been established, the court may appoint a temporary guardian for a minor upon a showing that an immediate need exists or that a period of transition into the custody of a parent is needed so long as the appointment is in the best interest of the minor. . . .
>
>
> (j) For a petition to revoke or terminate a guardianship filed by a parent, the burden of proof is on the moving party to show by a preponderance of the evidence that there has been a material change of circumstances and that a revocation or termination is in the child's best interest.

Id. (emphasis added).

In Whiteman, a biological father filed a petition for habeas corpus in the circuit court to regain custody of his three-and-one-half year old daughter from the child's maternal uncle and his wife.[20] 145 W. Va. at 686, 116 S.E.2d at 692. The child's mother, who was married to the father, suffered from a mental disability. The mother and father were from West Virginia, but were residing in Seattle, Washington. The child's mother disappeared and was subsequently found dead. During the interval between the mother's disappearance and the discovery of her body some twenty days later, the father communicated with members of their family in West Virginia concerning his wife's absence and his situation of caring for four young children. His wife's brother, the children's uncle, went to Seattle to assist the father with bringing the children to West Virginia. Each child was placed with members of the father's family on a temporary basis. The youngest was placed with the maternal uncle. Id. at 687, 116 S.E.2d at 692. There was no written agreement between the parties transferring custody of the child from the father to the uncle. Instead, it was understood by both the father and the uncle that the placement of the youngest child with the uncle was of a temporary nature, not to exceed six months after the father's remarriage,[21] but could end sooner if the father wanted custody back. Id. at 687-88, 116 S.E.2d at 693. When the father sought to regain custody of his child, the uncle refused. The uncle believed that it was in the child's best interest to remain with him and his wife permanently. Id. at 689-90, 116 S.E.2d at 694.

[20]The couple had four children, but only the youngest was the subject of the habeas petition.

[21]The father did remarry within a short period of time after the mother's death. 145 W. Va. at 688, 116 S.E.2d at 693.

Despite finding that both the father and the uncle were suitable persons to have care and custody of the child, the circuit court refused to award custody of the child to the child's father, because the father had failed to prove that "a change of custody from the defendants [the uncle and his wife] to the petitioner [the father] would promote the welfare of the child." Id. at 686, 112 S.E.2d at 692.

On appeal, this Court reversed the circuit court's decision and ordered that the custody of the child be returned to the father. Id. at 696, 116 S.E.2d at 697. The Court found that the father > has never, by agreement or otherwise, transferred, relinquished or surrendered the custody of his child to the defendants but instead has in effect merely permitted them to have the temporary possession of the child subject to the right of the petitioner [the father] to terminate such possession at any time or, in any event, at the expiration of six months after the petitioner should remarry.

Id. at 695, 116 S.E.2d at 697. Thus, the father had "the natural right to the custody" of his child as there were no allegations that he was an unfit person and he had not transferred custody of the child to the uncle. 145 W. Va. at 685, 116 S.E.2d at 691-92, Syllabus.

Years later in Overfield, this Court was presented with a biological mother suing her parents to regain custody of her two children. 199 W. Va. at 31, 483 S.E.2d at 31. The mother, by affidavit, granted custody of the children to their maternal grandparents, after the mother had suffered a traumatic injury. The mother maintained that she had only given her parents temporary custody of the children, while the grandparents argued that the intention was to permanently transfer custody of the two children to them. Id.

Seven days after the affidavit was executed by the parties, the grandparents filed an action seeking an order granting them permanent custody of the children. The circuit court entered the requested order granting the grandparents permanent custody. Id. at 32, 483 S.E.2d at 32.

Over a year later, when the mother's health had improved, she filed a petition to regain custody of her children. The circuit court denied the petition, finding that because the mother had transferred permanent custody of the children to the grandparents it was incumbent upon her to show that a return of custody would be in the children's best interests. The circuit court found that the mother failed to meet her burden. Id.

On appeal, this Court reversed the lower court's decision and remanded the case for further proceedings. Relevant to the instant matter, the Court held in syllabus point two of Overfield that when either temporary or permanent custody is transferred by a parent to a third party, the burden of proof to regain custody of the child is on the parent as follows:

> When a natural parent transfers temporary custody of their child to a third person and thereafter seeks to regain > custody of that child, the burden of proof shall be upon that parent to prove by clear and convincing evidence that he or she is fit; thereafter the burden of proof shall shift to the third party to prove by clear and convincing evidence that the child's environment should not be disturbed because to do so would constitute a significant detriment to the child notwithstanding the natural parent's assertion of a legal right to the child.

Id. at 30, 483 S.E.2d at 30, Syl. Pt. 2, in part.

In the instant case, the Agreed Temporary Order named the Petitioner grandfather "Temporary Guardian" of F.R. and allowed the Respondent father to have "temporary weekend visitation" with the child "until a Final Evidentiary Hearing could be held by the Court." The circuit court found that the temporary order "dissolved by its own language on December 18, 2013, at the commencement of the Final Evidentiary Hearing." The circuit court then found that the standard set forth in Whitefield was the applicable standard to be used in the case and "the Overfield v. Collins standard . . . [was] inapplicable in the case at bar because no grant of temporary custody was in place at the time of the Final Evidentiary Hearing." Consequently, the circuit court placed the burden of proof upon the Petitioners to establish by clear and convincing evidence that the Respondent father was an unfit parent. The court, based upon its assessment of the evidence, found that the Petitioners failed to satisfy their burden.

In examining the instant matter, we find that the circuit court erred in its application of Whiteman, rather than Overfield, to reach its decision. Essentially, the circuit court ignored the transfer of custody of the minor child from the Respondent father to the Petitioners, which is unequivocally evinced in the Agreed Temporary Order entered into between the parties. Consequently, the facts do not support the circuit court's finding that no temporary transfer of custody was in place at the time of the final evidentiary hearing. Moreover, it is simply illogical and ill-advised for the circuit court to have found that the temporary order "dissolved by its own language on December 18, 2013, at the commencement of the Final Evidentiary Hearing." To make such a determination effectively meant that the child went without any guardian in place from December 18, 2013, until the final order was entered on February 27, 2014. Moreover, the purpose of having a final evidentiary hearing was to determine whether the Petitioners should be made the permanent guardians of the child or whether the temporary guardianship should be terminated. That determination could not be made until the hearing was complete and the circuit court entered an order. "A court of record speaks only through its orders. . . ." State ex rel. Erlewine v. Thompson, 156 W. Va. 714, 718, 207 S.E.2d 105, 107 (1973). Thus, the circuit court's imposition of the wrong burden of proof necessarily was predicated upon an erroneous ruling that no temporary transfer of custody had occurred.

Consequently, pursuant to the law enunciated by the Court in Overfield, because there was a temporary transfer of custody, the Respondent father carried the burden of proving by clear and convincing evidence that he was a fit parent. 199 W. Va. at 30, 483 S.E.2d at 30, Syl. Pt. 2. After that burden was met, then the burden of proof would shift to the Petitioners "to prove by clear and convincing evidence that the child's environment should not be disturbed because to do so would constitute a significant detriment to the child notwithstanding the natural parent's assertion of a legal right to the child." Id. Because the circuit court's decision in this case was based upon a misapplication of the burden of proof, which stemmed from the court's incorrect finding that a temporary transfer of custody did not occur in this case, we must reverse the decision in this case and remand for further proceedings.

We also find that the circuit court erred in determining that incidents of domestic violence between the Respondent father and the child's deceased mother were not relevant to its determination of the Respondent father's parental fitness. We have consistently found that evidence of domestic violence is relevant to the determination of whether a parent is fit. See Syl. Pt. 1, Henry v. Johnson, 192 W. Va. 82, 86, 450 S.E.2d 779, 783 (1994) (holding that "[c]hildren are often physically assaulted or witness violence against one of their parents and may suffer deep and lasting emotional harm from victimization and from exposure to family violence; consequently, a family law [judge] should take domestic violence into account when making an award of temporary custody[,]" based upon a recognition that "[i]t is clear that where domestic violence is present it should be considered when determining parental fitness."); Nancy Viola R. v. Randolph W., 177 W. Va. 710, 714, 356 S.E.2d 464, 468 (1987) ("We have recognized that spousal abuse is a factor to be considered in determining parental fitness for child custody."); Collins v. Collins, 171 W. Va. 126, 127, 297 S.E.2d 901, 902 (1982) (upholding trial court's decision to grant permanent custody of child to paternal grandparents based, in part, on the trial court's finding that the child's mother had "demonstrated [a] tendency to be violent as evidenced by her willingness to threaten with and to actually shoot a deadly weapon at human beings when she was upset, but not in any way threatened.").

In Nancy Viola R., a maternal aunt sought custody of her nephew after her nephew's father was indicted for first degree murder of the child's mother. Throughout the marriage of the child's parents, the mother had been a victim of repeated acts of violence and abuse by her husband. Prior to the mother's death, she and the child had been separated from the father for four months. 177 W. Va. at 712, 356 S.E.2d at 466. After the mother's death, the child resided with his maternal aunt. During the custody proceeding, the trial court found the father of the child to be fit and that the father, as a fit parent, could designate the child's guardian. The father designated the child's paternal uncle. Id. at 711-12, 356 S.E.2d at 465-66. The father thereafter plead guilty to first degree murder of his wife. The maternal aunt sought reconsideration of the order granting guardianship to the child's paternal uncle. Id. at 712, 356 S.E.2d at 466. When the trial court denied the maternal aunt's motion, she

The issue before the Court on appeal in Nancy Viola R. was whether the father was a fit parent. Id. In resolving that issue, we noted that the father's abuse of his wife was "an important consideration" in the case and similarly "[o]ther courts also regard spousal abuse as an important consideration in child custody cases." Id. at 714, 356 S.E.2d at 468 (citing In re Marriage of Cline, 433 N.E.2d 51, 54 (Ind.Ct.App.1982); In re Marriage of Ballinger, 222 N.W.2d 738, 739 (Iowa 1974); Hosey v. Myers, 240 So.2d 252, 253 (Miss.1970); Schiele v. Sager, 571 P.2d 1142, 1146 (Mont. 1977)). We followed the reasoning of the Supreme Court of Iowa in In re Marriage of Snyder, 241 N.W.2d 733 (Iowa 1976), that "assaults of a spouse reveal violent tendencies which may render a parent unfit for custody of his or her child." 177 W. Va. at 714, 356 S.E.2d at 468. We further noted from the Snyder case that even though there was no evidence that the father had ever abused his child, "the father's 'meanness, aggressiveness, and tendency to[ward] violence expose[d] [the child] to more danger'" than any of the mother's transgressions. Id. at 714, 356 S.E.2d at 468 (quoting, in part, Snyder, 241 N.W.2d at 474). We then found, in Nancy Viola R., that the circuit court erred in finding that the father was a fit parent based not only on the father's first degree murder conviction of the child's mother, but also on "other acts of violence toward . . . [the mother] and threats of violence to the child . . . ."[22] Id. at 716, 356 S.E.2d at 470; see generally Guardianship of Simpson, 79 Cal.Rptr.2d 389, 404 (Cal. Ct. App. 1998) ("Domestic violence is always a serious concern, and any propensity to it is highly relevant as regards children's welfare.").

In the instant case, the burden was on the father to show by clear and convincing evidence that he was a fit parent. Overfield, 199 W. Va. at 30, 483 S.E.2d at 30, Syl. Pt. 2, in part. As previously stated, we have been unwavering in emphasizing the importance that evidence of domestic violence plays in determinations of whether a parent is fit. See Nancy Viola R, 177 W. Va. at 714, 356 S.E.2d at 468. Whether the individual who was the victim of domestic violence is deceased is not the focus of the inquiry, rather the focus is on the individual who demonstrated the violent tendencies in the first instance.

Because the circuit court applied the holding in Whiteman, rather than Overfield, and because the circuit court found the evidence of domestic violence not relevant at the evidentiary hearing that was conducted, we find it is necessary to remand this case. Upon remand, the trial court should consider the petition for guardianship under the applicable law set forth in Overfield. Further, the evidence of domestic violence is relevant to the determination of whether the Respondent father is a fit parent.

IV. Conclusion

Based upon the foregoing, the decision of the circuit court is reversed and this case is remanded for further consideration consistent with this opinion.

SYLLABUS

"Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syllabus Point 1, In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

Per Curiam:

In this appeal from the Circuit Court of Hancock County, the Department of Health and Human Resources appeals a circuit court's order dismissing a petition alleging a father had abused and neglected his daughter. After vesting legal custody of the child with the child's grandmother – a disposition the Department supported – the circuit court determined that further hearings on the petition would be "idiotic" and not in the best interests of the child. The Department asserts that the circuit court was still required to formally determine whether abuse or neglect occurred before the petition could be dismissed.

We find no error in the record, and affirm the circuit court's order.

I.

This case involves D.P.,[1] a child born in January 1995. For most of her life D.P. has lived in the care and custody of her grandmother in Pennsylvania. Her mother died of an apparent drug overdose. Her father, respondent J.W., allegedly threatened the grandmother that if she ever sought formal, legal custody of the child, he would assert his custodial rights and take the child away from her. The grandmother stated she did not have the money necessary to file for legal custody.

[1] Because of the sensitive nature of the facts alleged in this case, we use the initials of the affected parties. See State v. Edward Charles L., 183 W. Va. 641, 645 n. 1, 398 S.E.2d 123, 127 n. 1 (1990) ("Consistent with our practice in cases involving sensitive matters, we use the victim's initials.")

During the summer of 2011, when she was 16 years old, D.P. had an emotional break-up with a boyfriend. She suffered serious mental health issues, and her grandmother took her to an emergency room. A doctor determined she was not a danger to herself and cleared her for discharge, but suggested that she spend a few nights away from her grandmother with an aunt as a "cooling-off" or respite period.

D.P. went to her aunt's home in Pennsylvania, but was not allowed to take her pets with her. D.P. refused to stay at her aunt's without her pets and, in desperation, called her father J.W. in West Virginia to come and get her. On August 2, 2011, J.W. went to Pennsylvania and drove D.P. and her pets back to his West Virginia home.

On August 7th – after "residing" with her father for a total of five days – D.P. was taken into emergency protective custody by the Department of Health and Human Resources. The Department thereafter filed a petition to find that D.P. was abused and/or neglected by J.W. The petition alleged that J.W. furnished alcohol to D.P. in his home; that J.W. had been arrested for driving under the influence with D.P. in the car, and that the officer had simultaneously cited D.P. for underage consumption; and that D.P. had awoken after drinking to find a naked man on her bedroom floor and a hickey on her neck from this man. The petition also alleged that D.P.'s father had told other teenagers they could do whatever they wanted to D.P. in exchange for marijuana. D.P. later tested positive for the drugs marijuana and klonopin.[2]

[2] Klonopin is a benzodiazepine that helps control seizures and panic attacks. A police officer found an empty prescription bottle for klonopin in J.W.'s house. The prescription, written for J.W.'s girlfriend, had been filled on July 27, 2011. The girlfriend was incarcerated, and the prescription had supposedly been filled so she would

A multi-disciplinary team meeting was convened on August 26, 2011. The meeting included D.P.'s guardian ad litem, the Department's caseworker, the caseworker's supervisor, J.W.'s counsel, and D.P.'s grandmother, aunt, and uncle. D.P.'s father, J.W., was not present because he had been extradited to Pennsylvania to face charges there. The multi-disciplinary team unanimously agreed that the child should be promptly returned home with her grandmother. The team determined that the most expeditious way to return the child was to have the grandmother, by separate petition, file for legal guardianship of the child. The team also unanimously agreed to recommend to the circuit court that the abuse and neglect petition should be dismissed.

Subsequently, on September 28, 2011, the circuit court – after finding it was in the child's best interest – formally appointed D.P.'s grandmother as her legal guardian.

The child's guardian ad litem moved to dismiss the abuse and neglect petition, because at the multi-disciplinary team meeting, it had been agreed by all parties – including the Department – that the petition could interfere with the grandmother's legal guardianship under the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children. See, W.Va. Code § 49-2A-1 et seq. The Department, however, changed its position and objected to the dismissal, ostensibly because J.W. might, in the future, attempt to reassert his rights to custody of D.P. The Department therefore wanted to proceed with a full adjudication of the petition.

have her medication when she was released. J.W. could not explain why there were no pills in the bottle.

After several hearings, the circuit court dismissed the abuse and neglect petition in an order dated January 13, 2012. The circuit court noted that the child had lived in West Virginia for less than a week before the petition was filed, and that her only other contact with her father had been "trivial." "[E]xcept for his brief and deplorable contact with his daughter when the negligent acts occurred, [J.W.] never played any meaningful role in his daughter's life." The circuit court also noted that D.P. had mental health issues that might be exacerbated if she were required to testify, and noted that she was nearing the age of majority (she will turn 18 in January 2013).

Based on these facts, the circuit court determined that J.W. "didn't have a snowball's chance in hell of ever regaining custody" of his daughter, D.P., and that "it was idiotic to subject [D.P.] to a worthless Adjudicatory Hearing where she would have to testify about what had happened to her." The circuit court acknowledged the diligence of the Department's case workers, but went on to note that the Department's argument in this case was nothing more than a "Department policy." In light of the facts, the circuit court found the Department's argument was "absurd," and found the local caseworkers were merely "compelled . . . to parrot the position of the Department." The circuit court concluded that "blind adherence" to a generic policy to pursue every petition to a full adjudication was not in D.P.'s best interests.

The Department now appeals the January 13, 2012, dismissal order.

II.

We apply the following multi-faceted standard of review:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

Syllabus Point 1, In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

When a circuit court examines an abuse and neglect petition, W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(1) [2011] requires the court to "give precedence to dispositions in the following sequence: (1) Dismiss the petition." Still, when a petition alleging abuse and/or neglect has been filed, the circuit court must hold hearings to determine whether the child has been abused or neglected. See Syllabus Point 1, State v. T.C., 172 W.Va. 47, 303 S.E.2d 685 (1983). It is axiomatic that, in any contest involving the care and custody of a minor, "the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided." Syllabus Point 2, State ex rel. Lipscomb v. Joplin, 131 W.Va. 302, 47 S.E.2d 221 (1948). See also Syllabus Point 3, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996) ("Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children.")

In the instant case, the circuit court afforded the parties several hearings, and the initial position of all of the parties was that the petition should be dismissed. It was only after the child had been placed with her grandmother as legal custodian (a disposition agreed to by the Department) that the Department changed its position and asserted that further hearings were necessary. The circuit court provided the Department with a "meaningful opportunity to be heard," as required by W.Va. Code § 49-6-2(c) [2006]. At no time did the Department justify how the child's health, welfare or best interests would be promoted by further adjudication on the petition.[3]

We believe that the circuit court was within its right when it found that the Department had asserted procedure over substance. After carefully reviewing the record, it is clear that the circuit court did not err in its finding that full adjudication of the petition was not in the best interests of D.P.

III.

The circuit court's January 13, 2012, order is affirmed.

Affirmed.

[3] For a contrary example, see In re: T.W., ___ W.Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (No. 11-1628, Nov. 14, 2012), where the Department raised grievous allegations of abuse and neglect against a father of four children. The father voluntarily consented to termination of parental rights to two children, on condition that the circuit court not conduct hearings. The circuit court granted the voluntary termination. This Court reversed, finding that the potential existed for future visitation between the parent and the two children to whom parental rights were not terminated. In T.W., the Department demonstrated that it was in the best interests of all four children for the circuit court to conduct full hearings.

CHIEF JUSTICE DAVIS and JUSTICE MAYNARD dissent and reserve the right to file dissenting opinions.

1. "Where the issue on an appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of law or involving an interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review." Syl. Pt. 1, Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., 194 W. Va. 138, 459 S.E.2d 415 (1995).

2. "Because the purpose of an abuse and neglect proceeding is remedial, where the parent or guardian fails to respond to probative evidence offered against him/her during the course of an abuse and neglect proceeding, a lower court may properly consider that individual's silence as affirmative evidence of that individual's culpability." Syl. Pt. 2, West Virginia Dept. of Health and Human Resources ex rel. Wright v. Doris S., 197 W. Va. 489, 475 S.E.2d 865 (1996).

3. West Virginia Code § 49-7-1 (2000) (Repl. Vol. 2001) provides no meaningful protection of confidentiality or privilege for statements made by an accused in an abuse and neglect proceeding and is, in fact, designed to facilitate the dissemination of information to those charged with the public duty of prosecuting those who may be or are accused of criminal conduct.

4. """'A statute should be so read and applied as to make it accord with the spirit, purposes and objects of the general system of law of which it is intended to form a part;

it being presumed that the legislators who drafted and passed it were familiar with all existing law, applicable to the subject matter, whether constitutional, statutory or common, and intended the statute to harmonize completely with the same and aid in the effectuation of the general purpose and design thereof, if its terms are consistent therewith.' Syllabus Point 5, State v. Snyder, 64 W.Va. 659, 63 S.E. 385 (1908)." Syl. Pt. 1, State ex rel. Simpkins v. Harvey, [172] W.Va. [312], 305 S.E.2d 268 (1983).' Syl. Pt. 3, Shell v. Bechtold, 175 W.Va. 792, 338 S.E.2d 393 (1985)." Syl. Pt. 1, State v. White, 188 W. Va. 534, 425 S.E.2d 210 (1992).

5. ""'In ascertaining legislative intent, effect must be given to each part of the statute and to the statute as a whole so as to accomplish the general purpose of the legislation." Syl. Pt. 2, Smith v. State Workmen's Compensation Commissioner, 159 W.Va. 108, 219 S.E.2d 361 (1975).' Syl. Pt. 3, State ex rel. Fetters v. Hott, 173 W.Va. 502, 318 S.E.2d 446 (1984)." Syl. Pt. 2, State v. White, 188 W. Va. 534, 425 S.E.2d 210 (1992).

6. "No evidence that is acquired from a parent or any other person having custody of a child, as a result of medical or mental examinations performed in the course of civil abuse and neglect proceedings, may be used in any subsequent criminal proceedings against such person. W.Va.Code § 49-6-4(a) (1992)." Syl. Pt. 3, State v. James R., II, 188 W. Va. 44, 422 S.E.2d 521 (1992).

7. West Virginia Code § 49-6-4 (1984) (Repl. Vol. 2001) was intended to constitute a full and comprehensive prohibition against criminal utilization of information obtained through court-ordered psychological or psychiatric examination, whether for diagnosis, therapy, or other treatment of any nature ordered in conjunction with abuse and neglect proceedings.

8. If a trial court, in the course of an abuse and neglect proceeding, requires by its order that an accused submit to an examination by a person proposed by any party as an expert who is neither a physician, psychologist or psychiatrist, such an examination is conducted under warrant of law and is, accordingly, subject to the prohibitions of West Virginia Code § 57-2-3 (1965) (Repl. Vol. 1997). To the extent that our holding in State ex rel. Wright v. Stucky, 205 W. Va. 171, 517 S.E.2d 36 (1999), conflicts with our holding here regarding the protections afforded by West Virginia Code § 57-2-3, Stucky is hereby modified to exclude from its holding court-ordered examinations in abuse and neglect proceedings.

9. In an abuse and neglect proceeding, an accused required by court order to undergo an examination by an expert who is neither a physician, psychologist, or psychiatrist is entitled to have the trial court's determinations regarding the protections afforded by West Virginia Code § 57-2-3 (1965) (Repl. Vol. 1997) set forth in a protective order for future reference.

10. "At the conclusion of the improvement period, the court shall review the performance of the parents in attempting to attain the goals of the improvement period and shall, in the court's discretion, determine whether the conditions of the improvement period have been satisfied and whether sufficient improvement has been made in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child." Syl. Pt. 6, In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

11. "When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest." Syl. Pt. 5, In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995).

Albright, Justice:

This is an appeal by Daniel D.[1] (hereinafter "Appellant") from an order of the Circuit Court of Marion County terminating his parental rights to two children, Daniel D., Jr., and Samantha D. The Appellant contends that the lower court erred in terminating his parental rights and by violating his due process rights. Having thoroughly reviewed the briefs, record, and arguments of counsel, we reverse the termination of the Appellant's parental rights and remand with directions to permit the Appellant to participate in one additional improvement period designed to facilitate therapeutic evaluation and treatment, if desired by the Appellant, and to consider what post-termination visitation, if any, is appropriate in the event that termination of parental rights is imposed.

I. Facts and Procedural History

On October 24, 1999, the maternal grandmother of Daniel D., then age two, and Samantha D., then age four, contacted the West Virginia Child Abuse Hotline, reporting that Samantha D. had informed her that the Appellant, Samantha's father, had put his penis in her mouth several times. The allegations were investigated by the West Virginia Department of [1]Consistent with our practice in cases involving sensitive facts, we identify the parties by initial only. See In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 26 n.1, 435 S.E.2d 162, 164 n. 1 (1993).

Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR")[2] and a petition for abuse and neglect was filed on December 30, 1999.[3]

A preliminary hearing was conducted before the lower court on January 18, 2000. Samantha testified regarding the abuse, explaining the details of the sexual actions and reciting explicit descriptions of her father's actions. Psychologist Terry Laurita testified that she had evaluated Samantha and had confirmed that she had been sexually abused by her father. Ms. Laurita also testified concerning the inappropriate sexual knowledge Samantha possessed for her age. On February 23, 2000, the lower court conducted an adjudicatory hearing at which the Appellant continued to exercise his right to remain silent. Ms. Laurita opined that the Appellant would be incapable of providing the children with the support they needed if no admission of the abuse was made. She further opined that any contact between the Appellant and Samantha would send an unhealthy message to the child. At the conclusion of the adjudicatory hearing, the lower court found that the Appellant had sexually abused Samantha, denied visitation to the Appellant, granted him a three-month improvement period, and suggested a psychological evaluation and assessment of his parenting skills.

[2]Rebekah Bledsoe, a representative of the DHHR, and Doris James, a Marion County Sheriff's Department Detective, investigated the report and concluded that there was sufficient evidence to substantiate the report of sexual abuse and justify the filing of an abuse and neglect petition against the Appellant.

[3]The petition also alleged alcohol and substance abuse by the Appellant.

During the improvement period, the Appellant underwent psychological evaluations by licensed psychologist Ronald D. Pearse. The Appellant denied the allegations of sexual abuse during these evaluations. Subsequent to the April 2000 testing,[4] the evaluator recommended that the Appellant have no unsupervised visitation with the children and concluded as follows:

> Mr. [D.] continues to deny the sexual abuse charges. However, records indicate an evaluation was completed of his daughter indicating a fairly clear-cut case of sexual abuse. Keeping the safety of his children in mind, it is not recommended that Mr. [D.] have any unsupervised visits. He is not a good candidate for treatment at this time due to his inability to admit to any sexual molestation that occurred.

On May 31, 2000, the lower court granted the Appellant a ninety-day extension of his improvement period and denied his request for visitation. On June 13, 2000, the Appellant was indicted for first degree sexual assault; sexual abuse by a parent, guardian, or custodian; and incest. Due to the pending criminal charges, the Appellant continued to exercise his right to remain silent during further meetings associated with the abuse and neglect proceedings. On August 28, 2000, the lower court denied the Appellant's request for an additional ninety-day improvement period and denied his request for visitation with the children.

[4]Some of the tests were deemed invalid due to a finding that the Appellant "was attempting to present himself in a favorable light" and "was not being open and honest during the evaluation." The testing also revealed that the Appellant's "defensiveness scores were significantly elevated. This indicates that he may have been attempting to minimize his problem. His answers indicated that he likely has emotional problems and/or a behavioral disorder."

The lower court conducted a dispositional hearing on November 28, 2000, at which Ms. Laurita testified that Samantha had consistently identified the Appellant as her abuser. Ms. Laurita further testified that it was essential that the Appellant participate in therapy and that in order to obtain treatment as a sexual offender, it was imperative that the Appellant admit to the abuse and request treatment. Despite the fact that the court had provided the Appellant with improvement periods, he had not admitted the abuse and had not begun treatment or counseling. Ms. Melissa Pickens of DHHR testified that despite the offer of reasonable services to the Appellant, he had not availed himself of such services and had made no attempt to seek treatment. Ms. Pickens explained that due to the Appellant's denial that abuse had occurred, the DHHR did not know of any services which could be provided to assist the Appellant or reunify the family. Ms. Pickens further opined that the Appellant had not utilized his improvement periods and that reunification was not in the best interests of the children.

The lower court terminated the Appellant's parental rights to Samantha and Daniel by orders dated February 5, 2001. The lower court order reiterated the prior evidence, testimony, and evaluations and concluded that there was no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse could be substantially corrected in the near future. The court noted that

"[c]ourts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened. . . ."[5] The court further recognized that it was compelled to review the degree to which the Appellant had attempted to attain goals in the improvement period and whether sufficient improvement had been made. The court explained that "[i]n the difficult balance which must be fashioned between the rights of the parent and the welfare of the child," the child's rights prevail.

The Appellant appeals the determination of the lower court, maintaining that his due process rights were violated by the lower court's reliance upon his denial of the abuse and unwillingness to undergo treatment as a basis for the termination of parental rights.

[5]The lower court cited In re Lacey P., 189 W. Va. 580, 433 S.E.2d 518 (1993), for this proposition. Syllabus point one of Lacey provides:

> "'[C]ourts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and this is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illness, need consistent close interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by numerous placements.' In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980)." Syllabus point 1, Interest of Darla B., 175 W.Va. 137, 331 S.E.2d 868 (1985).

This case raises issues of constitutional rights and statutory interpretation. This Court indicated in Phillip Leon M. v. Greenbrier County Board of Education, 199 W. Va. 400, 484 S.E.2d 909 (1996), that "[b]ecause interpretations of the West Virginia Constitution, along with interpretations of statutes and rules, are primarily questions of law, we apply a de novo review." Id. at 404, 484 S.E.2d at 913. In syllabus point one of Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., 194 W.Va. 138, 459 S.E.2d 415 (1995), we also explained: "Where the issue on an appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of law or involving an interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review."

III. The Hobson's Choice[6]

The Appellant raises an issue concerning the classic dilemma confronted by the individual encountering charges in both civil and criminal contexts. He exercised his Fifth Amendment right to silence in the underlying abuse and neglect proceedings in order to protect himself from incrimination in the pending criminal case. Based in substantial part upon his silence and the absence of treatment potential for an individual maintaining silence, the Appellant's parental rights were terminated.

[6]The standard Hobson's Choice refers to a choice without an alternative. Reference to a "Hobson's Choice" is said to have originated with a Thomas Hobson, a livery stable owner in Cambridge, England, who purportedly required every customer to take either the horse closest to the door or none at all.

This scenario has been recurrently addressed, and definitive themes have emerged in the methods by which courts have resolved the Fifth Amendment allegations of individuals facing parallel issues in civil and criminal contexts. The Minnesota Court of Appeals addressed this dilemma in In re S.A.V., 392 N.W.2d 260 (Minn. Ct. App. 1986), wherein a trial court had ordered the allegedly abusive parents to attend parenting classes and psychological counseling. The father contended on appeal that the order requiring his admission in psychological evaluation violated his privilege against self-incrimination. The Minnesota court rejected his argument based upon the fact that the termination of parental rights was not a sanction for refusal to testify and that the termination was "simply the necessary result of failure to rectify parental deficiencies." Id. at 264.

The Minnesota Supreme Court addressed a similar issue in In re J.W., 415 N.W.2d 879 (Minn. 1987), in which the trial court had ordered psychological therapy to include an explanation of the death of the child in question. The prosecutor had indicated that refusal to cooperate would result in the filing of a termination petition. On appeal, the Minnesota court found that while the trial court could not directly require the parents to incriminate themselves in therapy, the state could require therapy generally. If the therapy was thereafter deemed to be ineffective, termination could proceed. "These consequences lie outside the protective ambit of the Fifth Amendment." Id. at 883. The court explained:

> What the parents would like to claim, although of course they cannot, is that their responsibility for the death of a child and the inferences arising therefrom is privileged and may not be considered in determining their suitability as parents. But to state > this proposition is to refute it. Not only does the proposition ignore the fact that the evidence of responsibility has already been received but it ignores the best interests of the children.

Id. at 884. The court reasoned: "In the lexicon of the Fifth Amendment, the risk of losing the children for failure to undergo meaningful therapy is neither a 'threat' nor a 'penalty' imposed by the state. It is simply a consequence of the reality that it is unsafe for children to be with parents who are abusive and violent." Id; see also In re J.G.W., 433 N.W.2d 885 (Minn. 1989).

Similarly, in New Jersey Division of Youth and Family Services v. S.S., 645 A.2d 1213 (N.J. 1994), the reviewing court held that requiring a mother to rebut prima facie evidence of abuse did not violate her Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination. The New Jersey court relied upon In re S., 322 N.Y.S.2d 170 (Fam.Ct. 1971), in which the following reasoning was utilized:

> There is no mandatory requirement that they take the stand and testify. That would be unconstitutional. The constraint upon respondent to give testimony arises here simply from the force of circumstances and not from any form of compulsion forbidden by the Constitution. . . .
> It may be a difficult decision for the respondents and their attorneys. [But] it is a question of procedure and legal options for the defense, not one of the constitutionality of incrimination. . . .

Id. at 1217 (quoting In re S., 322 N.Y.S.2d at 177-78).

The Nebraska court grappled with this issue of refusal to speak in an abuse and neglect proceeding based upon fear of incrimination in In re Clifford M., 577 N.W.2d 547 (Neb. 1998). The Nebraska court held, in this issue of first impression for that court, that parental rights could not be terminated based solely upon the refusal to waive the right against self-incrimination. In so holding, the court noted that a review of other states' authority indicated:

> that there is a very fine, although very important, distinction between terminating parental rights based specifically upon a refusal to waive protections against self-incrimination and terminating parental rights based upon a parent's failure to comply with an order to obtain meaningful therapy or rehabilitation, perhaps in part because a parent's failure to acknowledge past wrongdoing inhibits meaningful therapy. The latter is constitutionally permissible; the former is not.

Id. at 554.

In examining possible accommodations for this testimonial dilemma, scholars have opined that the potential for continuing the abuse and neglect action until after the conclusion of the criminal case is not palatable for the obvious reason that prompt disposition of child abuse/neglect proceedings is essential.[7] See generally Jessica Wilen Berg, Note, Give Me Liberty or Give Me Silence: Taking a Stand on Fifth Amendment Implications for

---

[7]In Wehling v. Columbia Broadcasting System, 608 F.2d 1084 (5th Cir. 1979), however, the Fifth Circuit found that a continuance of the civil case until after the accused's criminal responsibility was determined would be an appropriate resolution. Id. at 1089.

Court-Ordered Therapy Programs, 79 Cornell L. Rev. 700 (1994); William Wesley Patton, The World Where Parallel Lines Converge: The Privilege Against Self-Incrimination in Concurrent Civil and Criminal Child Abuse Proceedings, 24 Ga. L. Rev. 473 (1990). This jurisdiction has definitively spoken to that issue, as manifested in Rule 5 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect, wherein it is provided that "[u]nder no circumstances shall a civil protection proceeding be delayed pending the initiation, investigation, prosecution, or resolution of any other proceeding, including, but not limited to, criminal proceedings."

Commentators have observed that providing use immunity is the most practical and efficient method of protecting the privilege against self-incrimination while simultaneously advancing the best interests of the child by granting an inducement for full cooperation and disclosure during the child abuse and neglect proceedings. Patton, The World Where Parallel Lines Converge: The Privilege Against Self-Incrimination in Concurrent Civil and Criminal Child Abuse Proceedings, 24 Ga. L. Rev. at 521-22.[8]

[8]A question has also been raised regarding whether a parent can be impeached during the criminal action with statements made during the abuse and neglect action. "[T]o the extent that use immunity is granted for statements made in court-ordered therapy in order to facilitate family reunification, the precedents indicate that such statements could not later be used to impeach the parents." 24 Ga. L. Rev. at 522; see also New Jersey v. Portash, 440 U.S. 450, 459 (1979) (holding that testimony given under use immunity is "the essence of coerced testimony" and cannot be used for impeachment purposes). In 1972, the United States Supreme Court decided Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441 (1972), concluding that immunity against use and derivative use of incriminatory testimony was sufficient to protect the Fifth Amendment privilege. Id. at 453. The Supreme Court also explained that the granted protection is not dependent upon the good faith of a prosecutor because, subsequent to witness

In In re Jessica B., 254 Cal. Rptr. 883 (1989), a case in which the trial court had refused family reunification because the father had not acknowledged his wrongdoing, the appellate court found that use immunity would preserve the father's privilege against self-incrimination. The California court held as follows:

> The California Constitution requires that a person proceeding simultaneously in the criminal courts for child abuse and the juvenile court regarding a dependency of the abused minor should not only be granted use immunity for his or her testimony at dependency proceedings that constitutes an admission to the acts at issue in the criminal case against him or her but also for such statements made during court-ordered therapy. Under the circumstances of this case, such an immunity is essential to the constitutional privilege against self-incrimination and facilitates the goal of protecting the best interest of the minor and achieving the reunification of the family at the earliest possible date.

Id. at 893-94.

Similarly, in In re Eduardo A., 261 Cal. Rptr. 68 (1989), procedural protections were afforded to individuals caught in this labyrinth. In that case, the California court addressed the patient-psychotherapist privilege and found that the legislature had intended to abrogate the privilege only in the context of examinations ordered by the court as an initial investigative tool, but did not intend to abrogate the privilege in the context of disclosure that he or she testified under a grant of immunity, the prosecution has the burden to show that the evidence being used came from legitimate sources, "wholly independent of the compelled testimony." Id. at 460.

psychotherapeutic treatment. Id. at 71. "It would be unreasonable to expect a patient to freely participate in such treatment if he knew that what he said and what the therapist learned from what he said could all be revealed in court." Id. at 70.

Protective or limiting orders may also be utilized in conjunction with the grant of use immunity. In State v. Decker, 842 P.2d 500 (Wash. Ct. App. 1992), for instance, the court addressed the a tribunal's inherent authority to issue protective orders and affirmed the use of a protective order entered regarding a predisposition psychological evaluation. Id. at 503.

IV. West Virginia's Statutory Guidance

A. Language of the Statutes

In attempting to reconcile the competing interests involved in the case sub judice, we are assisted, to some extent, by the substance of West Virginia Code § 49-6-4(a) (1984) (Repl. Vol. 2001), West Virginia Code § 57-2-3 (1965) (Repl. Vol. 1997), and West Virginia Code § 49-7-1 (2000) (Repl. Vol. 2001). While the Appellant acknowledges the existence of certain protections contained in these statutes, he contends that such protections are inadequate to permit the full exercise of his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination and the vigorous defense of his parental rights.

West Virginia Code § 49-6-4(a) addresses medical and mental examinations in the child abuse and neglect proceeding and provides as follows:

> (a) At any time during proceedings under this article the court may, upon its own motion or upon motion of the child or other parties, order the child or other parties to be examined by a physician, psychologist or psychiatrist, and may require testimony from such expert, subject to cross-examination and the rules of evidence: Provided, That the court shall not terminate parental or custodial rights of a party solely because the party refuses to submit to the examination, nor shall the court hold such party in contempt for refusing to submit to an examination. The physician, psychologist or psychiatrist shall be allowed to testify as to the conclusions reached from hospital, medical, psychological or laboratory records provided the same are produced at the hearing. The court by order shall provide for the payment of all such expert witnesses. If the child, parent or custodian is indigent, such witnesses shall be compensated out of the treasury of the State, upon certificate of the court wherein the case is pending. No evidence acquired as a result of any such examination of the parent or any other person having custody of the child may be used against such person in any subsequent criminal proceedings against such person.

W. Va. Code § 49-6-4(a) (emphasis supplied). West Virginia Code § 57-2-3 provides additional protection, as follows: "In a criminal prosecution other than for perjury or false swearing, evidence shall not be given against the accused of any statement made by him as a witness upon a legal examination." Finally, West Virginia Code § 49-7-1 provides generally for confidentiality of records concerning a child which may be accumulated by DHHR.[9] [9]Section 49-7-1 provides in that records "concerning a child or juvenile which are maintained by the division of juvenile services, the department of health and human resources, a child agency or facility, court or law-enforcement agency shall be kept (continued...)

B. This Court's Prior Consideration of Pertinent Statutes

This Court addressed the statutory protections in West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ex rel. Wright v. Doris S., 197 W.Va. 489, 475 S.E.2d 865 (1996), as they affect the issue of utilization of evidence in the civil and criminal contexts against the interests of a parent also accused of a crime related to the alleged abuse and neglect of children. This Court explained:

> Such a parent or guardian may be invoking his/her right to remain silent pursuant to the Fifth Amendment because that individual also may be facing criminal charges arising out of the abuse and neglect of the child. The rights of the criminally accused are sufficiently protected, however, by the following statutory provisions: 1) West Virginia Code § 49-6-4(a) (1995) which allows medical and mental examinations of the child or other parties involved in an abuse and neglect proceeding provides that "[n]o evidence acquired as a result of any such examination of the parent or any other person having custody of the child may be used against such person in any subsequent criminal proceedings against such person; 2) West Virginia Code § 49-7-1 (1995) provides that "[a]ll records of the state department, the court and its officials, law-enforcement agencies and other agencies or facilities concerning a child as defined in this chapter shall be kept confidential and shall not be released . . . [;]" and 3) West Virginia Code § 57-2-3 (1966) provides that "[i]n a criminal prosecution other than for perjury or false swearing, evidence shall not be given against the accused of any statement made by him as a witness upon a legal examination."

confidential and shall not be released or disclosed to anyone, including any federal or state agency." The statute contains numerous exceptions.

In Wright, a case involving the death of child, this Court reviewed the authorities supporting "the prevailing rule that the Fifth Amendment does not forbid adverse inferences against parties to civil actions when they refuse to testify in response to probative evidence offered against them." Id. at 498, 475 S.E.2d at 874, quoting Baxter v. Palmigiano, 425 U.S. 308, 318 (1976).[10] In light of that review of authorities, this Court held as follows in syllabus point two of Wright:

> Because the purpose of an abuse and neglect proceeding is remedial, where the parent or guardian fails to respond to probative evidence offered against him/her during the course of an abuse and neglect proceeding, a lower court may properly consider that individual's silence as affirmative evidence of that individual's culpability.

Id. at 492, 475 S.E.2d at 868.

[10]This Court explained as follows in Wright:

> There is no basis in law for requiring that a court be disallowed from considering a parent's or guardian's choice to remain silent as evidence of civil culpability. Moreover, the invocation of silence by a parent or guardian in an abuse and neglect proceeding goes to the heart of the treatability question which is essential in these cases, as the nature of the proceedings is remedial and not punitive. Thus, in order to remedy the abuse and/or neglect problem, the problem must first be acknowledged. Failure to acknowledge the existence of the problem, i.e., the truth of the basic allegation pertaining to the alleged abuse and neglect or the perpetrator of said abuse and neglect, results in making the problem untreatable and in making an improvement period an exercise in futility at the child's expense.

C. Application of the Statutes to the Appellant's Case

We are satisfied that this rule allowing a trial court to consider one's silence as affirmative evidence of culpability, as set forth in Wright, is soundly supported by the authorities and is consistent with the policy of this State which encourages prompt hearing of abuse and neglect cases and a paramount concern for the best interests of the children involved in such proceedings. We are also satisfied that the rule does not offend the protections against self-incrimination afforded by the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States and Article III, Section 5 of our State Constitution. As applied to the issue of culpability, the rule simply confronts the accused parent with a choice: Assert the privilege against self-incrimination with the risk that silence will be considered in the civil proceeding as evidence of culpability, or waive the privilege and offer such evidence as the accused may alone possess to refute the charge of abuse and neglect.

The Appellant argues, however, that this Court was in error when it concluded in Wright that the statutory protections cited in Wright are sufficient to permit Appellant's full and proper exercise of the right against self incrimination guaranteed to him by the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States and by Article III, Section 5 of our State Constitution. The Appellant contends that the statutes relied upon in Wright do not protect him in all of the circumstances which might arise if he undertook a vigorous effort to maintain his parental rights and prevent their termination in the abuse and neglect proceedings. The Appellant maintains that participation in interviews with DHHR workers, participation in multi-disciplinary team meetings and submission to treatment, as contrasted with mere diagnostic examinations, by medical or other professional personnel are not within the scope of the protections afforded by the statutes relied upon in Wright. The Appellant further argues that none of the statutes protects him against the use of evidence gathered in the abuse and neglect proceedings to impeach any testimony offered against him in a subsequent criminal proceeding involving his alleged abuse and neglect of the children.

To address the Appellant's claims, we will discuss each relevant statute. West Virginia Code § 49-7-1, as quoted in pertinent part above, is a statute providing generally for the confidentiality of records of the Department of Health and Human Resources accumulated in abuse and neglect cases. The statute is replete with exceptions, including exceptions directing release of the information to "law-enforcement agencies and prosecuting attorneys, . . . [a] grand jury, circuit court or family law master. . . ." We find that West Virginia Code § 49-7-1 provides no meaningful protection of confidentiality or privilege for statements made by an accused in an abuse and neglect proceeding and is, in fact, designed to facilitate the dissemination of information to those charged with the public duty of prosecuting those who may be or are accused of criminal conduct.

The remaining statutes at issue appear to provide some substantive protection to those involved in abuse and neglect cases who may also be charged with crime related to the alleged abuse and neglect. The Appellee argues that these protective statutes provide adequate opportunity for a parent accused of abuse and neglect and also accused of a crime arising from any such alleged abuse and neglect to exercise rights against self-incrimination in the criminal proceeding. The Appellee further argues that the protections adequately balance the paramount interest of the State in the protection of children with the right of the Appellant against self-incrimination. The Appellee contends that those protective statutes therefore do not unconstitutionally deprive the Appellant of those rights. Finally, the Appellee argues that if the lower court is reversed "[t]he entire system for resolving abuse cases would be destroyed."

We do not shrink from a close examination of the Appellant's claims because of this warning of dire results. We share the view of the lower court that the issues raised by the Appellant present a very difficult situation. The trial court addressed the complexity of this issue on at least three separate occasions, as evidenced by the record of the proceedings below. During the February 23, 2000, adjudicatory hearing, the lower court astutely observed as follows:

> I think we - - in cases of this nature and specifically in this case, we put the father between the proverbial rock and a hard place in the sense that we tell him to go for clinical diagnosis, but he knows going in that anything he says which may incriminate him may be used against him at a later time.
> And so if he does - - faces the prospect of criminal charges, if he does exercise his right not to make a statement, which - - which is a constitutional right, then that can be used against him to say, "Well, no improvement period. We're going to terminate your custodial rights." I think in this case inasmuch as the child has never been removed from her mother and is being placed with her mother and will remain there. That there's - - > there's no harm to be done by granting the father an improvement period just for the simple - - I don't think this Court or any Court has any way of getting him out of the situation he's in now, and that is choosing between losing his child or making admissions which my subject him to criminal penalties. . . . I'm hesitant about totally terminating his parental rights because counsel properly advised him that if the - - these matters could be used against him, and he exercised his Fifth Amendment Rights.

During a May 31, 2000, hearing at the termination of one of the improvement periods, this issue was again raised, and the lower court stated:

> I think he's in that place that we refer to between a rock and a hard place, and that is if he - - the only way he can see the children is to admit it - - admit the sexual abuse. And if he admits the sexual abuse, he's looking at criminal charges - - an admission in criminal charges.

During the November 28, 2000, dispositional hearing, the lower court explained:

> The Court is - - again recognizes the situation the father's in. He's not been tried yet and obviously would not be to his best interest in the criminal proceeding to - - to admit the acting in this proceeding.

If the protective statutes are narrowly read and applied, it appears to this Court that they do, in fact, provide little comfort to an accused abuser who desires (1) not to waive his right against self-incrimination, and (2) make a bona fide effort to fully participate in the process established for resolving abuse and neglect cases, including remedial examination and treatment. While the Appellee asserts in its brief that "it can be argued that" the protections of West Virginia Code § 57-2-3 could apply to Multi-Disciplinary Team proceedings, the

Appellee did not so concede, and the Appellant, at the lower court level, had every reason to fear that the Appellee would not so concede in his upcoming criminal prosecution.[11]

We recognize that if the statutes are construed to provide protections only for statements made in diagnostic examinations by a physician, psychiatrist or psychologist and to legal examinations had under oath, then the protections they offer may be seen as illusory. We likewise recognize that those statutes cannot, under any circumstances, operate to protect a criminal defendant's statements in an abuse and neglect proceeding from subsequent use in a criminal proceeding in any and all circumstances. Nevertheless, the statutes appear to [11]Similarly, the Appellant fears that statements made in the abuse and neglect process may be used to impeach his testimony in a subsequent criminal proceeding; the Appellee proves that fear legitimate by arguing to this Court that State v. Williams, 171 W. Va. 556, 301 S.E.2d 187 (1983), requires the admission of prior statements proffered to impeach Appellant's testimony. However, we do not perceive that the possibility of using Appellant's prior statements in an abuse and neglect proceeding to impeach his testimony in a later criminal trial unduly interferes with a bona fide effort by one so accused to participate vigorously in an abuse and neglect proceeding. It may be presumed that one electing to testify in one's criminal trial intends to testify truthfully, thereby minimizing the need to use prior statements to impeach that testimony. Secondly, we do not read Williams as overruling State v. Price, 113 W. Va. 326, 167 S.E. 862 (1933). In Price, this Court expressly disapproved the use of evidence given in a preliminary hearing to impeach testimony given in the ultimate trial of the case. Id. at 330, 167 S.E. at 864. Finally, we perceive that, in light of the express provisions of West Virginia Code § 49-6-4(a) and West Virginia Code § 57-2-3, a criminal defendant electing to exercise the privilege against self-incrimination in the criminal trial may be adequately protected from having necessary prior statements in the abuse and neglect proceeding utilized in the criminal trial.

provide substantial protections in this regard if carefully observed and liberally construed to achieve the remedial purposes for which it appears they were enacted.

D. Liberal Construction

With specific reference to West Virginia Code § 49-6-4(a), that statute provides that no evidence acquired as a result a parent or other person having custody of a child being examined by a physician, psychologist or psychiatrist under court order may be used against such person in any subsequent criminal proceedings against such person and that the court shall not terminate parental or custodial rights of a party solely because the party refuses to submit to the examination. That statute is supplemented by West Virginia Code § 57-2-3, preventing the use of evidence acquired upon a "legal examination," in subsequent court proceedings other than a prosecution for perjury or false swearing.

In the case sub judice, in a slight variation on this proposition, the lower court took evidence from a psychologist to the effect that there was no hope of correcting the conditions of abuse because the Appellant, in the exercise of his privilege against self-incrimination, failed to admit the abuse during a psychological examination and argued that the statutes did not adequately protect him. We believe that the Appellant's argument has merit if the statutes are narrowly construed, but that the remedial purposes of the statutes require a broader construction.

Our abuse and neglect statutes contemplate reasonable and timely efforts being made during the course of the abuse and neglect proceedings to achieve a correction of the conditions creating the abuse or neglect. Moreover, there is little doubt that the Appellant's silence regarding the conditions of abuse – in essence, his failure to take part in the examination ordered by the lower court at least to the extent of discussing those conditions with the examining psychologist – contributed materially to the trial court's decision here to terminate parental rights.

As we contrast the design of our abuse and neglect statutes to provide reasonable and timely efforts to correct conditions creating abuse and neglect with the dilemma created by the Appellant's silence, we are guided by the holding of this Court in syllabus point one of State v. White, 188 W.Va. 534, 425 S.E.2d 210 (1992):

> "'"A statute should be so read and applied as to make it accord with the spirit, purposes and objects of the general system of law of which it is intended to form a part; it being presumed that the legislators who drafted and passed it were familiar with all existing law, applicable to the subject matter, whether constitutional, statutory or common, and intended the statute to harmonize completely with the same and aid in the effectuation of the general purpose and design thereof, if its terms are consistent therewith." Syllabus Point 5, State v. Snyder, 64 W.Va. 659, 63 S.E. 385 (1908).' Syl. Pt. 1, State ex rel. Simpkins v. Harvey, [172] W.Va. [312], 305 S.E.2d 268 (1983)." Syl. Pt. 3, Shell v. Bechtold, 175 W.Va. 792, 338 S.E.2d 393 (1985).

> "'In ascertaining legislative intent, effect must be given to each part of the statute and to the statute as a whole so as to accomplish the general purpose of the legislation.' Syl. Pt. 2, Smith v. State Workmen's Compensation Commissioner, 159 W.Va. 108, 219 S.E.2d 361 (1975)." Syl. Pt. 3, State ex rel. Fetters v. Hott, 173 W.Va. 502, 318 S.E.2d 446 (1984).

In discussing the protections afforded to the accused individual in State v. James R., II, 188 W. Va. 44, 422 S.E.2d 521 (1992), this Court referenced West Virginia Code § 49-6-4 and explained as follows in syllabus point three: "No evidence that is acquired from a parent or any other person having custody of a child, as a result of medical or mental examinations performed in the course of civil abuse and neglect proceedings, may be used in any subsequent criminal proceedings against such person. W.Va.Code § 49-6-4(a) (1992)."

Our review of the statutes, corresponding case law of this state, and authority from other jurisdictions compels our conclusion that West Virginia Code § 49-6-4 was intended to constitute a full and comprehensive prohibition against criminal utilization of information obtained through court-ordered psychological or psychiatric examination, whether for diagnosis, therapy, or other treatment of any nature ordered in conjunction with abuse and neglect proceedings. Accordingly, we conclude that West Virginia Code § 49-6-4 applies to disclosures in any court-ordered examination of an accused who is a respondent in an abuse and neglect proceeding, whether such disclosures occur in the course of diagnosis or treatment.[12] If a trial court, in the course of an abuse and neglect proceeding, requires by its order that an accused submit to an examination by a person proposed by any party as an expert who is neither a physician, psychologist, or psychiatrist, such an examination is conducted under warrant of law[13] and is, accordingly, subject to the prohibitions of West Virginia Code § 57-2-3.[14] We further hold that, in an abuse and neglect proceeding, an accused required by court order to undergo an examination by an expert who is neither a physician, psychologist, or psychiatrist is entitled to have the trial court's determinations regarding the protections afforded by West Virginia Code § 57-2-3 set forth in a protective order for future reference. We are mindful of this Court's holding in State ex rel. Wright v. Stucky, 205 W.Va. 171, 517 S.E.2d 36 (1999), that neither West Virginia Code § 57-2-3 nor a protective order under Rule 26(c) of the West Virginia rules of Civil Procedure provide use immunity to require a person to answer questions in civil discovery over a claim of the privilege against self-incrimination,

Va. 139, 150, 479 S.E.2d 649, 660 (1996) ("The plain meaning of legislation should be conclusive, except in the rare cases in which the literal application of a statute will produce a result demonstrably at odds with the intentions of the drafters.") (citation and internal quotation marks omitted); syl. pt. 2, Click v. Click, 98 W.Va. 419, 127 S.E. 194 (1925) (holding that it is "the duty of a court to disregard a construction, though apparently warranted by the literal sense of the words in a statute, when such construction would lead to injustice and absurdity").

Fisher proposes that the general psychotherapeutic privilege should apply "where one (or more) is seeking help in the solution of a mental problem caused by psychological and/or environmental pressures from another whose training and status are such as to warrant other persons confiding in him for the purpose of such help." Id. at 617.

remarking in the body of the opinion that the subject statute protects only statements made in court. To the extent that Stucky conflicts with our holding here regarding the protections afforded by West Virginia Code § 57-2-3, Stucky is hereby modified to exclude from its holding court-ordered examinations in abuse and neglect proceedings.[15]

The remedial interpretations adopted by this Court serve a twofold purpose: first, they provide significant protection of the Fifth Amendment rights of the accused; and second, they advance the significant goal of ascertaining truth and appropriate protection of children's rights in abuse and neglect proceedings by removing a potential stumbling block to full and complete disclosure, investigation, and treatment of perpetrators. As this Court has consistently recognized, the primary goal in all abuse and neglect cases must be the health and welfare of the children. In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996). Any operation of the statute which provides less than such constructive, comprehensive protection would be incongruous with the underlying intent of both the statute itself and the goal of abuse and neglect proceedings.

[15]We perceive that examinations by a court-sanctioned expert, whether for diagnosis, therapy or other treatment, are such an integral part of West Virginia's detailed plan for the consideration of abuse and neglect cases and their ultimate impact on family relationships that such examinations, held as they are "under warrant of law" must be treated as "legal examinations," enabling but not requiring an accused parent to fully participate in rehabilitative efforts. Evidence obtained in such examinations may be used in the abuse and neglect proceeding; however, use in a subsequent criminal proceeding, other than for perjury or false swearing, would be excluded under such a protective order.

We emphasize here that these protective statutes apply only to court-ordered examinations. Obviously, there is no basis to extend those protections to investigations prior to the filing of an abuse and neglect proceeding, other contacts with DHHR personnel, or statements made in MDT meetings where numerous persons may be present. In those situations, a parent is left to his or her own judgment whether to speak or remain silent on all or any issue that may arise.

E. Necessity for Remand

The Appellant chose to remain silent in the abuse and neglect proceeding based upon what this Court considers a legitimate concern regarding the clarity and scope of the protective statutes. Based upon the Appellant's decision to remain silent, he was unable to utilize his improvement periods for their intended benefit, as "an opportunity to remedy the existing problems." West Virginia Dept. of Human Serv. v. Peggy F., 184 W.Va. 60, 64, 399 S.E.2d 460, 464 (1990). As this Court explained in syllabus point six of In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991),

> At the conclusion of the improvement period, the court shall review the performance of the parents in attempting to attain the goals of the improvement period and shall, in the court's discretion, determine whether the conditions of the improvement period have been satisfied and whether sufficient improvement has been made in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child.

When the Appellant did not attempt to utilize his improvement period for its intended benefit, the lower court concluded that the Appellant had not demonstrated improvement and found that termination was justified.

We conclude that the Appellant did not utilize his improvement periods and chose to remain silent based upon legitimate legal questions of constitutional dimension. These questions addressed the perceived illusory effect of the statutes discussed herein, questions this Court has now answered for the first time. As we have noted, the trial court shared the Appellant's concerns, but until this Court addressed those concerns the Appellant had no remedy, and the trial court was understandably equally constrained.

Our discussion herein should permit the Appellant to pursue his case more aggressively on remand and permit him to seek full evaluation and treatment, if he desires to prevent termination of his parental rights. On remand, the Appellant should be provided with one additional improvement period. If the Appellant chooses to remain silent, whether based upon the Fifth Amendment or otherwise, then the termination order should stand, based upon the reasoning of the lower court. By this opinion, we have clarified the breadth of the legislative provision and have emphasized that a limiting order could be crafted to identify protected conversations, admissions, evaluations, and treatment to protect the Appellant from the fear that anything expressed in conjunction with the abuse and neglect proceeding will be utilized in the criminal proceeding.[16] Our conclusions herein shall have only prospective application in other cases wherein an order of termination has not been entered.

On remand, the lower court should assess the Appellant's progress at the cessation of this additional improvement period and proceed accordingly, within the discretion of the lower court. The lower court correctly determined that the abuse and neglect could not be remedied without the cooperation and treatment of the Appellant. However, our review of the record compels our conclusion that the Appellant withheld such cooperation and submission to treatment based upon a legitimate concern. That concern having been resolved herein, to the extent possible, the Appellant should be entitled to demonstrate whether he possesses the desire and ability to fully cooperate in a meaningful improvement period.

In so ruling, this Court does not wish to express any preference or opinion regarding the ultimate determination of the lower court on the issue of termination of the Appellant's parental rights or the degree to which the Appellant may be permitted supervised visitation or post-termination visitation.

[16]We also emphasize that a prosecutor handling both the abuse and neglect case and the criminal charges against the same individual must be discreet and judicious in the use of information inculpating the individual, to assure that information gleaned in the abuse and neglect context is not improperly utilized in the criminal prosecution. In State v. James R., II, 188 W. Va. 44, 422 S.E.2d 521 (1992), this Court explained that a prosecutor did not represent conflicting interests by representing the state in a civil abuse and neglect proceeding and subsequently in criminal proceedings against same person. Id. at 46, 422 S.E.2d at 523.

We are also cognizant of the need for final resolution in the lives of these young children. Were these children being placed for adoption or lingering in foster care, we would be less disposed toward extending the additional improvement period to the Appellant. Where the children are securely with their mother, however, we see no impediment to permitting the Appellant the opportunity to participate in a meaningful improvement period, if he so chooses.

If termination is the ultimate result, the possibility of post-termination visitation must also be addressed by the lower court. We directed as follows in syllabus point five of In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995):

> When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest.

RORY L. PERRY II, CLERK
SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS
OF WEST VIRGINIA

Davis, Chief Justice, dissenting:

Daniel D., father of the unfortunate children involved in this case, contends that he was denied due process when the circuit court terminated his parental rights. Daniel D. has argued that he did not have adequate protection against self-incrimination in order to fully participate in the improvement periods extended to him by the circuit court. The majority opinion agreed with Daniel D. and reversed the circuit court's termination orders. Because the majority opinion has not properly applied existing precedent, and, in reaching its ultimate resolution of this case, has utterly and inexcusably failed to consider the best interests of the two innocent children involved, I am compelled to dissent.

Our Prior Holding in State v. James R. Should Have Controlled this Case

The record clearly shows that the evidence established without a doubt that Daniel D. repeatedly sexually abused his four year old daughter.[1] However, the majority opinion has determined that Daniel D. needs yet another opportunity to demonstrate that he has changed and will never again sexually assault his children. This determination is wrong.

The circuit court initially awarded Daniel D. a three month improvement period. During this improvement period, Daniel D. absolutely refused to participate in any activity that would assist in proving he was on the road to recovery. Nevertheless, the circuit court was patient with Daniel D. In fact, the circuit court gave Daniel D. a second three month improvement period. However, Daniel D. once again refused to cooperate in rehabilitation efforts. Faced with unrefutable evidence that Daniel D. had engaged in sexual activities with his adolescent daughter, and further faced with the fact that Daniel D. refused to cooperate with efforts toward rehabilitation, the circuit court fulfilled its obligation under the law to protect the innocent children by terminating Daniel D.'s parental rights. The majority opinion, by reversing the termination orders, has rewarded Daniel D. for refusing efforts of rehabilitation, and has failed to protect the interests of the D. children.[2]

The majority opinion attempts to justify its decision by erroneously asserting that our law is unclear as to whether Daniel D. would have incriminated himself by participating in an improvement period. To this end, the majority opinion crafted the illusion that a new and novel issue was raised in this case. That is, the majority opinion asserted that our law is unclear as to whether a parent in a child abuse and neglect proceeding could meaningfully participate in an improvement period without having such participation used against the parent in a subsequent criminal prosecution. This issue is neither new nor novel. In fact, the exact issue was squarely addressed by the Court in State v. James R., II, 188 W. Va. 44, 422 S.E.2d 521 (1992).

James R. involved a father who was charged, in a civil child abuse and neglect proceeding, with sexually abusing his three children and forcing his wife to engage in sex with their oldest son. The circuit court found that sexual abuse had occurred, but granted the father an improvement period. After the improvement period, criminal charges were brought against the father based upon his sexual abuse of the children. The father motioned the circuit court to disqualify the prosecutor from the criminal proceeding because the prosecutor had taken part in the civil child abuse and neglect proceeding. The circuit court granted the motion. The State appealed the order of disqualification.

This Court held in James R. that the circuit court erroneously disqualified the prosecutor. We explained "a prosecutor does not represent conflicting interests by representing the State first in a civil abuse and neglect proceeding and then in subsequent criminal proceedings against the same person." James R., 188 W. Va. at 47, 422 S.E.2d at 524. The reasoning in James R. was based upon the fact that the prosecutor could not use evidence against the father that had been obtained during the course of the father's cooperation with the requirements of the improvement period. James R. made this point abundantly clear in syllabus point 3 of the opinion:

> No evidence that is acquired from a parent or any other person having custody of a child, as a result of medical or mental examinations performed in the course of civil abuse and neglect proceedings, may be used in any subsequent criminal proceedings against such person. W. Va. Code § 49-6-4(a) (1992).

James R. controlled the disposition of this case. The father in the instant matter alleged that he did not cooperate with the mental health evaluators during the improvement period, because he believed that his cooperation would have been used against him in a criminal proceeding. The contention was baseless. James R. made clear that the father in the instant case could cooperate with authorities during the improvement period, and none of that evidence could be used in any subsequent criminal proceedings. The majority opinion has engaged in a long-winded dissertation to come to the exact same conclusion that was reached in James R.[3] The majority opinion considered its holding unprecedented, which enabled it to conclude that Daniel D. was unaware he could participate in the improvement period without the threat of incriminating himself. In light of the existing precedent of James R., the majority opinion's conclusion in this regard is clearly flawed.[4]

In the final analysis, this case presented a simple issue that this Court previously resolved in James R. The majority opinion elected to ignore James R. by holding that our law was unclear as to the consequences of cooperating with professional authorities during an improvement period. As a result of the majority decision, the lives and mental stability of two innocent children must continue to be held in limbo. Such an outcome is certainly not in these children's best interest. See Syl. pt. 1, in part, In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d > court-ordered psychological examination, whether for diagnosis, therapy, or other treatment of any nature ordered in conjunction with abuse and neglect proceedings.

This construction of W. Va. Code § 49-6-4 constitutes no new law and is nothing more than an unnecessary restatement of syllabus point 3 of James R.

[4]The majority opinion was also disingenuous with its creation of syllabus points 8 and 9. Those syllabus points were intended to hold that when a parent consults with non-medical professionals during an improvement period, the parent's cooperation cannot be used against him or her. Such a holding has no basis in this case. Daniel D. refused to cooperate with the mental health evaluators. The trial court's decision in this case was not based upon the failure to cooperate with anyone else. Thus, the majority opinion should never have addressed a matter that had no application to the facts presented. Similarly, because the Court was not asked in this case to address the question of post-termination visitation, the topic should not have been raised. I am appalled that the majority opinion, nevertheless, seems to suggest that such visitation may be appropriate where a father has sexually abused his child and then unequivocally refused any treatment.

365 (1991) ("Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security. . . ."). Meanwhile, Daniel D. gets to decide for the third time whether or not he is prepared to take responsibility for conduct he was unequivocally found to have committed during the abuse and neglect proceedings. In deciding to allow Daniel D. a third improvement period, the majority opinion has clearly failed in its duty to consider the best interests of the children whose well being is at stake. "'The goal of an improvement period is to facilitate the reunification of families whenever that reunification is in the best interests of the children involved.'" In re Emily, 208 W. Va. 325, 334, 540 S.E.2d 542, 551 (2000) (emphasis added) (quoting State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W. Va. 251, 258, 470 S.E.2d 205, 212 (1996)).

For the reasons stated, I dissent from the majority decision. I am authorized to state that Justice Maynard joins me in this dissenting opinion.

IN RE: DANIELLE T.

No. 23076
Submitted: November 28, 1995

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected." Syl. pt. 2, In re: R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

2. "Parental rights may be terminated where there is clear and convincing evidence that the infant child has suffered extensive physical abuse while in the custody of his or her parents, and there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified and the parents, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, have taken no action to identify the abuser." Per Curiam:
This case is before this Court upon an appeal from the final order of the Circuit Court of Barbour County, West Virginia, entered on May 23, 1995. The case concerns the alleged abuse and neglect of Danielle T., an infant. See footnote 1 The appellant, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter Department), contends that the circuit court committed error in not terminating the parental rights of the appellees, Johnny Ray T. and Peggy Sue T. The final order, which directed the appellant to return Danielle to the appellees, was stayed by this Court pending the outcome of this appeal. For the reasons expressed below, we reverse the final order and terminate the parental rights of the appellees to Danielle.

The facts in this case are distressing. The appellees are the natural parents of Danielle, who was born in May 1990. The appellees, Danielle and the appellees' three other children, Brandy, born in 1984, Ashley, born in 1985, and Dustin, born in 1992, resided in the same household. On February 6, 1994, the appellees brought Danielle, age three, to Davis Memorial Hospital in Elkins, West Virginia. The appellees indicated to hospital authorities that Danielle had been sick for a few days and was unresponsive. Upon an initial medical examination at Davis Memorial Hospital, Danielle was immediately flown to Ruby Memorial Hospital in Morgantown, West Virginia, for more comprehensive treatment.

At Ruby Memorial Hospital, Danielle, emaciated and in shock, was found to have the following medical conditions: (1) pneumonia, (2) scratches and scars on her back, (3) bruises about the head, (4) four missing teeth, (5) missing patches of hair, (6) a cut on one ear, (7) burns upon the inside of both arms, (8) severe dehydration and (9) severe malnutrition. The record indicates that Danielle's state of malnutrition was particularly egregious because it had caused brain damage in addition to its manifestation in the form of visible sores around Danielle's mouth.

The medical evidence indicated that the sores around the mouth were caused by a vitamin deficiency. At the time of her admission to Ruby Memorial Hospital, Danielle was also recovering from surgery conducted in 1993 with regard to a dislocated hip.

On February 17, 1994, the appellant Department, with the assistance of the Barbour County Prosecuting Attorney, filed a petition in circuit court seeking immediate custody of Danielle. The appellant alleged that Danielle was an abused and neglected child. W. Va. Code, 49-1-3 [1994]; W. Va. Code, 49-6-1 [1992], et seq. Moreover, the appellant requested that the appellees' other children undergo a medical examination.

Upon receipt of the petition, and finding the existence of imminent danger to Danielle and the absence of a reasonable alternative to removal from the appellees' home, the circuit court ordered that temporary custody of Danielle be given to the appellant. W. Va. Code, 49-6-3(a) [1992]. Pursuant to that order, the circuit court appointed a guardian ad litem to represent Danielle and also appointed counsel to represent the appellees. The appellant has since placed Danielle in foster care. Furthermore, although the appellees' other children, Brandy, Ashley and Dustin, as well as Danielle, were named as parties in the appellant's petition, the circuit court ultimately dismissed those three children from this litigation.

Several evidentiary hearings were conducted by the circuit court upon the question of the alleged abuse and neglect of Danielle. At the end of each hearing, the circuit court continued the out-of-home placement of Danielle. The final hearing in the case was conducted on May 17, 1995, and the final order was entered on May 23, 1995.

As set forth in the final order, the circuit court found that Danielle's condition in February 1994 could have been fatal and that the appellees should have sought medical and professional assistance for Danielle sooner than they did. However, the circuit court further found that the appellees did not physically abuse Danielle and did not intentionally neglect her, although, in the words of the circuit court, the appellees were guilty of "passive neglect." The circuit court ordered that custody of Danielle be returned to the appellees, subject to a twelve-month improvement period and supervision by the appellant Department. As reflected in the final order, both the appellant and the guardian ad litem for Danielle objected to the ruling of the circuit court.

In this appeal, the appellant Department, emphasizing the severity of Danielle's injuries, contends that Danielle suffered extensive abuse and neglect and that the parental rights of the appellees should have been terminated by the circuit court. The appellees, on the other hand, contend that Danielle's injuries resulted from causes other than abuse and neglect and that, in any event, the appellant failed to establish compelling circumstances for the denial of an improvement period.

II

Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code is entitled "Child Welfare," and W. Va. Code, 49-1-3 [1994], therein defines "abused child" as a child who is harmed or threatened by "[a] parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home [.]" In addition, W. Va. Code, 49-1-3 [1994], defines a "neglected child" as a child who is harmed or threatened "by a present refusal, failure or inability of the child's parent, guardian or custodian to supply the child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care or education, when such refusal, failure or inability is not due primarily to a lack of financial means on the part of the parent, guardian or custodian [.]"

Article 6 of chapter 49 is entitled "Procedure in Cases of Child Neglect or Abuse" and provides various remedies for the protection of children, including, in certain circumstances, the termination of parental rights. Specifically, pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49- 6-5(a)(6) [1992], a circuit court may:

> [u]pon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future, and when necessary for the welfare of the child, terminate the parental or custodial rights and/or responsibilities of the abusing parent and commit the child to the permanent sole custody of the nonabusing parent, if there be one, or, if not, to either the permanent guardianship of the state department or a licensed child welfare agency.

Moreover, W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) [1992], provides:

> As used in this section, "no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected" shall mean that, based upon the evidence before the court, the abusing adult or adults have demonstrated an inadequate capacity to solve the problems of abuse or neglect, on their own or with help. Such conditions shall be deemed to exist in the following circumstances, which shall not be exclusive:
>
> (5) The abusing parent or parents have repeatedly or seriously injured the child physically or emotionally . . . and the degree of family stress and the potential for further abuse and neglect are so great as to preclude the use of resources to mitigate or resolve family problems or assist the abusing parent or parents in fulfilling their responsibilities to the child [.]

The above provisions of W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1992], are substantially the same as in the 1977 version of that statute, which this Court cited in In re: R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980). In syllabus point 2 of In re: R.J.M. we held:

> Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children,

> W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected.

Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537 (1989); syl. pt. 4, State v. C.N.S., 173 W. Va. 651, 319 S.E.2d 775 (1984). See also, Mary J. Cavins, Annotation, Physical Abuse of Child by Parent as Ground for Termination of Parent's Right to Child, 53 A.L.R.3d 605 (1973).

In In re: R.J.M., this Court upheld a circuit court's termination of parental rights, without an improvement period, where the parents had permitted the child, under three years old, to come very close to starvation. The child's starvation was averted by the intervention of outside authorities. The parents also declined to cooperate with medical experts and social workers concerning the child's welfare. In In re: R.J.M., this Court stated that starvation is a particularly insidious type of child abuse and that children under three years of age, compared to older children, have a far greater susceptibility to illness. 164 W. Va. at 500-501, 266 S.E.2d at 117.

The In re: R.J.M. case was subsequently cited by this Court in In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993). In In re: Jeffrey R.L., a guardian ad litem asserted that the circuit court erred in failing to terminate the parental rights of an infant, where the infant had suffered numerous bone fractures, and physicians had diagnosed the infant as suffering from battered child syndrome. Noting that the mother's explanations for the infant's injuries were inconsistent with the medical evidence See footnote 2 and that neither the mother nor the father was cooperative with regard to identifying the perpetrator of the injuries, this Court, in In re: Jeffrey R.L., agreed with the guardian ad litem and held that there was clear and convincing evidence in the record warranting the termination of parental rights. 190 W. Va. at 35, 435 S.E.2d at 173. As we stated in syllabus point 3 of In re: Jeffrey R.L.:

> Parental rights may be terminated where there is clear and convincing evidence that the infant child has suffered extensive physical abuse while in the custody of his or her parents, and there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified and the parents, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, have taken no action to identify the abuser.

In the case before this Court, the testimony focused upon the burn injuries to the inside of Danielle's arms and to her malnutrition, although as described above, Danielle suffered several other injuries. According to the appellees, Danielle received the burns from a defective vaporizer which had been sitting by her bed. That explanation was disputed, however, by Doctor Angela Rosaf who examined Danielle at Ruby Memorial Hospital in February 1994. Doctor Rosaf indicated that, even if Danielle had been inquisitive toward the vaporizer, she could not have sustained burns located upon the inside of both arms, especially, as here, in the absence of corresponding burns upon the chest.

With regard to the malnutrition, the appellees stated that Danielle had always been a fussy eater and that just prior to her hospitalization in February 1994 Danielle had taken in even less food and fluids because of her flu-like symptoms. Again, however, the appellees were contradicted by medical testimony. Doctor Monica Gingold, a neurologist at Ruby Memorial Hospital, testified that a CAT scan examination revealed that Danielle had suffered brain damage of a type consistent with malnutrition and that some of the effects of the brain damage were permanent. See footnote 3 Moreover, Doctor Rosaf testified that Danielle's malnutrition had occurred over a period of months and had caused the sores present upon Danielle's mouth. Furthermore, Doctor Rosaf indicated that Danielle did not have an eating disorder. See footnote 4

In addition to the explanations of Danielle's injuries, the appellees submitted to the circuit court the report of Allan L. LaVoie, a psychologist, who indicated that Danielle's mother, Peggy Sue T., had no inclinations toward child abuse or neglect. The appellees also submitted the testimony of John M. Marstiller, a psychologist, who found that Danielle's father, Johnny Ray T. was not likely to abuse or neglect children. In addition, the appellees submitted the testimony of Barbour County Deputy Sheriff Richard R. Gordon, who investigated the appellees' home in May 1994 and testified that he did not believe that the appellees had abused Danielle. It should be noted, however, that Allan L. LaVoie, though under subpoena, did not appear before the circuit court to testify. Moreover, John M. Marstiller indicated that Johnny Ray T. had "somewhat inappropriate expectations regarding children's developmental capabilities." Furthermore, Deputy Gordon testified that, although he did not believe that Danielle had been abused, he did believe that she had been neglected by the appellees.

This Court is not unmindful that the parental rights of the appellees with regard to Danielle are entitled to significant consideration. Syl. pt. 1, In re: Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973). However, this case falls squarely within the principles of In re: R.J.M. and In re: Jeffrey R.L., supra. As in In re: R.J.M., the appellees in this case permitted Danielle to come very close to starvation. Importantly, and consistent with In re: R.J.M., the circuit court in this case expressly stated that the intervention of the appellant Department in February 1994 "was necessary to alleviate the malnutrition and medical problems suffered by [Danielle] which might otherwise have been fatal." Moreover, in In re: Jeffrey R.L., this Court indicated that there was no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse could be substantially corrected because the perpetrator had not been identified, and the parents had taken no action to identify the abuser. That is also the case here. In this case, the appellees sought to explain Danielle's burn and malnutrition conditions with testimony inconsistent with the medical evidence. The photographs alone of Danielle's injuries, submitted as a part of the record before this Court, render the appellees' testimony rather unconvincing. Danielle's other injuries, such as the scratches, scars, bruises, missing teeth and the cut upon her ear, were addressed only tangentially by the appellees. Neither of the appellees acknowledged that any abuse or neglect of Danielle took place.

Accordingly, this Court is of the opinion that the record contains clear and convincing evidence of extensive physical abuse and neglect of Danielle and that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions can be substantially corrected. Syl. pt. 3, In re: Jeffrey R.L., supra. The fact that the circuit court found Danielle's injuries to be nearly fatal and that the record indicates that Danielle's conditions have substantially improved in out-of- home placement, a fortiori, support those conclusions. Upon all of the above, this Court is of the opinion that the circuit court committed error in granting the improvement period, and the parental rights of the appellees to Danielle are hereby terminated. This case is remanded to the circuit court for the development of a plan concerning Danielle's prospective care and permanent placement. W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1992]. The appointment of the guardian ad litem upon Danielle's behalf shall continue until a permanent placement is made. In re: Jeffrey R.L., supra, 190 W. Va. at 35, 435 S.E.2d at 173.

We have on a number of occasions and in varying contexts recognized a child's right to continued association with significant figures in his or her life. In re Christina L., ___ W. Va. ___, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995); James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991); Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W. Va. 448, 388 S.E.2d 322 (1989).

As we recognized in syllabus point 5 of In re Christina L.:

> When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must > indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest.

Similarly, we have recognized that where there is a termination of parental rights, all efforts should be made to preserve the child's rights to a continued relationship with her only other immediate family blood relatives, her siblings. See footnote 5

Upon remand, the circuit court should review all of the evidence on these issues in the context of a permanency plan, including the monitoring of the siblings as hereinafter required, to determine the extent to which such continued parental or sibling association is in the child's best interests.

In view of the above, this Court is also concerned about the health, safety and welfare of the appellees' remaining children, Brandy, Ashley and Dustin. Upon remand, therefore, the appellant Department is directed to monitor the progress of Brandy, Ashley and Dustin in order to make sure that those children are not the subject of abuse or neglect. Syl. pt. 2, In re: Christina L., __ W. Va. ___, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995).See footnote 6

The final order of the Circuit Court of Barbour County, entered on May 23, 1995, is reversed, and this case is remanded to that court for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

Footnote: 1 We follow our practice in domestic relations cases involving sensitive matters and use initials to identify the parties, rather than full names. In the matter of Jonathan P., 182 W. Va. 302, 303 n. 1, 387 S.E.2d 537, 538 n. 1 (1989).

Footnote: 2 In Jeffrey R.L., this Court emphasized the inconsistency between the mother's explanations of the infant's injuries and the medical evidence:

X-rays revealed that Jeffrey R.L. suffered fifteen fractures to his skull, clavicle, ribs, arms and legs. It is undisputed that Jeffrey R.L. suffered these extensive injuries as a result of physical abuse, and the physicians diagnosed him as suffering from battered child syndrome.

Yet, his mother, Gail L., gave several possible explanations for the injuries to Jeffrey R.L. She stated that he could have suffered these injuries while he was rolling around in his crib. However, the crib was found by the social worker to be well-padded. Gail L. also stated that his injuries could be the result of a genetic bone disease from which her grandfather suffered. Yet, after several tests were performed at West Virginia University Hospital, there was no indication that Jeffrey R.L. suffered from any bone disease. Furthermore, Gail L. offered the explanation that Jeffrey R.L. suffered his injuries during birth, despite the fact that the evidence in the record reveals Gail L. experienced a normal vaginal delivery. None of the evidence in the record supports any of Gail L.'s explanations of Jeffrey R.L.'s injuries.

190 W. Va. at 34, 435 S.E.2d at 172. See also In the Interest of Darla B., 175 W. Va. 137, 331 S.E.2d 868 (1985), emphasizing in a termination of parental rights case that the parents' explanations for the injuries to the child were inconsistent with the medical evidence.

Footnote: 3 Dr. Gingold testified as follows:

Q. Now, could you tell us what tests were performed?

A. Well, that night they were limited because she was so critically ill, but there was a CAT scan done within hours of her arrival that showed pronounced atrophy of the brain, but also showed lesions in the brain stem.

Q. Doctor, is atrophy of the brain caused -- among other things, due to malnutrition?

A. Definitely.

Q. Did the atrophy of the brain that you observed appear consistent with a history of malnutrition?

A. Chronic malnutrition.

. . . .

Q. One final question. Do you believe that she will be able to fully recover from the condition that she presented herself with in February; or that she will continue to suffer permanent deficits?

A. She will have permanent deficits definitely.

Footnote: 4 Doctor Rosaf testified as follows:

Q. Did you take a history from the parents as to her intake of fluids and nutrition in the preceding period?

A. Yes, I did. They said the child's intake had been down for a few days prior to admission -- that she had a respiratory infection. But prior to that she had the usual amount of three meals a day and vitamin supplement protein milk shake -- one can a day.

Q. Based on your examination and findings did you find that history to be consistent with what you observed?

A. No, it was not. The amount of protein -- she was receiving was very little protein for several months, and the riboflavin deficiency -- the sores around her mouth indicates she was not receiving vitamins or riboflavin.

. . . .

Q. Could you characterize this condition that you observed?

A. Culture cure.

Q. And is there a classical scenario where you observe this?

A. You see this typically in third world countries where children because of poverty do not receive protein as a food source.

. . . .

Q. No possibility of some type of eating disorder?

A. No.

Footnote: 5 As we said in Maynard:

Trends both in social work and the law relating to child placement indicate an increased awareness of children's rights to such continued association with siblings and other meaningful figures. See generally, Hegar, Legal and Social Work Approaches to Sibling Separation in Foster Care, 67 Child Welfare 113 (1988); Reddick, Juv. Just., Nov. 1974, 31-2. The increased professional emphasis in social work on the sibling relationship is consistent with the broadening focus of the literature about separation. Hegar, supra, 67 Child Welfare at 113. The growing legal emphasis on the best interests of the child as the primary criterion for child placement decisions facilitates efforts to preserve stable relationships for children. Hegar, supra., Soc. Serv. Rev., Sept., 1983, at 429; see also Note, Visitation Beyond the Traditional Limitations, 60 Ind. L.J. 191 (1984).

Footnote: 6 Syllabus point 2 of In re: Christina L., supra, states:

Where there is clear and convincing evidence that a child has suffered physical and/or sexual abuse while in the custody of his or her parent(s), guardian, or custodian, another child residing in the home when the abuse took place who is not a direct victim of the physical and/or sexual abuse but is at risk of being abused is an abused child under W. Va. Code, 49-1-3(a) (1994).

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia

In the Interest of DARLA B., An Infant Under the Age of 18 Years.

No. 16669

Submitted April 24, 1985.

Decided June 12, 1985.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "As a general rule the least restrictive alternative regarding parental rights to custody of a child under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977] will be employed; however, courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and this is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illness, need consistent close interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by numerous placements." Syl. pt. 1, In Re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

2. The decision of a circuit court terminating the rights of parents to their child pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977], will not be reversed by this Court for failure to grant the parents an improvement period, where the evidence supports a finding that the child, 38 days old, suffered from life- threatening injuries in the form of broken bones and bruises, which could not have occurred in the manner testified to by the parents, and the circuit court found "compelling circumstances" for the termination of parental rights.

3. The granting of an improvement period, pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) [1980] and W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(c) [1977], unless otherwise provided by the laws of this State, is not an alternative disposition where a finding is made pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(a)(6) [1977] that there is "no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future," and, pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) [1980], "compelling circumstances" justify a denial thereof.

S. Douglas Adkins, Williamson, for Mr. and Mrs. Brewer.

Pamela Lynn Dalton, Williamson, for Darla Brewer.

Robert G. Clarke, Asst. Atty. Gen., Charleston, for Dept. of Human Services.

Jane Moran, Williamson, for intervenor Custodial Caretakers.

McHUGH, Justice:

In this action, the appellants, Dwayne and Tuesday B., appeal from the final order of the Circuit Court of Mingo County, West Virginia, which held that the appellants' daughter, Darla B., was an abused child, and terminated the parental rights of the appellants. The infant was committed to the permanent guardianship of the West Virginia Department of Human Services. This Court has before it the petition for appeal, all matters of record and the briefs and argument of counsel. Counsel for the respondent and the intervenor, who represented the infant's present custodial caretaker and filed a brief in her behalf, appeared for argument, while counsel for appellants did not.

The appellants, Dwayne and Tuesday B., are the natural parents of Darla B. The infant child, while approximately five weeks old, was hospitalized, suffering from a skull fracture, a brain contusion, fractures of the leg, arm and collarbone, and swellings over the infant's mouth and eye. Medical testing showed that these injuries took place within 48 hours of hospitalization. Additional evidence of a separate, partially healed brain contusion was discovered, which was determined to have been inflicted approximately one week before Darla's other injuries.

As a result of a petition filed by the Department of Human Services, the circuit court entered an order finding Darla B. an abused child, terminating the parental rights of Tuesday and Dwayne B. This finding was based upon medical evidence that injuries of the type suffered by Darla could not have occurred in the fashion in which the appellants testified. Furthermore, the circuit court found that there was no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse could be substantially corrected in the near future.

The issue before this Court thus concerns whether the court below correctly terminated the parental rights of the appellants, and correctly denied the application of the appellants for an improvement period.

The appellants assert several errors in the decision below. First, they suggest the circuit court erred in failing to grant them an improvement period as provided by statute. The appellants suggest that the rights of the infant's parents were not given adequate deference, and that at least one improvement period should be granted before termination.

The appellant parents also maintain that it was error for the trial court to deny the improvement period, inasmuch as statutory language requires granting a less restrictive alternative remedy where such a remedy is present. The appellants suggest that termination of parental rights was not the only remedy, but was the most severe. They assert that the court was required to grant the improvement period, since it would be less restrictive than termination of parental rights.

For reasons stated below, we hold that the action of the circuit court was proper.

West Virginia statutes and case law stress the protection of the parent and child relationship. This Court, in In Re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, at 237, 207 S.E.2d 129, at 136 (1973), stated that "no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person." [citations omitted]. However, the discussion was followed with the following limiting language:

> Nevertheless, this Court, early in the history of this State, recognized that the right of the natural parent to the custody of his child is not absolute; it is limited and qualified by the fitness of the parent to honor the trust of the guardianship and custody of the child.

In the case now before us, the injuries inflicted upon the child were of such magnitude that termination of the parental rights as a result of abuse was the only reasonable conclusion that the trial judge could reach. The testimony of the parents conflicts with all of the medical evidence as to the manner in which the life-threatening injuries occurred. See footnote 1

As indicated above, the appellants contend that the trial court erred in denying an improvement period. W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) [1980] provides for the granting of an improvement period, during which the parents may attempt to rectify the conditions upon which the determination of abuse or neglect was based. However, the statute sets forth an occasion when an improvement period may not be granted.

> (b) ... [T]he parents or custodians may, prior to final hearing, move to be allowed an improvement period of three to twelve months in order to remedy the circumstances or alleged circumstances upon which the proceeding is based. The court shall allow such an improvement period unless it finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial thereof.... (emphasis added)

The court below found that "compelling circumstances" existed which would merit the denial of the improvement period and described the circumstances as follows:

> This is the most serious, substantial aggravated abuse on the most helpless kind of person that I have ever heard and I find those to be compelling circumstances. The very life of this child is in jeopardy and there exists substantial and real and immediate danger to the physical well being of the child and, in fact, there is a threat to the life of this child.

> [Transcript of Mingo County Circuit Court hearing of Novem ber 29 and 30, 1983, page 68.]

In a recent case, In Re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 500-501, 266 S.E.2d 114, 117 (1980), the Court stated that an improvement period should be denied based on "compelling circumstances" where parents "routinely flogged their child to within an inch of her life."

The abuse in the case now before us is similar to that discussed in In Re R.J.M. in that Darla B., during the initial five weeks of her existence with her parents, was abused on two separate occasions and both times gravely injured. The trial court properly found "compelling circumstances" to deny an improvement period.

Secondly, the appellants argue that by refusing to grant an improvement period the court did not utilize the least restrictive available remedy, as is required by W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977]. See footnote 2 That statute specifies that, "[t]he court shall give precedence to dispositions in the following sequence ...," thereafter listing remedies which range from dismissing the abuse petition, to terminating parental rights.

The trial court did not err in deciding that there was no less restrictive alternative than termination of parental rights which alternative would protect the infant's well-being. Termination of parental rights is the only appropriate remedy in this case. W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(a)(6) [1977], states, in part:

> (6) Upon a finding that there is no re asonable likelihood that the conditions or neglect or abuse can be substantia lly corrected in th e near future, and when necessary for the we lfare of the child, terminate the parental or custodial rights and responsibilities and commit the child to the permanent guardianship of the state departm ent or a licensed child welfare agency. (emphasis added).

Importantly, this section defines the phrase, "no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected" to include any instance where the parent or parents have repeatedly or seriously physically abused the child. Upon such a finding, W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977], requires termination of parental rights. See footnote 3

We believe termination of parental rights to be the mandated conclusion in this case, in light of the life-threatening conditions Darla B. suffered. We note that the age of Darla B., at the time she sustained the injuries in question was 38 days. The age of children in circumstances similar to those of Darla B. was taken into account by this Court in In Re. R.J.M., supra, where in syllabus point 1 we held:

> As a general rule the least restrictive alternative regarding parental rights to custody of a child under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977] will be employed; however, courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and this is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illness, need consistent close interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by numerous placements.

The decision of a circuit court terminating the rights of parents to their child pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977], will not be reversed by this Court for failure to grant the parents an improvement period, where the evidence supports a finding that the child, 38 days old, suffered from life- threatening injuries in the form of broken bones and bruises, which could not have occurred in the manner testified to by the parents, and the circuit court found "compelling circumstances" for the termination of parental rights.

Further, we note that the granting of an improvement period, pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) [1980] and W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(c) [1977], unless otherwise provided by the laws of this State, is not an alternative disposition where a finding is made pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(a)(6) [1977] that there is "no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future," and, pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) [1980], "compelling circumstances" justify a denial thereof.

The father asserts that he should not have his rights terminated because he was not a direct participant in the acts giving rise to the petition. However, in light of the circumstances of this case, termination of the rights of both parents is the proper result. We note that appellant Dwayne B. supports the testimony of his wife entirely, even though the explanation is inconsistent with the medical evidence. Further, he testified that he was in attendance when the first injury to Darla B. occurred, which involved the child's right frontal lobe. Importantly, the explanation given for this injury by both appellants is inconsistent with the medical evidence. Aside from his direct support of his wife's version of the reasons for the infant's injuries, it is ludicrous for him to assert that he should be held blameless for his nonaction in protecting his child.

Upon all of the above, the final order of the Circuit Court of Mingo County is affirmed.

Affirmed.

Footnote: 1 Tuesday B. testified that Darla was accidentally injured during an episode in which Tuesday believed her daughter had stopped breathing. Mrs. B. claimed that after a fit of crying, Darla was placed in a crib and became suddenly silent. Mrs. B. leaned over the crib, determined that Darla was not breathing, grasped Darla's body under Darla's arms and shook her.

Then, according to Mrs. B., she turned Darla onto her stomach and struck her sharply on the back several times. The medical evidence suggested that this action might explain the fractured collarbone, but could not result in the injuries Darla suffered to the skull, arm and leg. Notedly, appellant Dwayne B., although not present at the time of the injury, supports his wife's explanation.

Furthermore, both appellants testified that the earlier injury suffered by the infant resulted from Darla being accidentally struck on the left side of her skull upon a gun rack while being carried by her mother. Both appellants claimed to be in attendance at the time of this injury, and were certain that the described accident involved the left side of Darla's skull. However, the medical evidence revealed that the injury could not have occurred in this manner, since the injury was to the right portion of her skull, rather than the left.

Footnote: 2 W.Va.Code, 49-6-5, was amended subsequent to the filing of the petition seeking termination of the parental rights. The amendment, however, is not relevant to the circumstances of this action.

Footnote: 3 The appellants cite another trial court error which merits little discussion. They assert that the initial abuse petition filed in the circuit court in this case was defective, according to W.Va.Code, 49-6-1(a) [1977]. This statute states, in part: "The petition shall allege specific conduct including time and place, how such conduct comes within the statutory definition of neglect or abuse with references thereto, any supportive services provided by the state department to remedy the alleged circumstances and the relief sought." The petition involving Darla B. contained an error which made reference to the allegations of specific conduct in Section 4c of the petition rather than Section 4a, the appropriate reference. Nevertheless, the petition filed with the court gave clear warning to the appellants that (1) Darla B. was a suspected victim of abuse, (2) that she was in her parents' custody at the time of the injury, (3) that the explanation given by the parents was not credible, and (4) that the Department of Human Services was seeking temporary custody of Darla, which might later result in the termination of parental rights.

This Court discussed the sufficiency of neglect petitions in State ex rel. Moore v. Munchmeyer, 156 W.Va. 820, 823-24, 197 S.E.2d 648, 651 (1973), stating that:

Each petition must be evaluated individually. If the allegations of fact in a child neglect petition are sufficiently specific to inform the custodian of the infants of the basis upon which the petition is brought, and thus afford a reasonable opportunity to prepare a rebuttal, the child neglect petition is legally sufficient. The appellants in the case before us were not hindered or prejudiced in any manner in the preparation of their case.

The opinion of the Court was delivered PER CURIAM.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "'Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.' Per Curiam:

This case is before this Court on the consolidated appeals of the petitioners, Hannah W. and George B.,[1] from the Circuit Court of Raleigh County's July 31, 2012, order terminating their parental rights[2] to their twin boys, Darrien B. and Andrew B. Based upon the record, the parties' briefs, and the arguments presented, the order of the circuit court is vacated and this case is remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

I. Factual and Procedural Background

On November 2, 2010, Hannah W. ("the mother") took her twenty-three-month-old son Darrien B.[3] to the emergency room at Raleigh General Hospital where she reported that Darrien had been running in the living room of her home when he tripped and fell over a pair of shoes. The mother further reported that the child cried inconsolably after he fell and would not put any weight on his right leg. Darrien was diagnosed with a spiral fracture of his right femur. Because spiral fractures in children are suspicious for abuse, the hospital contacted Child Protective Services ("CPS") of the respondent, the West Virginia

[1]We follow our traditional practice in child abuse and neglect matters, as well as other cases involving sensitive facts, by abbreviating the last names of the parties. See, e.g., In re Jessica G., 226 W.Va. 17, 697 S.E.2d 53 (2010).

[2]Each petitioner has filed a separate appeal from the same underlying order of termination, and this Court has consolidated the appeals for consideration and opinion.

[3]Darrien B. and Andrew B. were born on November 18, 2008.

Department of Health and Human Resources ("the Department"). Hospital records reflect that the emergency room physician informed CPS worker Donna Dickens that a spiral fracture "is very difficult to have with a simple fall from [a] standing position, but he could not make a statement being 100% sure that that is not how the injury occurred." Darrien was transferred to the Charleston Area Medical Center ("CAMC"). The records from CAMC's Emergency Department indicate that "[a]lthough this is very suspicious fracture, we cannot rule in or out the probability of abuse. At this point, we would leave this decision up to Child Protective Services to make and have them be involved with this case."

On the date of Darrien's injury, CPS worker Dickens went to the parents' home to secure custody of Darrien's brother, Andrew B. Ms. Dickens observed that the home was "disheveled" with trash throughout the living room and kitchen. She noted that the kitchen counters were covered with dirty dishes, some with food still left on them, and that there was a "horrible stench" in the apartment. At this same time, George B. ("the father") informed Ms. Dickens that he had voluntarily relinquished his parental rights to a biological daughter from a different relationship because the child wanted to live with her maternal grandparents. Ms. Dickens's subsequent investigation revealed that the father relinquished his parental rights to his daughter only after CPS instituted an abuse and neglect proceeding arising out of substantiated allegations that the father had sexually abused the child.[4]

On November 4, 2010, the Department filed a verified Petition to Institute Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings against both parents in the Circuit Court of Raleigh County. The Department alleged that both Darrien and Andrew were abused and/or neglected as defined in West Virginia Code § 49-1-3 et seq. (2009 & Supp. 2012) and § 49-6-1 et seq. (2009 & Supp. 2012); that "the circumstances in the home where the children live places them in imminent danger[;]" and that "there are no reasonable and effective alternatives to removing the children from the home." The Department also alleged that the father had voluntarily relinquished his parental rights to his daughter, as discussed above.[5] The circuit court entered an order that same day ordering that the petition be filed, transferring custody of the children to the Department, appointing legal counsel for each

[4]The record does not indicate whether criminal charges were ever filed against the father in this regard. The record does reflect that this child was adopted and the case was closed by CPS.

[5]Although the Department mentioned the father's prior voluntary relinquishment in its petition, it did not seek a termination of the father's parental rights to Darrien and Andrew on that basis.

parent, and appointing a guardian ad litem[6] to represent the children. The parents waived their preliminary hearing and the case proceeded to adjudication.[7]

An adjudicatory hearing[8] was held before the circuit court during which the emergency room physicians from both hospitals testified to their suspicions of abuse in relation to the spiral fracture suffered by Darrien. However, neither physician could testify to precisely how this particular injury occurred. The parents' medical expert testified and expressed his opinion that there was a "very, very low chance that there was a child abuse type of injury to the right femur fracture." The parents, CPS worker Dickens, an emergency room nurse from Raleigh General Hospital, and a social services specialist from CAMC also testified at this hearing.

[6]Stacey Fragile, Esq., was appointed as the guardian ad litem and appeared for all of the hearings until the last hearing held before the circuit court on June 28, 2012, during which Colleen Brown-Bailey, Esq., appeared as the children's guardian ad litem.

[7]In an order entered December 21, 2010, the circuit court directed that both parents undergo a psychological evaluation. The evaluating psychologist issued his reports in which he recommended individual and family counseling; parenting, life skills, and anger management classes; substance abuse counseling and monitoring, including random drug screens; and a monitoring period. The psychologist did not recommend the independent return of the children to the parents or unsupervised visitation with them at that time.

[8]The adjudicatory hearing began on February 2, 2011. It resumed and concluded on February 22, 2011.

On March 16, 2011, the circuit court entered an order based on the evidence presented at the adjudicatory hearing and found, in part, as follows:

> 2. The . . . parents in their testimony have failed to provide a consistent and reasonable explanation of how the injury occurred. There is clear evidence that . . . the parents have given divergent and contradictory descriptions of the events leading to the injury of their child.
>
> 3. There is clear and convincing evidence that the home where the children have resided is maintained in an unsatisfactory and unhealthy manner.
>
> 4. The [Department] has proven by clear and convincing evidence that the injury to the child in this case arose from conditions existing in the home that were directly responsible for the abuse and neglect.
>
> 5. There is no evidence that the injury to the child was the result of intentional conduct of the . . . parents, but the injury was the result of abuse and neglect as defined by West Virginia Code § 49-1-3 et. seq., and § 49-6-1 et. seq.
>
> 6. The infant child, Darrien [B.], is abused and neglected pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-1-3 et. seq., and § 49-6-1 et. seq., and therefore the infant child Andrew [B.] is also in danger.
>
> 7. The infant children, Darrien [B.] and Andrew [B.], were abused and neglected based on the condition of the home pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-1-3 et. seq., and § 49-6-1 et. seq.

On June 14, 2011, the circuit court entered an order granting both parents a six-month post-adjudicatory improvement period. Thereafter, the circuit court held review hearings to assess how the parents were doing in their improvement period. In the circuit court's order entered on November 23, 2011, following one of those review hearings, the court stated that the parents were "having problems keeping their home in a safe and sanitary condition for the children and the home now has roaches due to the unsanitary condition . . . ." In this same order, the circuit court granted the parents an extension of their improvement periods with the added requirement that both parents submit to random drug and alcohol screens.

The circuit court was updated on the status of the parents in a Revised Court Summary dated January 27, 2012, filed in the circuit court. In this Summary, CPS worker Traci Hairston reported that the random drug screens for both parents had been negative and that the Department had made frequent and random visits to the home finding it to be "somewhat clean" at times and "filthy and filled with clutter" at other times.[9] Ms. Hairston further reported in her Summary that although the parents had made progress, they had shown that "they are not capable of providing a stable home environment for their children[;]" that the Department had "made every effort to provide [them] with all possible assistance[;]" and that the parents have been "granted two extensions to their Improvement

[9]This Revised Court Summary also reflects that in-home services provider Kim Jesse informed Ms. Hairston that the parents were about to be evicted from their apartment because their gas had been shut off, which was a breach of their lease, and that the parents could be evicted for their rental delinquency, as well.

Period and have continually failed to change all the safety issues in the home."[10] Ms. Hairston concluded by stating that the Department recommends that "the court move to Disposition and the termination" of the parental rights of both parents.

On February 2, 2012, a review hearing was held before the circuit court during which it was reported that while the parents had made some progress, they had not successfully completed their case plans. At that time, both parents moved for a dispositional improvement period. Soon thereafter, CPS worker Hairston filed a Court Summary in the circuit court dated February 7, 2012. In this Summary, Ms. Hairston reported that the parents had continued to test negative on their drug screens, that the visits between the parents and the children were going well, and that the home had been kept "relatively clean." She further reported, however, that the Department had received a letter from the apartment manager who advised that the parents are constantly behind in their rent; that they have a roach infestation in their apartment; and that they have been noncompliant with their lease. Ms. Hairston concluded that although "the Department was prepared to reunify Andrew and Darrien with their parents it has now become difficult due to the housing issues . . . ."

[10]Ms. Hairston also reported in this Summary that when she visited the home in early December 2011, the mother advised that she did not know how she and the father would support themselves when the children came home because they could not afford to take care of themselves; that the father spent an entire paycheck on a trip to Tennessee; and that they recently purchased a gaming system. This Summary also reflects that Ms. Hairston told the mother that she and the father would not be reunified with the children if they did not keep the home clean and "start making better decisions."

Thereafter, the case moved forward and, on March 9, 2012, the disposition hearing was held before the circuit court. During this hearing, the in-home services provider, Kelli Cook, testified[11] to her belief that the parents had successfully completed their improvement period. She also testified that the gas service had been restored to the apartment; that the home had been clean since January 2012; that both parents had been employed for the last four or five months; and that the roach infestation had been resolved. Ms. Cook further testified that the prior month, the Department had begun weekly overnight in-home visits between the children and the parents and that those visits were going well. Ms. Cook testified that while she would not recommend returning the children to the home immediately, she would say that a transition period of three months for reunification of the children with the parents "if everything stayed clean and all the utilities caught up . . . ."

Following the disposition hearing, the circuit court entered an order on March 23, 2012, directing the Department to continue to provide services and to continue with the visitation between the parents and the children until the court issued its decision on disposition. The circuit court also scheduled "[a]n Improvement Period Review or Motion to Terminate and Court's Decision" hearing for June 28, 2012. On June 27, 2012, the day prior to this hearing, CPS worker Hairston filed a Court Summary in which she reported that

> [t]he Department has grave concerns that the behaviors in the home have not significantly changed as throughout the lifetime of this case George and Hannah have minimally complied in the aspect of they have not missed parenting or adult life skill sessions, but they have not learned how to maintain appropriate housing or safety for the children.
>
> • • •
> At this time the Department has reservations about the children being reunified with their parents do [sic] to the consistency of unchanged behaviors throughout this case.[12]

Ms. Hairston concluded her Summary with the Department's final recommendation that the children remain in the legal and physical custody of the Department. Significantly, the Department did not recommend the termination of parental rights in this Summary.

On the following day, June 28, 2012, the previously scheduled hearing was held before the circuit court during which the Department's counsel represented that the Department was seeking the termination of the parental rights of both parents. The guardian ad litem expressed her agreement with the Department's position. At the conclusion of this hearing, the circuit court stated:

> This is one of the cases that . . . keeps me up at night. It's very, very clear that the law of the State of West Virginia is . . . that a parent has the constitutional right to raise their own children. Having said that, this Court . . . has found that the children have been abused.

[12]Ms. Hairston also reported that following the March 9, 2012, disposition hearing, the parents had a bed bug infestation in the home, which had since been resolved.

Now . . . with the Department directly providing services or contracting and having those services provided otherwise, the question is . . . have the parents assimilated the training that they received and have they, in fact, gotten rid of or resolved the issues which created the conditions of abuse and/or neglect as they existed at the time of the filing of the petition. And I have great concerns regarding whether or not these parents have, in fact, fully assimilated . . . the training and recognized the issues that they have . . . in terms of raising these two children.

• • •

The acts and the conduct that created the problem here relate to the injury of Darrien . . . The nature of the broken bone raised all kinds of red flags with the Department and with the doctors at the hospital.

• • •

And, further . . . George [B.] has had prior involvement with Child Protective Services. . . . He relinquished his rights to [another] child . . . after allegations of sexual abuse were substantiated in a preliminary investigation . . . .

• • •

The Court finds that, based upon its involvement in this case, that . . . the parents have failed to adequately improve the conditions that resulted in the abuse and neglect, that they have been unable to or unwilling to adequately change the conditions which resulted in the abuse and neglect despite the fact that the Court has, with the assistance of the Department, attempted to provide additional training, treatment and programs which would have eliminated that.

The Court finds that the history in this case has been that the . . . parents have done the minimum to . . . try to keep the case going and that there's no real evidence that . . . they have - either of them - assimilated the training and accepted the > training and made . . . the changes necessary to alleviate the conditions.

>
> Therefore, it's the judgement [sic] of the Court that the parental rights of both George [B.] and Hannah [W.] are terminated as to Darrien [B.] and Andrew [B.].

At that point during the hearing, the mother's counsel advised the circuit court, as follows:

> In discussions prior to this hearing . . . with Ms. Hairston, it was not her intention to recommend termination of parental rights to this Court. That isn't what her court summary says.[13] The Court didn't follow the recommendation of the Department.
> Moreover, we have the home services worker [Kelli Cook] here today, Your Honor. If - - and perhaps I didn't understand where the Court was in the posture, but if I need to call Kell[i], who is here today, or Ms. Hairston, I want to put their recommendations to this Court on the record. I believe that my client has a right to that.

(Footnote added). The circuit court refused to permit either Ms. Hairston or Ms. Cook to testify stating, "[T]his is a review hearing and a ruling hearing. It was not set up for an evidentiary hearing, so we don't have time."

On July 31, 2012, the circuit court entered an order memorializing its ruling made during the June 28, 2012, hearing and terminating the parents' parental rights to Darrien B. and Andrew B. on the basis that the parents had "failed to change the conditions which gave rise to this case and failed to assimilate the therapy and training offered by the Department to successfully complete their improvement periods . . . [.]" The circuit court ordered that the visitation between the children and the parents be maintained and that services by the Department continue pending the parents' appeal to this Court.

[13]Counsel is referring to Ms. Hairston's Court Summary filed with the circuit court the previous day.

II. Standard of Review

We are asked to review a circuit court's order entered upon a petition for termination of parental rights. Our standard of review in this regard is well established:

> "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syl. Pt. 1, In re Cecil T., 228 W.Va. 89, 717 S.E.2d 873 (2011).

III. Discussion

In the present appeal, the mother asserts that the circuit court erred during the June 28, 2012, hearing by refusing to allow her counsel to call CPS worker Traci Hairston and in-home services provider Kelli Cook to the witness stand. The mother asserts that both Hairston and Cook were present and were prepared to testify that the children should be reunified with their parents.

We begin our analysis of this issue with our basic tenet that "[a]lthough parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syl. Pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996). The record reflects that even with the extensions to the post-adjudicatory improvement period granted to each parent, as well as the services provided by the Department, the parents could not consistently maintain their apartment in a clean and sanitary manner for the children, keep current on their rent and utilities, and maintain steady employment.

Notwithstanding the parents' inability to fulfill the terms of their improvement period, the termination of parental rights remains the most "drastic remedy" that can be imposed in a case of abuse and neglect. See Syl. Pt. 5, in part, In re Nelson B., 225 W.Va. 680, 695 S.E.2d 910 (2010) ("'Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children . . . [.]' Syl. pt. 2, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).''). Consequently,

> "[w]here it appears from the record that the process established by the rules of Procedure of Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and related statutes for the disposition of cases involving children adjudicated to be abused or neglected has been substantially disregarded or frustrated, the resulting order of disposition will be vacated and the case remanded for compliance with that process and entry of an appropriate dispositional order." Syl. Pt. 5, In re T.W., __ W.Va. __, 737 S.E.2d 69 (2012) (Emphasis added).

Rule 36(a) of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect provides, as follows:

> Findings of fact and conclusions of law; time frame. — At the conclusion of the disposition hearing, the court shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law, in writing or on the record, as to the appropriate disposition in accordance with the provision of W.Va. Code § 49-6-5. The court shall enter a disposition order, including findings of fact and conclusions of law, within ten (10) days of the conclusion of the hearing.

(Emphasis added). Here, the disposition hearing was held on March 9, 2012. On March 23, 2012, the circuit court entered an Order Following Disposition Hearing on Both Parents that simply continued the case on status quo. The circuit court did not set forth findings of fact and conclusions of law in this order. See Id. Instead, the circuit court scheduled a hearing for June 28, 2012, for "Improvement Period Review or Motion to Terminate and Court's Decision."

During the June 28 hearing, the mother's counsel advised the circuit court that he had spoken with CPS worker Hairston, who allegedly advised him that the Department would not be seeking a termination of parental rights that day. Counsel's representation was arguably consistent with Ms. Hairston's Court Summary filed with the circuit court the prior day in which the Department did not seek a termination of parental rights. Accordingly, the circuit court should have permitted the mother's counsel to call Ms. Hairston to the witness stand for the limited purpose of exploring the Department's position with regard to termination. Indeed, given the length of time that had passed since the disposition hearing (almost four months), it was particularly important to have taken the testimony of the in-home services provider who had presumably continued to provide services to the parents per the circuit court's March 23, 2012, order.

Under the facts and circumstances herein, this Court concludes that the disposition in this case was frustrated when the circuit court refused to allow counsel to call Ms. Hairston and Ms. Cook to the witness stand during the June 28, 2012, hearing. Accordingly, we remand this case for the purpose of holding an evidentiary hearing to allow the parents' counsel to call Ms. Hairston and Ms. Cook as witnesses to explore the Department's position with respect to the termination of the parental rights to Darrien and Andrew.[14]

Another matter to be addressed on remand is the father's prior voluntary relinquishment of parental rights to his biological daughter, as discussed above. "The revocation of a parent's parental rights, whether by voluntary relinquishment or by involuntary termination, is a very serious matter." In re Cesar L., 221 W.Va. 249, 257, 654 S.E.2d 373, 381 (2007) (emphasis added); see also In re James G., 211 W.Va. 339, 346, 566 S.E.2d 226, 233 (2002) ("Nothing prevents the Department from conducting an investigation if it believes that a parent who has voluntarily terminated parental rights with respect to one child might be mistreating another child . . . ." (Emphasis added).). Further, West Virginia § 49-6-5(a)(7) provides, in relevant part, that "[f]or purposes of the court's consideration of the disposition custody of a child . . . the department is not required to make reasonable efforts to preserve the family if the court determines: (A) The parent has subjected . . .

[14]We note that the circuit court's July 31, 2012, order terminating the parents' parental rights does not cover the requisite statutory factors under West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(6), although the findings it made during the June 28, 2012, were arguably sufficient. See In re Jamie Nicole H., 205 W.Va. 176, 517 S.E.2d 41 (1999) (upholding termination of parental rights where transcript of dispositional hearing, rather than order of termination, satisfied Court that lower court had made findings required by West Virginia Code § 49–6–5(a)(6)). Nonetheless, on remand, the order entered by the circuit court should comply with this statute.

another child of the parent . . . to aggravated circumstances which include . . . sexual abuse[.]" Id. (Emphasis added). Moreover, as this Court has stated on many occasions,

> [t]he guiding principle in any child abuse or neglect proceeding is to do what is best for the child: "First and foremost in a contest involving the custody of a child is the consideration of that child's welfare. It has been held repeatedly by this Court that the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided."

In re: Kyiah P., 213 W.Va. 424, 429, 582 S.E.2d 871, 876 (2003) (internal citations omitted).

Here, while the Department's petition to institute these proceedings alleged, in part, that the father had voluntarily relinquished his parental rights to a biological daughter after allegations of sexual abuse were substantiated, and while the circuit court acknowledged this prior relinquishment on the record at the conclusion of the June 28, 2012, hearing,[15] we conclude that these prior substantiated allegations of sexual abuse must be more fully explored and addressed on remand. This would include, but is not necessarily limited to, whether there was an adjudication in this earlier child abuse proceeding against the father and whether these substantiated allegations of sexual abuse constitute a separate

[15]The circuit court stated that the father "has had prior involvement with Child Protective Services" and had "relinquished his rights to [another] child . . . after allegations of sexual abuse were substantiated in a preliminary investigation[.]" and/or additional basis for the termination of the father's parental rights to Darrien B. and Andrew B.

Accordingly, this Court vacates the circuit court's July 31, 2012, order and remands this case to the circuit court for a full evidentiary hearing to explore the Department's position concerning the termination of the petitioners' parental rights to Darrien B. and Andrew B. and to further address the substantiated allegations of sexual abuse involving the father and his biological daughter to whom he voluntarily relinquished his parental rights.[16]

IV. Conclusion

Based upon this Court's thorough review of this matter and for the foregoing reasons, the order of the Circuit Court of Raleigh County terminating the parental rights of the parents with regard to Darrien B. and Andrew B. is hereby vacated and this case is remanded to the circuit court for an expedited evidentiary hearing consistent with this opinion. To facilitate the commencement of the proceedings on remand, the Clerk is directed to issue the mandate of the Court contemporaneously with the issuance of this opinion.

[16]We find that the other assignments of error asserted by the parents in the case sub judice, including, but not limited to, the father's argument that the circuit court erred in denying him a dispositional improvement period and in failing to place adequate weight on the recommendations of the Department and the in-home services provider, need not be addressed as they have either been rendered moot by this Court's opinion herein and/or will necessarily be considered anew by the circuit court on remand. See Cole v. Fairchild, 198 W.Va.736, 752 n. 22, 482 S.E.2d 913, 929 n. 22 (1996) ("The parties raise a number of other alleged errors in their briefs . . . We carefully have reviewed each alleged error and find they . . . are rendered moot by our above decision . . . .").

Cleckley, Justice:

This case involves two certified questions relating to the Wiretapping and Electronic Surveillance Act, W. Va. Code, 62-1D-1, et seq., and its federal counterpart in Title III of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968, 18 U.S.C. § 2510, et seq. The certified questions involve whether a husband, who no longer lives with his wife, but who suspects his wife of abusing their children, may use a third person with access to the wife's house to place a voice-activated tape recorder in the wife's house to record conversations between his wife and their children. We hold such conduct violates W. Va. Code, 62-1D-3(a)(1) (1987), and 18 U.S.C. § 2511(1)(a) (1988). Therefore, the audiotapes are inadmissible under W. Va. Code, 62-1D-6 (1987), and 18 U.S.C. § 2515 (1968).

I.
FACTS

Jill L. See footnote 1 filed for a divorce from David L. in October, 1993, and she was given temporary custody of their twin daughters, Ashley L. and Chelsea L., ages 6, and their son, Joshua L., age 5. Jill L. continued to reside in the marital home, and David L. moved. After the couple separated, but prior to their divorce, David L. asserts he became concerned that the children were being abused by Jill L., so he asked his mother, the children's paternal grandmother, to place a voice-activated tape recorder in the children's bedroom to record conversations between Jill L. and the children. The paternal grandmother had access to the home because she babysat the children. Through his mother, David L. retrieved a series of tape-recorded conversations. Jill L. was unaware the recordings were being made.

After listening to these conversations, David L. gave the tapes to his lawyer See footnote 2who approached the Cabell County Prosecuting Attorney's Office. A therapist for Family Services, Inc., and a child protective service worker for the Department of Health and Human Resources (DHHR) listened to at least some of the tapes. Thereafter, on April 29, 1994, the DHHR filed a petition in the Circuit Court of Cabell County, and, by an order dated the same day, the DHHR, inter alia, was granted temporary legal and physical custody of the children. The order also authorized the DHHR to place physical custody of the children with David L.

A hearing on the petition was held on May 2, 1994. At the hearing, the child protective service worker testified she spoke with the children for about twenty minutes. She said the children indicated to her that Jill L. screams excessively at them and made a comment to the effect "she would kill them." One of the girls said she hides in the basement or behind a chair and covers her ears when her mother screams. In addition, all the children indicated Jill L. sometimes uses a belt, and Joshua L. indicated he suffered a bruise on his buttocks from a belt at least once. The child protective service worker stated she saw no signs of physical abuse on the children at the time she met with them, and she said they did not appear to be malnourished.

The child protective service worker also spoke with David L. and the children's paternal grandmother. See footnote 3 It was reported to her that Jill L.'s screams could be overheard by neighbors and Jill L. did not keep adequate food in the house. She attempted unsuccessfully to contact Jill L. After the child protective service worker testified, the circuit court judge stated the hearing could continue, but he wanted to speak personally with the children the next day. The hearing then concluded, and no one else testified.

According to the brief on behalf of the DHHR, after the circuit court judge interviewed the children, but before the hearing resumed, the judge, Jill L., and her lawyer learned of the audiotapes. Jill L. and her lawyer, David L. and his lawyer, and the guardian ad litem for the children listened to the tapes. Afterwards, Jill L. agreed to maintain the custody arrangement as per the temporary order dated April 29, 1994. The circuit court judge apparently did not listen to the tapes and ordered them sealed.

On May 16, 1994, Jill L. filed a motion to vacate the order dated April 29, 1994, and award her custody of the children. In support of her motion, Jill L. asserted the DHHR failed to show by admissible evidence that she abused her children. The circuit court heard arguments on the admissibility of the audiotapes, and, by order dated May 26, 1994, the circuit court certified the following two questions to this Court:

> "1. Does W. Va. Code 62-1D-3(a)(1) and i ts federal equi valent, 18 U.S.C. 2511, apply to a cust ody dispute where a father, upon suspicion of abusive behavior t oward his children, pr ocures a third party with access to the marital hom e to place a self-activating tape recorder in the children 's bedr oom for the purpose of recording conversations and i nteractions between the wif e/mother and children?
> "2. Are tape recordings which are the product of such interceptions admissible as evidence in a hearin g to determine both temporary and permanent physical and legal custody?"

The circuit court ruled the tape recordings violated W. Va. Code, 62-1D-3(a)(1), and were inadmissible under W. Va. Code, 62-1D-6. See footnote 4 This Court reviews questions of statutory interpretation de novo. See Mildred L.M. v. John O.F., ___ W.Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (No. 22037 12/8/94).

II.
DISCUSSION

As the circuit court indicates in its first certified question, this case specifically is controlled by W. Va. Code, 62-1D-3(a)(1), and 18 U.S.C. § 2511 (1988). W. Va. Code, 62-1D-3(a)(1), provides: "(a) Except as otherwise specifically provided in this article, it is unlawful for any person to: (1) Intentionally intercept, attempt to intercept or procure any other person to intercept or attempt to intercept, any wire, oral or electronic communication[.]" The federal version of the statute set forth in 18 U.S.C. § 2511(1)(a) is substantially similar. See footnote 5 If communications are intercepted in violation of the provisions of W. Va. Code, 62-1D-3(a)(1), or 18 U.S.C. 2511(1)(a), such communications are inadmissible as evidence under W. Va. Code, 62-1D-6, and 18 U.S.C. § 2515. See footnote 6

West Virginia's Wiretapping and Electronic Surveillance Act was adopted in 1987. Since its adoption, we have not addressed the issue of whether the Act prohibits the type of audiotaping at issue in this case. We did, however, address the parallel federal version of the Act in Marano v. Holland, 179 W. Va. 156, 366 S.E.2d 117 (1988), where we stated in Syllabus Point 15:

> "One spouse 's interce ption of te lephone communications by the other is a violation of the Om nibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968, 18 U.S.C. § 2510, et seq., which by its terms renders them inadmissible."

David L. argues the facts of the present case are significantly different from the facts in Marano and the facts of the cases cited by Marano. Therefore, David L. asserts that Syllabus Point 15 of Marano should not apply to this case. Although we generally agree with David L. that the facts of the present case are different from the others, we find the holding in Marano and the holdings of several other federal courts are sufficiently analogous to conclude David L.'s conduct, via his mother, is prohibited under W. Va. Code, 62-1D-3(a)(1), and 18 U.S.C. § 2511(1)(a).

In Marano, a criminal defendant argued he was denied effective assistance of counsel, in part, by his lawyer's failure to seek the admission of certain audiotapes. The defendant surreptitiously audiotaped his wife's telephone conversations which revealed his wife was engaged in several extramarital relationships. Upon listening to some of the audiotapes, the defendant learned his wife was sexually involved with a close friend and business partner. The defendant then killed the man.

Upon review of the habeas corpus relief granted to the defendant by the Circuit Court of Ohio County, we disagreed with the circuit court's finding "that the failure to introduce the tapes 'seriously jeopardized' the defendant's case, in that they would have buttressed his insanity defense and provided a basis for a backup defense of diminished capacity." 179 W. Va. at 172, 366 S.E.2d at 133. (Footnote omitted). We found a majority of jurisdictions held such audiotapes violated 18 U.S.C. § 2510, et seq. Therefore, such audiotapes were inadmissible under 18 U.S.C. § 2515. 179 W. Va. at 172, 366 S.E.2d at 133. As support, we cited United States v. Jones, 542 F.2d 661 (6th Cir. 1976); United States v. Rizzo, 583 F.2d 907 (7th Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 440 U.S. 908, 99 S. Ct. 1216, 59 L.Ed.2d 456 (1979); Heyman v. Heyman, 548 F. Supp. 1041 (N.D. Ill. 1982); and Gill v. Willer, 482 F. Supp. 776 (W.D.N.Y. 1980).

We recognize that these cases are factually different from the case at bar. The courts in Jones, 542 F.2d at 667, Heyman, 548 F. Supp. at 1045, and Gill, 482 F. Supp. at 778, however, all found the language of 18 U.S.C. § 2511(1)(a) is clear and unambiguous and prohibits all interceptions of wire communications unless otherwise explicitly permitted. See footnote 7 Consequently, these three cases declined to follow the decision in Simpson v. Simpson, 490 F.2d 803 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 897, 95 S. Ct. 176, 42 L.Ed.2d 141 (1974). See footnote 8

In Simpson, after reviewing and finding the legislative history inconclusive, the Fifth Circuit ruled that 18 U.S.C. § 2510, et seq., did not apply to wiretapping a marital home's telephone and recording a spouse's conversations. Finding 18 U.S.C. § 2511(1)(a) was clear and unambiguous, the courts in Jones, Heyman, and Gill stated the Fifth Circuit violated the canon of not resorting to legislative history unless a statute is unclear or ambiguous. 542 F.2d at 667; 548 F. Supp. at 1045; 482 F. Supp. at 778. Citing United States v. Oregon, 366 U.S. 643, 648, 81 S. Ct. 1278, 1281, 6 L.Ed.2d 575, 579 (1961).

We agree with Jones, Heyman, and Gill that an analysis of legislative history is not necessary where a statute is clear and unambiguous. As we stated in Syllabus Point 1 of State v. Boatright, 184 W. Va. 27, 399 S.E.2d 57 (1990):

> "'Courts always endeavor to give effect to the legislative intent, but a statute that is clear and unam biguous will be applied and not construed.' Syllabus Poi nt 1, State v. Elder , 152 W. Va. 571, 165 S.E.2d 108 (1968)."

We further said in Boatright, "[o]ne canon of statutory construction is to follow the statute's plain, unambiguous language. 'When the statute is unambiguous on its face, there is no real need to consider its legislative history.'" 184 W. Va. 29, 399 S.E.2d at 59. (Citations omitted).

Nevertheless, in response to the examination of the legislative history the Fifth Circuit did in Simpson, supra, the Sixth Circuit in Jones, supra, conducted its own analysis. The Sixth Circuit explained that even upon a "review of the legislative history . . . , testimony at congressional hearings, and debates on the floor of Congress," it was led to the inescapable "conclusion that 18 U.S.C. § 2511(1)(a) establishes a broad prohibition on all private electronic surveillance and that a principal area of congressional concern was electronic surveillance for the purposes of marital litigation." 542 F.2d at 669. (Footnote omitted). See also United States v. Giordano, 416 U.S. 505, 514, 94 S. Ct. 1820, 1826, 40 L.Ed.2d 341, 353 (1974) (where the Supreme Court said "[t]he purpose of the legislation, which was passed in 1968, was effectively to prohibit, on the pain of criminal and civil penalties, all interceptions of oral and wire communications, except those specifically provided for in the Act[.]" (Footnote omitted)).

The Sixth Circuit also distinguished the facts of its case from the Simpson case. In Simpson, the wiretapping occurred while the couple was still married and living in the same house. However, in Jones, the wiretapping occurred while the husband and wife were separated and living apart from each other. Thus, the Sixth Circuit concluded, "[u]nder these circumstances, we do not find applicable the implied interspousal exception to the wiretap statute recognized in Simpson." 542 F.2d at 673. Similarly, other courts, including our Fourth Circuit, generally have held there is no interspousal exception to 18 U.S.C. § 2510, et seq. See Pritchard v. Pritchard, 732 F.2d 372 (4th Cir. 1984); Platt v. Platt, 951 F.2d 159 (8th Cir. 1989); Kempf v. Kempf, 868 F.2d 970 (8th Cir. 1989); Thompson v. Dulaney, 970 F.2d 744 (10th Cir. 1992); Heggy v. Heggy, 944 F.2d 1537 (10th Cir. 1991), cert. denied, U.S. , 112 S. Ct. 1514, 117 L.Ed.2d 651 (1992); Ex parte O'Daniel, 515 So.2d 1250 (Ala. 1987); Rickenbaker v. Rickenbaker, 290 N.C. 373, 226 S.E.2d 347 (1976); Pulawski v. Blais, 506 A.2d 76 (R.I. 1986). But see Anonymous v. Anonymous, 558 F.2d 677 (2nd Cir. 1977); Janecka v. Franklin, 684 F. Supp. 24 (S.D.N.Y. 1987), aff'd, 843 F.2d 110 (2nd Cir. 1988).

Applying the language of 18 U.S.C. § 2510, et seq., to the facts of the case at bar, we find there is no indication that Congress intended to create an exception for a husband, living apart from his wife, to procure a third person surreptitiously to tape record conversations between his wife and their children in the wife's house. We find it is insignificant that this case does not involve the interception of wire communications, i.e., telephone lines, in that 18 U.S.C. § 2511(1)(a) specifically applies to "any wire, oral, or electronic communication[.]" (Emphasis added).

Similarly, we find W. Va. Code, 62-1D-3(a)(1), is clear and unambiguous and it, too, prohibits this type of conduct. Therefore, any recordings of conversations made in violation of W. Va. Code, 62-1D-3(a)(1), and 18 U.S.C. § 2511(1)(a) are inadmissible under W. Va. Code, 62-1D-6, and 18 U.S.C. § 2515.

The DHHR contends Jill L.'s conversations with her children do not fall within the parameters of 18 U.S.C. § 2511(1)(a), and W. Va. Code, 62-1D-3(a)(1), because she had no reasonable expectation her conversations were private. As support, the DHHR states that "neighbors have reported hearing [Jill L.'s] emotional outbursts toward her children, even when [Jill L.] and the children are inside their home. In fact, on one occasion, a neighbor outside in his yard using a power tool reported that he heard [Jill L.'s] screams over the noise of the tool." Thus, the DHHR argues Jill L.'s conversations are not "oral communications" as defined by 18 U.S.C. § 2510(2) (1986), and W. Va. Code, 62-1D-2(h) (1987).

Both statutes, 18 U.S.C. § 2510(2), and W. Va. Code, 62-1D-2(h), define oral communication as "any oral communication uttered by a person exhibiting an expectation that such communication is not subject to interception under circumstances justifying such expectation, but such term does not include any electronic communication." We find the DHHR's argument to be without merit. First, none of the neighbors testified at the hearing on May 2, 1994. In fact, at that point, it only had been reported to the DHHR that the neighbors overheard Jill L.'s screams, and the child protective service worker testified she had not actually spoken to any of them. As a result, even if we assume the neighbors did overhear Jill L.'s screaming, we do not know what the neighbors overheard or when they overheard it. Moreover, it virtually would be impossible to determine if the episodes the neighbors overheard are the exact same episodes recorded on the audiotapes.

Second, even if the neighbor's overheard various conversations Jill L. had with her children while Jill L. and the children were within their house, it did not give David L. carte blanche authority to procure a third person to hide a voice-activated tape recorder in the children's bedroom to record all conversations between Jill L. and the children. Certainly, Jill L.'s reasonable expectation of privacy would preclude such a serious intrusion.

The DHHR next argues that regardless of the policy reasons to protect Jill L.'s right to privacy, her right must be determined to be subordinate and, thus, succumb to the best interests of the children. We agree with the DHHR that the best interests of the children are of preeminent concern in child custody cases and to this Court. See Judith R. v. Hey, 185 W. Va. 117, 120, 405 S.E.2d 447, 450 (1990); Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W. Va. 448, 450-51, 388 S.E.2d 322, 324 (1989). However, under the facts of this case, it is not necessary for this Court to choose between Jill L.'s right to privacy and the best interests of the children. If the DHHR is correct in stating the neighbors have overheard Jill L.'s "emotional outbursts," then the audiotapes are not necessary to establish this claim. If they wish, the DHHR or David L. can call the neighbors to testify at the custody hearing. In addition, direct information given by the children or other types of admissible evidence, i.e., reports with regard to psychological examinations, may all be considered by the circuit court to determine the best interests of the children.

As a final argument, David L. asserts the tape recordings were not unlawfully obtained under W. Va. Code, 62-1D-3(c)(2) (1987), because he informed the children he would be recording in their bedroom at some unspecified time. David L. argues that he, as the children's father, had authority to give their consent under W. Va. Code, 62-1D-3(c)(2), which provides, in relevant part: "It is lawful . . . for a person to intercept a wire, oral or electronic communication where the person is a party to the communication or where one of the parties to the communication has given prior consent to the interception[.]" Substantially similar language also is contained in 18 U.S.C. § 2511(2)(d). See footnote 9 David L. cites no law in support of his position.

The closest case we can find to support David L.'s contention is Thompson v. Dulaney, 838 F. Supp. 1535 (D. Utah 1993). In Thompson, Denise Dulaney and James Thompson were living apart from one another and in the process of getting a divorce when Ms. Dulaney tape recorded certain telephone conversations between Mr. Thompson and their children, ages three and five. During the custody hearings, Ms. Dulaney introduced transcripts of several conversations. The state court found both parents were fit, but awarded custody to Ms. Dulaney. Subsequently, Mr. Thompson filed suit alleging, in part, Ms. Dulaney's actions violated 18 U.S.C. § 2510, et seq.

Ms. Dulaney said she recorded the conversations because Mr. Thompson was interfering with her and the children's relationship. One of the defenses Ms. Dulaney raised to Mr. Thompson's suit was that under 18 U.S.C. § 2511(2)(d), she had "the parental right to consent on behalf of minor children who lack legal capacity to consent and who cannot give actual consent[.]" See footnote 10 838 F. Supp. 1544. Ms. Dulaney cited a litany of Utah law which grants to her the right to make various decisions for her children. In this respect, the court stated "Utah law clearly vests the legal custodian of a minor child with certain rights to act on behalf of that minor child." 838 F. Supp. at 1544. In addition, the court said it was "a close and difficult question," and carefully limited its holding to the particular facts before it. 838 F. Supp. at 1544. The court then went on to hold

> "as long as the guardi an has a good faith basis that is objectively reasonable for believi ng that it is ne cessary to consent on be half of > her minor children to the taping of the phone conversations, vicarious consent will be permissible in order for the guardian to fulfill her statutory mandate to act in the best interests of the children." 838 F. Supp. at 1544.

We do not disagree with the reasoning in Thompson; however, we determine the facts of the present case are different from the facts in Thompson in two significant respects. First, the children were physically residing with Ms. Dulaney at the time the conversations were recorded. Second, the conversations were recorded from a telephone in the house where Ms. Dulaney and the children resided.

On the other hand, in the present case, first, Jill L., not David L., was awarded temporary custody of the children during the divorce proceedings. Second, the recordings occurred in Jill L.'s house, not David L.'s house, and he had absolutely no dominion or control over Jill L.'s house where he procured his mother's assistance to hide the tape recorder. Thus, under the specific facts of the case before us, we hold a parent has no right on behalf of his or her children to give consent under W. Va. Code, 62-1D-3(c)(2), or 18 U.S.C. § 2511(2)(d), to have the children's conversations with the other parent recorded while the children are in the other parent's house. Therefore, David L. is not protected by the consent language in W. Va. Code, 62-1D-3(c)(2), or 18 U.S.C. § 2511(2)(d). See footnote 11

Finally, we mention we are very much concerned that the best interests of these children are protected in the custody hearings. With regard to this concern, we direct the circuit court to order the DHHR to conduct home studies of both parents See footnote 12 if such studies are not already complete and satisfactory. As we state in Syllabus Point 5 of John D.K. v. Polly A.S., 190 W. Va. 254, 438 S.E.2d 46 (1993):

"In domestic cases involving allegations of abuse and neglect, a circuit court or family law master may order that a home study be performed to investigate the allegations under Rule 34(b) of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Law."

The circuit court must examine closely the evidence on the fitness of both parents to determine whether Jill L. or David L. should be awarded permanent custody of their children. We further order both the circuit court and the DHHR to expedite this matter so the custody issue is resolved. See John D.K., supra; In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

III.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, we hold the recordings violated W. Va. Code, 62-1D-3(a)(1), and 18 U.S.C. § 2511(1)(a), and may not be admitted into evidence in the custody proceedings under W. Va. Code, 62-1D-6, or 18 U.S.C. § 2515. We, therefore, agree with the circuit court's conclusions with regard to the certified questions. See footnote 13

The certified questions having been answered, this case is dismissed from the docket. See footnote 14

Answered and dismissed.

Footnote: 1 As is our practice in cases involving sensitive facts, we do not use the last names to avoid stigmatizing the parties. See, e.g., State v. Derr, W. Va. , S.E.2d (No. 22101 11/18/94); State ex rel. Div. of Human Serv. by Mary C.M. v. Benjamin P.B., 183 W. Va. 220, 395 S.E.2d 220 (1990).

Footnote: 2 David L. is represented by a different lawyer on appeal.

Footnote: 3 In addition, she spoke with the therapist from Family Services, Inc., who apparently talked to the children, but did not appear herself in court to testify. She also talked to the girls' kindergarten teacher who could not give her any specific information.

Footnote: 4 By order dated June 22, 1994, this Court stayed all proceedings in the circuit court while we reviewed the certified questions. Subsequently, by order dated June 30, 1994, we clarified the stay to permit the DHHR to proceed with actions necessary to meet the best interests and needs of the children.
In its brief, the DHHR reports the children continue to have problems with Jill L. during visitations. These problemsinclude "spankings and hittings, sometimes resulting inbruises, and emotional tirades directed toward them." The DHHR states the circuit court now has "entered an order more specifically setting out the terms of the supervision during visitation and abating all physical discipline of the children by either parent until further order of the Court."

Footnote: 5 18 U.S.C. § 2511(1)(a) states:
"(1) Except as otherwise specifically provided in this chapter any person who--
"(a) intentionally intercepts, endeavors to intercept, or procures any other person to intercept or endeavor to intercept, any wire, oral, or electronic communication; shall be punished as provided in subsection (4) or shall be subject to suit as provided in subsection (5)."
* * *

Footnote: 6W. Va. Code, 62-1D-6, states:
"Evidence obtained, directly or indirectly, by the interception of any wire, oral or electronic communication shall be received in evidence only in grand jury proceedings and criminal proceedings in magistrate court and circuit court: Provided, That evidence obtained in violation of the provisions of this article shall not be admissible in any proceeding."
Likewise, 18 U.S.C. § 2515 provides:
"Whenever any wire or oral communication has been intercepted, no part of the contents of such communication and no evidence derived therefrom may be received in evidence in any trial, hearing, or other proceeding in or before any court, grand jury, department, officer, agency, regulatory body, legislative committee, or other authority of the United States, a State, or a political subdivision thereof if the disclosure of that information would be in violation of this chapter."

Footnote: 7 One of the exceptions under 18 U.S.C. § 2510, et seq., is set forth in 18 U.S.C. § 2516 (1988), which authorizes the interception of wire, oral, or electronic communications in certain situations. 18 U.S.C. § 2516(2) provides: "The principal prosecuting attorney of any State, or the principal prosecuting attorney of any political subdivision thereof, if such attorney is authorized by a statute of that State to make application to a State court judge of competent jurisdiction for an order authorizing or approving the interception of wire, oral, or electronic communications, may apply to such judge for, and such judge may grant in conformity with section 2518 of this chapter and with the applicable State statute an order authorizing, or approving the interception of wire, oral, or electronic communications by investigative or law enforcement officers having responsibility for the investigation of the offense as to which the application is made, when such interception may provide or has provided evidence of the commission of the offense of murder, kidnapping, gambling, robbery, bribery, extortion, or dealing in narcotic drugs, marihuana or other dangerous drugs, or other crime dangerous to life, limb, or property, and punishable by imprisonment for more than one year, designated in any applicable State statute authorizing such interception, or any conspiracy to commit any of the foregoing offenses." (Emphasis added).
Therefore, under 18 U.S.C. § 2516(2), a prosecuting attorney may request a circuit court to enter an order permitting the interception of communications in certain situations.
In West Virginia, certainly child abuse and neglect are considered crimes that are "dangerous to life [and] limb . . . and [are] punishable by imprisonment for more than one year." 18 U.S.C. § 2516(2). See W. Va. Code, 61-8D-1, et seq. However, our legislature did not include child abuse and neglect in the statute authorizing interceptions of communications. W. Va. Code, 62-1D-8 (1987), permits an order authorizing interceptions of communications where there is "reasonable cause to believe the interception would provide evidence of the commission of" certain enumerated crimes. Among the crimes listed are those generally involving kidnapping and abduction; escape or aiding an escape by an inmate; "dealing, transferring or trafficking in any controlled substance or substances"; or aiding or abetting or conspiring to commit any of these offenses. We leave it to the sound discretion of the legislature if it chooses to amend W. Va. Code, 62-1D-8, to include such serious crimes as child abuse and neglect.

Upon its consideration of this issue, the legislature similarly should contemplate establishing a procedure whereby a parent could, under the authority of W. Va. Code, 62-1D-3(c)(2), be permitted to request an ex parte hearing before a circuit court for the purposes of obtaining the circuit court's permission on behalf of the child to tape record conversations when there is a reasonable basis for believing that child abuse is occurring or is about to occur. Just as a circuit court often is authorized to make or approve other decisions on behalf of minors and others under disability, so, too, should the circuit court have the authority, upon findings of fact tending to demonstrate the likelihood that child abuse is occurring, to consent to such recordings on behalf of the minor. See, e.g., W. Va. Code, 16-2F-4 (1984) (setting forth right of minor to petition circuit court for waiver of parental notification necessary for abortion); see also W. Va. Code, 44A-1-1 to -7 (circuit courts have appointment, modification, and termination powers as to guardians and conservators for protected persons); W. Va. Code, 56-4-10 (1923) (noting the duty of the circuit court to see that estate of infant or insane is both represented and protected); W.Va.R.Civ.P. 17(c) (guardian may sue on behalf of infant or incompetent).

Certainly, it would open a Pandora's Box of possible abuse to permit one parent to have open season on the interception of conversations of his or her former spouse in the name of child protection without any real safeguard in place for determining whether there was a legitimate and reasonable basis for such interception. However, in a truly legitimate case, a neutral judicial officer should have the authority to hear evidence to determine whether such interception is warranted and to limit the parameters of such interception in the least obtrusive manner possible, while still accomplishing its legitimate purpose.

Footnote: 8 In the other case cited by Marano, supra, United States v. Rizzo, supra, the Seventh Circuit factually distinguished the case before it from Simpson, supra, and said it "need not choose between the interpretations given the statute in Simpson and in Jones[, supra]." 583 F.2d at 909.

Footnote: 9 18 U.S.C. § 2511(2)(d) provides, in part:

"It shall not be unlawful under this chapter for a person not acting under color of law to intercept a wire, oral, or electronic communication where such person is a party to the communication or where one of the parties to the communication has given prior consent to such interception[.]"

Footnote: 10 The court found because of the children's ages, three and five, the children "clearly lacked legal capacity to consent, and they could not, in any meaningful sense, have given actual consent, either express or implied, since they were incapable of understanding the nature of consent and of making a truly voluntary decision to consent." 838 F. Supp. at 1543.

Footnote: 11 We draw a distinction between the present situation and a situation in which a guardian, who lives with the children and who has a duty to protect the welfare of the children, gives consent on behalf of the children to intercept telephone conversations within the house where the guardian and the children reside.

Footnote: 12 Jill L. alleges in her brief that David L. "has a history of alcohol abuse and . . . [has] physically terrorized [her] both during their marriage and after their separation."

Footnote: 13 We specifically do not address the propriety of any civil or criminal action that may be brought as the result of these recordings.

Footnote: 14 We question whether this case was an appropriate case for certified questions. Cf. Bass v. Coltelli, W. Va. , S.E.2d (No. 22304 12/12/94).
No. 22311 - West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ex rel. Brenda Wright, Social Service Worker v. David L., Jill L., Chelsea L., Ashley L., and Joshua L.

Neely, J., concurring:

This case is like a single log floating upstream that neither notes nor considers the rush of other logs in downriver traffic. Although I agree that this log-- case -- is properly headed, I pause to consider the downriver traffic.

The majority holds, and I agree, that audiotapes surreptitiously recorded by one spouse in the house of the other estranged spouse are inadmissible under W. Va. Code 62-1D-3(a)(1) [1987]; however, the majority fails to see or consider the conflict between W. Va. Rules of Evid. and W. Va. Code 62-1D-3(a) [1987]. See footnote 1

First, under the Rules of Evid. these audiotapes are admissible. Rule 402 states that "[a]ll relevant evidence is admissible." Relevant evidence is defined by Rule 401 to mean "evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence." In this case, the audiotapes are of Jill L.'s conversations with her children. These conversations show facts that are "of consequence to the determination of" the question of Jill L.'s alleged abuse of her children. Thus under Rule 402 the audiotapes are admissible.

Second, by using the reasoning of Gilman v. Choi, 185 W. Va. 177, 406 S.E.2d 200 (1990)(refusing to recognize the conflict between W. Va. Code 55-7B-7 [1986] and Rule 702, W. Va. Rules of Evid.) and Teter v. Old Colony Co., 190 W. Va. 711, 441 S.E.2d 728 (1994) (W. Va. Rules of Evid., Rule 702 prevails over W. Va. Code 37-14-3(a)'s license or certification requirement for real estate appraisers), the Court could have used the Rules to invalidate the specific statute. Indeed in this case the reasoning of Gilman and Teter requires the Court to ignore the legislature's prohibition against wiretapping-- a mere section of the Code -- to cite to this Court's rule-making authority as set forth in Syllabus Points 1 and 2 of Bennett v. Warner, 179 W. Va. 742, 372 S.E.2d 920 (1988) See footnote 2 and to admit the audiotapes.

Today's opinion ignores the conflict between "procedural" and "substantive" mechanisms and circuit courts are left without guidance concerning when to follow a restrictive statute or the more liberal W. Va. Rules of Evid. As stated in my dissent in Gilman 185 at 190, 406 S.E.2d at 213, this Court should not use court-promulgated rules "to foreclose the use of tools such as modifications of the law of evidence traditionally thought to be available to legislatures." See Reed v. Phillips, ___ W. Va. ___, ____, ____ S.E.2d ___, ____ (No. 22196 Filed December 8, 1994)(Neely, J. dissenting)(judicial branch should not use "precious reasoning. . .[to] confound . . .[a] legitimate political compromise").

I concur in the direction of this log but pause to wonder at what the majority does not see or discuss.

Footnote: 1 I recognize that this case can also be decided exclusively under 18 U.S.C. § 2511 and the U.S. Constitution Supremacy Clause. But the majority didn't decide that way, thus allowing me to have my usual fun with result-oriented principle manipulation.

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia

DAVID M.

v.

MARGARET M.

No. 19020.

Oct. 19, 1989.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "The exercise of discretion by a trial court in awarding custody of a minor child will not be disturbed on appeal unless that discretion has been abused: however, where the trial court's ruling does not reflect a discretionary decision but is based upon an erroneous application of the law and is clearly wrong, the ruling will be reversed on appeal." Syllabus Point 2, Funkhouser v. Funkhouser, 158 W.Va. 964, 216 S.E.2d 570 (1975).

2. "With reference to the custody of very young children, the law presumes that it is in the best interest of such children to be placed in the custody of their primary caretaker, if he or she is fit." Syllabus point 2, Garska v. McCoy, 167 W.Va. 59, 278 S.E.2d 357 (1981).

3. The "primary caretaker" is the parent who has taken primary responsibility for, inter alia, the performance of the following caring and nurturing duties of a parent: (1) preparing and planning of meals; (2) bathing, grooming and dressing; (3) purchasing, cleaning, and care of clothes; (4) medical care, including nursing and trips to physicians; (5) arranging for social interaction among peers after school, i.e. transporting to friends' houses or, for example, to girl or boy scout meetings; (6) arranging alternative care, i.e. babysitting, day-care, etc.; (7) putting child to bed at night, attending to child in the middle of the night, waking child in the morning; (8) disciplining, i.e. teaching general manners and toilet training; (9) educating, i.e. religious, cultural, social, etc.; and, (10) teaching elementary skills, i.e., reading, writing and arithmetic.

4. In West Virginia we intend that generally the question of which parent, if either, is the primary caretaker of minor children in a divorce proceeding is proven with lay testimony from the parties themselves and from teachers, relatives and neighbors. In most cases, the question of which parent does the lion's share of the chores can be answered satisfactorily and quickly. Once the primary caretaker has been identified, the only question is whether that parent is a "fit parent." In this regard, the court is not concerned with assessing relative degrees of fitness between the two parents such as might require expert witnesses, but only with whether the primary caretaker achieves a passing grade on an objective test.

5. To be considered fit, the primary caretaker parent must: (1) feed and clothe the child appropriately; (2) adequately supervise the child and protect him or her from harm; (3) provide habitable housing; (4) avoid extreme discipline, child abuse, and other similar vices; and (5) refrain from immoral behavior under circumstances that would affect the child. In this last regard, restrained normal sexual behavior does not make a parent unfit.

6. In exceptional cases when the trial judge is unsure about the wisdom of awarding the children to the primary caretaker, he or she may ask children of appropriate age and discretion for their preference and accord that preference whatever weight he or she deems appropriate. Such an interview, because of the problems in asking children about their parental preference, should not, however, be routine and neither party may demand such an interview as a matter of right.

7. "Acts of sexual misconduct by a [primary caretaker], albeit wrongs against an innocent spouse, may not be considered as evidence going to the fitness of the [caretaker] for child custody unless [his or] her conduct is so aggravated, given contemporary moral standards, that reasonable men would find that [his or] her immorality, per se, warranted a finding of unfitness because of the deleterious effect upon the child of being raised by a [primary caretaker] with such a defective character." Syllabus Point 4, J.B. v. A.B., 161 W.Va. 332, 242 S.E.2d 248 (1978) as modified by Garska v. McCoy, 167 W.Va. 59, 70, 278 S.E.2d 357, 363 (1981).

8. We do not authorize court-ordered joint custody over the objections of a primary caretaker parent although parents may agree to such an arrangement.

9. "A cardinal criterion for an award of joint custody is the agreement of the parties and their mutual ability to cooperate in reaching shared decisions in matters affecting the child's welfare." Syllabus Point 5, Lowe v. Lowe, 179 W.Va. 536, 372[370] S.E.2d 730[731] (1988).

Patrick E. McFarland, Eugene T. Hague, Jr., Redmond, McFarland & Hague, Parkersburg, for appellant, Margaret M.

Philip E. D'Orazio, Parkersburg, for appellee, David M.

NEELY, Justice:

Margaret M. appeals from a divorce order entered by the Circuit Court of Wood County that awarded David M. custody of their son, Timothy, age six. See footnote 1 Mrs. M. contends that the Circuit Court erred in adopting the findings of the family law master which held that although Mrs. M. was the primary caretaker of the child, she was not a fit and suitable person to have permanent care and custody of the child. We agree with Mrs. M. and reverse the trial court's ruling.

The parties were married on 4 August 1979 and lived together in Wood County until 7 September 1988. Mr. M. filed a complaint alleging cruel and inhuman treatment or, in the alternative, adultery and seeking custody of their son, then age five. In her answer, Mrs. M. denied the allegations, filed a counterclaim alleging irreconcilable differences and sought custody of their son. Mr. M., in his reply to the counterclaim, admitted that irreconcilable differences existed between the parties.

The case was referred to a family law master and by agreement of the parties the case was bifurcated with only the divorce and the custody issues to be heard, reserving all other issues for further proceedings. After a hearing on the matter, the family law master found: (1) irreconcilable differences existed between the parties; (2) Mrs. M. was the primary caretaker; (3) Mrs. M. had committed adultery on two occasions over two years; and (4) Mrs. M. was not a fit and suitable person to have custody of the child. The Circuit Court adopted the findings and conclusions of the family law master, granted the parties a divorce, and awarded Mr. M. custody of their child, subject to reasonable visitation rights.

In the present case, although the primary caretaker parent rule as described in Garska v. McCoy, 167 W.Va. 59, 278 S.E.2d 357 (1981), appears to have been followed, the primary caretaker was denied custody through a broad interpretation of the fitness requirement. See footnote 2 We have noted that our very narrow exception to the primary caretaker rule has of late developed a voracious appetite which, if left unchecked, will allow it to eat the rule. We write today to reaffirm and clarify the benefits of the primary caretaker parent rule to assist the family law masters and the circuit courts in reaching the best interests of the child by applying the primary caretaker parent presumption and its limited requirement of fitness. When properly applied, the primary caretaker parent presumption reduces sharp practices in custody negotiation, prevents fathers and mothers from being penalized on account of their gender, and avoids custody battles that are so unwieldy and intrusive that they make the lives of a divorcing couple and their children even more miserable than they otherwise would be.

In the nineteenth century, and in the early part of this century, the law gave fathers custody of their children after divorce, particularly when mothers were held at fault in breaking up the marriage. See footnote 3 That rule was a logical extension of the inferior legal status of women, the husband's property right in his family's labor, and the husband's absolute obligation to support his children. See footnote 4 Even a hundred years ago, however, this rule made little sense in light of human emotions and society's expectation that children would be raised by women. Consequently, it was abolished in this century. By 1950, it was almost always the rule that a mother was the preferred custodian of young children if she was a fit parent. See footnote 5

But the behavior that different courts characterized as evidencing "fitness" differed dramatically. In application, the rule of maternal preference allowed judges substantial leeway to take a mother's fault into consideration in the award of custody. It was frequently the case, therefore, that sexual "promiscuity" (a term that tends to mean different things when applied to women than to men, with women getting the short end of the double standard) on the part of the woman would cause a court to declare her "unfit." See footnote 6

Currently, all parental rights in child custody matters are subordinate to the interests of the innocent child. The pole star in child custody cases is the welfare of the child. We have repeatedly acknowledged that the child's welfare is the paramount and controlling factor in all custody matters. J.B. v. A.B., supra note 5, 161 W.Va. at 335-36, 242 S.E.2d at 251; Funkhouser, supra note 5, 158 W.Va. at 969, 216 S.E.2d at 573; Boos v. Boos, 93 W.Va. 727, 117 S.E. 616 (1923); Dawson v. Dawson, 57 W.Va. 520, 50 S.E. 613 (1905).

In J.B. v. A.B., we examined our custody presumption in favor of mothers in light of our concern for the welfare of the child and found:

> The welfare of the child seems to requi re that if at all possible we avoid subjecting children to the trauma of being wrenched away from their mothers, upon whom they have natu rally both em otional and physical dependency.
> Id. 161 W.Va. at 338-39, 242 S.E.2d at 253 (emphasis in original).

Today, the presumption in favor of mothers is rapidly eroding because the maternal preference presumption discriminates against fathers on the basis of sex. In the 1980 amendment to W.Va.Code, 48-2-15, the legislature provided in relevant part:

> ... There shall be no legal presumption th at, as between the natural parents, either the father or the m other should be awarded custody of said children but the court shall m ake an award of cu stody solely for the best interest of the children based upon the merits of each case. See footnote 7

Although in Garska, supra, 167 W.Va. at 70, 278 S.E.2d at 363, we abolished the gender-based presumption, we reaffirmed our holding in J.B. v. A.B., "except that wherever the words 'mother,' 'maternal,' or 'maternal preference' [were] used" some variation of the term "primary caretaker parent" should be substituted.

In jurisdictions that retain some type of maternal preference in awarding custody of very young children, the maternal preference has become largely a tie breaker. The emerging rule is that all custody disputes be decided on their individual merits, with the parent whom the judge considers the most competent receiving custody. See footnote 8 At first glance, this emerging rule seems to make sense, since some fathers are excellent parents and some mothers are child abusers. See footnote 9 Unfortunately, however, this individualized, sex-neutral approach poses serious problems because the welfare of the child is often lost by the distorted incentives created by the divorce settlement process.

Substantial research has confirmed that young children, as a result of intimate interaction, form a unique bond with their primary caretaker. This unique attachment to a primary caretaker is an essential cornerstone of a child's sense of security and healthy emotional development. See footnote 10

At the earliest stage, [the attachment to a primary caretaker] is critical to the child's learning to place trust in others and to have confidence in her own capacities. Later, it plays a central role in the child's capacity to establish emotional bonds with other persons. The sense of trust in others and in self that the attachment provides may also affect the child's development of intellectual and social skills. The growing child passes through many developmental stages, each requiring her to acquire critical skills and capacities.... The original bond of the child with the primary caretaker is believed to have an important continuing effect on the child's ability to pass through each stage with success. See footnote 11

Thus, the young child's welfare can be best served by preserving the child's relationship with the primary caretaker parent. Without a presumption in favor of the primary caretaker parent, the process--or even the prospect--of sorting out custody problems in court affects those problems, usually for the worse.

The unpredictability of courts in divorce matters offers many opportunities for a parent (generally the father) to minimize support payments and gain leverage in settlement negotiations. The most effective, and hence the most generally used, tactic is to threaten a custody fight. The effectiveness of the threat increases in direct proportion to the other parent's unwillingness to give up custody. Because women, much more than men, are preeminently interested in custody, seemingly gender-neutral custody rules actually serve to expose women to extortionate bargaining at the hands of their husbands.

A sizable body of research has confirmed that mothers are much more likely than fathers to feel close to their children. In 1977, Sharon Araji of Washington State University published a study entitled "Husbands' and Wives' Attitude-Behavior Congruence on Family Roles." See footnote 12 In that study, she asked her subjects their opinion on the proper division of family labor and then asked how such work was in fact divided in their households. More than two-thirds stated that child-care labor should be equally divided. When asked about actual performance, however, those same people overwhelmingly responded that it was the woman in their household who bore the brunt of child-care duties. Shared responsibility for child care would seem more a cosmopolitan pretension than a reality in most settings.

Another study done at the University of Nevada that same year See footnote 13 found that the division of labor within households is resistant to change. Furthermore, the responsibility for child care was among the duties least often shared. To the extent that husbands participated in child care at all, they were more likely to be involved in playing, baby-sitting and disciplining rather than in such day-to-day tasks as feeding, changing and bathing. The Nevada study is also significant in that it examined cohabiting couples as well as married ones. One might expect that those cohabiting would show more progressive attitudes in the division of domestic responsibilities, but the study found that such couples nonetheless hewed closely to the sexual stereotypes of the world in which they grew up.

Such was also the case with couples in which the women were highly career- oriented. See footnote 14 Even among such couples, it was found, both spouses generally assumed that the woman would be the one primarily responsible for child care. A crucial finding was that the decision to take primary responsibility for the children was frequently a voluntary one for women, who saw parenting as a fundamental element of a successful female life.

Still, just because most women strongly desire custody and most men do not doesn't mean that such is the case in every instance. Fathers who want to retain the companionship of their children and who believe that they would be better single parents than their wives expect the judicial system to operate on the basis of more refined principles than simple statistically-based discrimination. See footnote 15

Fathers are now demanding that courts award custody based on an individualized inquiry into their specific situations. This appears reasonable on its face. But when we understand the costs of such an inquiry, and appreciate as well just how much sinister bargaining is carried out in the shadow of such an unpredictable, case-specific system, we must think again. And, as part IV, infra, will demonstrate, our conclusions in this regard are now shared by a growing number of states.

II

The individualized approach might be ideal if it were costless and if courts actually considered the relative merits of the parents in each case. In fact, however, the individualized approach is intrusive, time-consuming and inherently distortive in its effect. And, because the vast majority of divorces are settled without ever reaching court, See footnote 16 very few custody arrangements receive even the dubious benefit of a judicial determination that they are in the "best interests of the child."

Under the individualized approach to the "best interests of the child" standard, custody, when contested, goes to the parent who the court believes will do a better job of child rearing. This standard is a substitute for the maternal preference rule or its gender-neutral successor, the primary caretaker parent rule. It operates as well in those states retaining a weak maternal preference, with that preference being only a tie breaker. In order to assign custody, the court must explore the dark recesses of psychological theory to determine which parent will, in the long run, do a better job.

However, this undertaking inevitably leads to the hiring of expert witnesses--psychologists, psychiatrists, social workers and sociologists. See footnote 17 These experts are paid by the parties to demonstrate that one or the other (coincidentally, always the client) is the superior parent in light of his or her personality, experience and aptitude for parenting. The experts will advance the theory that whatever positive aspects of personality their client possesses are preeminently important to successful single-parent child-raising. See footnote 18

Expert witnesses are, after all, very much like lawyers: They are paid to take a set of facts from which different inferences may be drawn and to characterize those facts so that a particular conclusion follows. There are indeed cases in which a mother or father may appear competent on the surface, only to be exposed after perfunctory inquiry as a child abuser. Under truly careful inquiry, such discoveries might be made more often. Such careful inquiry, however, is almost impossible in the real world because it requires experts who combine competence and integrity in a way that is seldom found, at least in courtrooms. The side with the stronger case can afford to hire only competent experts with profound integrity; the side with the weaker case, on the other hand, wants impressively glib experts who are utterly devoid of principles. When both parents are good parents, the battle of the experts can result only in gibberish.

No issue is more subject to personal bias than a decision about which parent is "better." Should children be placed with an "open, empathetic" father or with a "stern but value-supporting" mother? The decision may hinge on the judge's memory of his or her own parents or on his or her distrust of an expert whose eyes are averted once too often. It is unlikely that the decision will be the kind of individualized justice that the system purports to deliver.

Even when the judge, like most judges, has an intuitive grasp of the difference between good testimony and bunkum, the process is itself destructive. Judges in states that have a "best interests of the child" standard or a weak maternal presumption must allow days of testimony from a parade of highly paid experts before finally rendering a decision. In most cases, the judge ends up deciding that the mother is closer to the children and awards custody accordingly. Yet the hearings, as generally irrelevant as they are to the outcome, are bad in and of themselves because the very process of preparing experts to testify increases the hardship for all concerned. See Garska, supra, 167 W.Va. at 65, 278 S.E.2d at 361.

In order for a psychiatrist or psychologist to testify in court about so- called personality integration or similar psychological phenomena, the expert must interview parents and children, conduct tests and perhaps observe the litigants in a family setting. This very exercise can undermine the mental health of the children as well as the emotional stability of the parents. Id. When an elaborate custody battle is anticipated, the experts will create painful situations in their efforts to substantiate the testimony they have been paid to give. In much the same way that an artillery battery can "liberate the hell out of" a peaceful hamlet, experts can create emotional imbalances in the very children they are trying to "protect." See footnote 19

In the child custody context, children fall into one of three groups, depending on their age. Children under six years of age are called "children of tender years": They are the most dependent on their parents, but they usually cannot articulate an intelligent opinion about their custody. Children between six and fourteen are also dependent on their parents, but they can usually articulate a preference regarding custody arrangements and explain their reasons. See footnote 20 By the age of fourteen a child takes on many of the qualities of an adult; in most cases, unless geography interferes, a child over fourteen will decide for himself or herself the parent with whom he or she wants to live, regardless of what a court says. See footnote 21

Children over the age of six might seem to be the best available experts on the subject of how the parents and children get along. Usually, however, children do not want what is best for them; they want what is pleasant. See footnote 22 If children are permitted to influence decisions about custody simply by stating a preference, the parents are placed in the position of being competitive bidders in a counterfeit currency. For the children, the results are seldom positive. See footnote 23

That is because the litigation process is not neutral, but has its own peculiar and dangerous side effects. Unlike other litigation that sorts out rights and obligations based on facts frozen in time, custody decisions are predictions of what is best for the child--predictions based on facts constantly changing in part as a result of the litigation process. See footnote 24 If the divorce drags through the trial and appellate courts for two years, the lawsuit itself may wound or destroy the very children whose welfare is supposed to be at its center. In addition, money that would have been available to ease the transition from joint household to separate households is diverted instead to lawyers, court fees and expert witnesses.

Once a custody battle is contemplated, the relationship between parents and children usually changes for the worse. The overriding need to prepare for court will dominate the lives of both parents and if the children are to be polled--either directly through court testimony or indirectly through the probing of experts--each parent is probably going to attempt to poison the other's well.

The degree to which children suffer during divorce is a widely discussed subject. See footnote 25 The slowly grinding machinery of the courts inevitably exacerbates the emotional stresses that result from the simple fact of divorce. Among the damaging effects of custody litigation are uncertainty, painful psychological probing (e.g., "Who do you love more, Mommy or Daddy?"), and competitive parental bribery. The magnitude of these effects is a direct function of the time it takes to conclude the proceedings.

Damage in these matters is magnified by the different meaning time has for children as opposed to adults. Events that transpired in childhood can be remembered in meticulous detail, while similar events, for an adult, are largely a blur. When a person is forty, a year represents one-fortieth of his or her life; for someone who is five, a year represents one-fifth. Divorce is by its very nature traumatic not only in terms of the mother's and father's separation but also in terms of new male and female companions for each entering the scene. If the children have no idea with whom they will live or under what terms or even where, the consequent uncertainty is likely to undermine their ability to function. Their relations with other children may suffer, their ties to the community may be threatened, and the stress they are under can cause academic failure. See footnote 26

The harms of courtroom custody battles happen only in a relatively small minority of divorces because the vast majority of divorce cases are settled out of court. See footnote 27 However, the possibility of a courtroom custody battle also causes problems in out-of-court settlement negotiations.

Divorce decrees are typically drafted for the parties after compromises reached through private negotiation. These compromises are then approved by a judge, who generally gives them only the most perfunctory review. The result is that parties (usually husbands) are free to use whatever leverage is available to obtain a favorable settlement. In practice this tends to mean that husbands will threaten custody fights, with all of the accompanying traumas and uncertainties discussed above, as a means of intimidating wives into accepting less child support, alimony or distribution of marital property than is sufficient to allow the mother to live and raise the children appropriately as a single parent. See footnote 28 To some extent the uncertainty in the amount of child support payments is limited by the application of the guidelines required by W.Va.Code, 48A-2-8 [1986]. See footnote 29 The guidelines for child support awards are set forth in 6 W.Va.Code of State Rules 78-16-1 to 78-16-20 (effective May 2, 1988). See footnote 30 Because women are usually unwilling to accept even a minor risk of losing custody, however, such techniques, despite the guidelines, are generally successful because the guidelines establish minima and do not apply to alimony or property distribution.

Under any purportedly gender-neutral system, women on statistical average come out of divorce settlements with the worst of all possible results: They get the children, but insufficient money with which to support them. They are forced to scrape along to support their families at inadequate standards of living, and the children are forced to grow up poor, or at least poorer than they should be. Yet the negotiation dynamic is seldom discussed, despite its importance in promoting the growth of a rapidly-expanding class of poor people, the female-headed household.

An important reason that little attention has been given to the effect of in- court rules on out-of-court bargaining is that views on divorce are informed more by wishful thinking than by the facts of life. Many people (especially men) begin with a political conviction that women ought to be equal to men economically, from which they leap to the insupportable conclusion that women are equal to men economically. It then follows that women can support children as well as men can and that whoever wants the children can pay for them.

In the real world, however, women are much poorer than men, and this pattern is highly resistant to change. See footnote 31 The cost of child care itself is a major economic burden placed on single mothers. Single mothers, who start with unequal earning power, also provide child care--care that involves great amounts of time that could be spent earning money. See footnote 32 But the unfairness only begins there, as so many women are forced to accept lower child support and alimony payments in order to be sure of getting the children (and the accompanying economic burden) at all.

The everyday occurrence of children being traded for money should be sufficient in and of itself to prompt a reevaluation of a system that turns custody awards into bargaining chips. The fact that such trading also has contributed to the impoverishment of women makes the need for change still more urgent. What is needed is a standard for custody awards that assures the welfare of the child without encouraging such pernicious bargaining, but which also does not discriminate by gender.

III

Most of the problems of child custody litigation can be avoided by not litigating the issue in the first place. It is here that the wisdom of the old maternal preference, or its gender-neutral alternative, the "primary caretaker parent presumption," becomes apparent. The primary caretaker presumption severely limits opportunities for using child custody litigation as a bargaining chip.

West Virginia law does not permit a maternal preference. But we do accord an explicit and almost absolute preference to the "primary caretaker parent" of young children, Garska, supra, 167 W.Va. at 68, 278 S.E.2d at 362. We have defined the "primary caretaker" as the parent who:

> ... has taken primary responsibility for, inter alia, the performance of the following caring and nurturing duties of a parent: (1) preparing and planning of m eals; (2) bathing, gr ooming and dressing; (3) purchasing, cleaning, and care of clothes; (4) medical care, including nursing and trips to physicians; (5) arranging for social interaction among peers after school, i.e. transporting to friends' houses o r, for exam ple, to girl or boy scout meetings; (6) arranging alternative care, i.e. babysitting, day-care, etc.; (7) putting child to bed at night, attending to child in the middle of the night, waking child in the morning; (8) disciplining, i.e. teaching general manners and toilet training; (9) educa ting, i.e. religious, cultural, social, etc.; and, (10) teaching elementa ry skills, i.e., reading, writing and arithmetic.

This list of criteria usually, but not necessarily, spells "mother." That fact reflects social reality; the rule itself is neutral on its face and in its application. When women pursue lucrative and successful careers while their husbands take care of the children, those husbands receive the benefit of the presumption as strongly as do traditional mothers. Furthermore, where both parents share child-rearing responsibilities equally, our courts hold hearings to determine which parent would be the better single parent. See footnote 33 This latter situation is rare, but is evidence of the actual gender-neutrality of the primary caretaker presumption.

Our rule inevitably involves some injustice to fathers who, as a group, are usually not primary caretakers. There are instances when the primary caretaker will not be the better custodian in the long run. Yet there is no guarantee that the courts will be able to know, in advance and based on the deliberately distorted evidence that characterizes courtroom custody proceedings, when such is the case. And, notwithstanding its theoretical imperfections, the primary caretaker parent presumption acknowledges that exhaustive hearings on relative degrees of parenting ability rarely disclose any but the most gross variations in skill and suitability. Permitting such hearings inevitably has distortive effect on the parties' behavior, and is likely to lead to potentially disastrous emotional trauma for all concerned if the case goes to court.

Any rule concerning custody matters will be gender-biased, in effect if not in form. An allegedly gender-neutral rule that permits exhaustive inquiry into relative degrees of paternal fitness is inevitably going to favor men in most instances. This bias follows from the observed pattern that in consensual divorces where there is no fight over money--either because there isn't any or because there is enough to go around--women overwhelmingly receive custody through the willing acquiescence of their husbands. Experience teaches that if there is any chance that the average mother will lose her children at divorce, she will either stay married under oppressive conditions or trade away valuable economic rights to ensure that she will be given custody.

In West Virginia we intend that generally the question of which parent, if either, is the primary caretaker of minor children in a divorce proceeding is to be proven with lay testimony from the parties themselves and from teachers, relatives and neighbors. In most cases, the question of which parent does the lion's share of the chores can be answered satisfactorily and quickly. Once the primary caretaker has been identified, the only question is whether that parent is a "fit parent." In this regard, the court is not concerned with assessing relative degrees of fitness between the two parents such as might require expert witnesses, but only with whether the primary caretaker achieves a passing grade on an objective test. That issue does not require experts.

To be a fit parent, a person must: (1) feed and clothe the child appropriately; (2) adequately supervise the child and protect him or her from harm; (3) provide habitable housing; (4) avoid extreme discipline, child abuse, and other similar vices; and (5) refrain from immoral behavior under circumstances that would affect the child. In this last regard, restrained normal sexual behavior does not make a parent unfit. The law does not attend to traditional concepts of immorality in the abstract, but only to whether the child is a party to, or is influenced by, such behavior. Whether a primary caretaker parent meets these criteria can be determined through nonexpert testimony, and the criteria themselves are sufficiently specific that they discourage frivolous disputation. See footnote 34

Furthermore, since J.B. v. A.B., supra note 5, we have divided children into the three age groups. See footnote 35 With regard to children of tender years, the primary caretaker presumption operates absolutely if the primary caretaker is a fit parent. However, with those children able to formulate an intelligent opinion about their custody, our rule becomes more flexible. In exceptional cases when the trial judge is unsure about the wisdom of awarding the children to the primary caretaker, he or she may ask the children for their preference and accord that preference whatever weight he or she deems appropriate. Such an interview, because of the problems in asking children about their parental preference, should not, however, be routine and neither party may demand such an interview as a matter of right. When the children's testimony is necessary, the trial judge should seek to minimize the damage by talking to the children on record but outside their parents' presence. Thus, the "experts" who can rebut the primary caretaker presumption are principally the children, although in extraordinary circumstances a judge may seek or allow expert testimony. The judge is not, however, required to hear the testimony of the children, and will usually not do so, particularly if he or she suspects bribery or undue influence. Nonetheless, by allowing the children to be acceptable experts in our courts, an escape valve is provided in unusually hard cases.

Finally, once a child reaches the age of fourteen, the child is permitted to name his or her guardian if both parents are fit. See footnote 36 Often, as might be expected, this means that the parent who makes the child's life more comfortable will get custody; however, there is little alternative because children over fourteen who are living where they do not want to live will become unhappy and ungovernable anyway. In all three cases, the parent who receives custody is primarily responsible for making decisions concerning the child and for providing the child's permanent home. The other parent, however, is usually accorded liberal visitation rights, including the right to have the child during holidays, part of the summer, and some weekends.

Although the primary caretaker parent presumption may appear cut-and-dried and insufficiently sensitive to the needs of individual children, it serves the welfare of the child by achieving stability of care in the child's life, reducing the uncertainty of custody decisions, limiting the invasiveness of the custody determination process and reducing the expense of domestic litigation. Because litigation per se can be the cause of serious emotional damage to children (and to adults), we consider the primary caretaker parent presumption to be in the best interests of children. Even more important, children cannot be used as pawns in fights that are actually about money because a lawyer can tell a primary caretaker parent that, if fit, that parent has absolutely no chance of losing custody of very young children. The result is that questions of alimony, property distribution, and child support are settled on their own merits.

IV

When we adopted the primary caretaker presumption in Garska, only one other jurisdiction relied upon a determination of primary caretaker in reaching custody decisions. Garska, supra, 167 W.Va. at 69, n. 10, 278 S.E.2d at 357, n. 10, citing Matter of Marriage of Derby, 31 Or.App. 803, 571 P.2d 562 (1977), modified on other grounds, 31 Or.App. 1333, 572 P.2d 1080 (1977). Since then the Supreme Court of Minnesota, citing Garska, adopted a primary caretaker parent presumption for custody of young children. Pikula v. Pikula, 374 N.W.2d 705 (Minn.1985). Justice Wahl in Pikula, id. at 711, reasoned that the primary caretaker presumption secured the best interests of the child by protecting the psychological bonding. Justice Wahl also noted that the "uncertainty of other indicia of a child's best interest ... and the pressing need for coherent decision making on the trial court level and for effective appellate review" required the primary caretaker presumption. Id. at 713. Sefkow v. Sefkow, 427 N.W.2d 203 (Minn.1988), reaffirmed Pikula. In order to preserve the presumption in favor of the primary caretaker, a strong showing of parental unfitness was required to grant custody to the other parent. Tanghe v. Tanghe, 400 N.W.2d 389 (Minn.App.1987).

North Dakota recently considered the primary caretaker presumption but determined that none of the statutory factors should be dispositive. Gravning v. Gravning, 389 N.W.2d 621, 622 (N.D.1986). In her dissent, Justice Levine, citing Garska, argued in favor of the primary caretaker preference because the child's best interest was to remain in the primary caretaker's custody and the "benefits of the primary caretaker rule far outweigh any baggage." Id. at 625. See footnote 37

Both Ohio and Pennsylvania cited our primary caretaker presumption. In re Maxwell, 8 Ohio App.3d 302, 456 N.E.2d 1218 (1982), required strong consideration be given to the factor of primary caretaker to assure the continuation of the care. Thompson v. Thompson, 31 Ohio App.3d 254, 511 N.E.2d 412 (1987), noted that consideration was given to primary caregiver even though the term was not used. Com. ex rel. Jordan v. Jordan, 302 Pa.Super. 421, 448 A.2d 1113, 1115 (1982), held that "the role of primary caretaker, without regard to the sex of the parent, is a substantial factor which the trial judge must weigh in adjudicating a custody matter where the child is of tender years." Jordan then noted the Garska factors for identifying the primary parent. Id.

Cases in other jurisdictions that have recognized the relationship between the primary caretaker parent and the child but have refused to grant that factor a presumption or preference include: Burchard v. Garay, 42 Cal.3d 531, 541, 229 Cal.Rptr. 800, 806-07, 724 P.2d 486, 492-93 (1986) (stressing "the importance of stability and continuity in the life of a child, and the harm that may result from disruption of established patterns of care and emotional bonds," awarded custody of the 2 year old child to the primary caretaker); Agudo v. Agudo, 411 So.2d 249 (Fla.App.1982) (awarding custody of a seventeen-month-old to the primary caretaker based on expert testimony concerning the importance of the psychological bond); Crum v. Crum, 122 A.D.2d 771, 505 N.Y.S.2d 656 (1986) (holding that although a finding of primary caretaker should be considered that factor alone was not determinative of custody); Pusey v. Pusey, 728 P.2d 117 (Utah 1986), later proceeding 750 P.2d 599 (1988) (recognizing primary caretaker as an important factor for determination of child custody).

The following also have recognized the role of the primary caretaker as relevant to custody: Smith v. Smith, 294 S.C. 194, 363 S.E.2d 404, 406 (App.1987) (upholding custody award to the primary caretaker who had custody of the children since the separation; "latter factor alone supports the trial court's decision"); Gordon v. Gordon, 577 P.2d 1271 (Okl.1978), cert. denied 439 U.S. 863, 99 S.Ct. 185, 58 L.Ed.2d 172 (reversing custody award to the father when the mother was shown to be the primary caretaker); Burleigh v. Burleigh, 200 Mont. 1, 650 P.2d 753 (1982) (affirmed custody of two minor children with the mother based on evidence that she was the primary person involved in their care, education and rearing); Leach v. Leach, 660 S.W.2d 761 (Mo.App.1983) (upholding custody award to the primary caretaker father although contrary to the tender years presumption); Marlatt v. Marlatt, 427 So.2d 1285 (La.App.1983) (awarded custody to the father who was the primary "nurturing parent"). See footnote 38

Other courts have implicitly considered the role of primary caretaker and have awarded custody to the nurturing parent, or the parent who was responsible for the child. See In re Marriage of Leopando, 106 Ill.App.3d 444, 62 Ill.Dec. 340, 435 N.E.2d 1312, aff'd 96 Ill.2d 114, 70 Ill.Dec. 263, 449 N.E.2d 137 (1983); Anderson v. Anderson, 121 Ariz. 405, 590 P.2d 944 (App.1979); Nale v. Nale, 409 So.2d 1299 (La.App.1982) (superceded by a presumption in favor of joint custody according to Lake v. Robertson, 452 So.2d 376 (La.App.1984)). See footnote 39

Many jurisdictions have turned to joint custody to solve divorce- related custody problems. See footnote 40 Under joint custody, divorced parents have equal time with the children and equal say in decisions about their schooling, religious training and lifestyle. See footnote 41 Joint custody, however, does not solve the problem of extortion in the settlement process because many mothers find shared custody as unacceptable as complete loss of custody. See footnote 42

Joint custody works well when both parents live in the same neighborhood or at least in the same city, and so long as they can cooperate on child-rearing matters. Divorcing couples on their own often agreed to joint custody in the past, long before court-ordered joint custody became a public issue. When joint custody is by agreement, the same cooperative spirit that animated the underlying agreement will usually allow the parents to rear a child with no more antagonism than is experienced in most married households.

Voluntary joint custody, however, must be distinguished from court-ordered joint custody. A court can order that custody be shared, but it cannot order that the parents stop bickering, stop disparaging one another, or accommodate one another in child-care decisions as married persons would. And if parents do not live close to one another, joint custody can place an intolerable strain on a child's social and academic life if one parent is not willing to allow the other to supply a more-or-less permanent home. See footnote 43

Furthermore, parents must constantly give permission for one thing or another. Who decides whether the child can have a driver's license at age sixteen? Who decides when the child can date, under what conditions, and with whom? When the parents violently disagree--and particularly when they disagree because there are continuing fights left over from the marriage--the child is likely to be left hopelessly confused as the parents are played off one against the other. We do not authorize court-ordered joint custody today over the objection of a primary caretaker parent, although parents may agree to such an arrangement. As we said in Syllabus point 4 of Lowe v. Lowe, 179 W.Va. 536, 370 S.E.2d 731 (1988):

> A cardinal criterion for an award of jo int custody is the agreement of the parties and their mutual ability to co-operate in reaching shared decisions in matters affecting the child's welfare.

In the present case, the record established that Mrs. M. was the primary caretaker parent of the child. Mrs. M. (1) bathed, groomed and dressed the child, (2) purchased, cleaned and cared for his clothes, (3) organized and purchased his food, (4) secured medical attention, when needed, (5) missed work to nurse the child, and (6) put the child to bed, attended to him in the middle of the night and awakened him in the morning. We note that the father assisted in some of the cooking, and both parents were responsible for disciplining, educating and teaching general manners and elementary skills.

In Syllabus Point 4, J.B. v. A.B., 161 W.Va. 332, 242 S.E.2d 248 (1978), as modified by Garska, supra, 167 W.Va. at 70, 278 S.E.2d at 363, we discussed the relationship between a parent's adultery and parental fitness.

> Acts of sexual m isconduct by a [prim ary caretaker], albeit wrongs against an innocent spouse, m ay not be considered as evidence going to the fitness of the [caretaker] for child custody unless [his or] her conduct is so aggravated, given contem porary m oral standards, that reasonable m en would find that [his or] her immora lity, per se, warranted a finding of unfitness because of the deleterious e ffect upon the child of being raised by a [primary caretaker] with such a defective character.

Although the record contains evidence of three acts marital misconduct, two of which were adultery, there is no evidence that Mrs. M.'s marital misconduct was known to the child or damaged the child. We have repeatedly held that a "circuit court may not base a finding of parental unfitness solely on the ground that the parent is guilty of sexual misconduct." Bickler, supra note 2, 176 W.Va. at 409, 344 S.E.2d at 632. Mrs. M. testified that two of the instances occurred about midnight when the child was asleep and the third occurred after the child and his stepbrother left to visit a neighbor and was concluded before the children returned home. Although evidence of marital misconduct, this restrained normal sexual behavior does not make Mrs. M. an unfit parent.

The circuit court was clearly wrong in its position that the three instances of sexual misconduct, occurring over two years, warranted a finding of unfitness, without evidence establishing that the child was harmed or that the conduct per se was so outrageous, given contemporary moral standards, as to call into question her fitness as a parent. J.B. v. A.B., supra note 5, 161 W.Va. at 345, 242 S.E.2d at 256. The absence of such evidence requires reversal.

Accordingly, for the reasons set forth above, the judgment of the Circuit Court of Wood County with respect to the granting of a divorce is affirmed, but with respect to the award of custody is reversed and this case is remanded with directions to enter an order consistent with this opinion.

Affirmed in part; Reversed in part; and Remanded with directions.

Supreme Court of the United States

Adrian Martell DAVIS, Petitioner,

v.

WASHINGTON.

Hershel Hammon, Petitioner,

v.

Indiana.

Nos. 05-5224, 05-5705.

Argued March 20, 2006.

Decided June 19, 2006.

Holdings: After granting certiorari, the United States Supreme Court, Justice Scalia, held that:

victim's statements in response to 911 operator's interrogation were not testimonial, and therefore, were not subject to Confrontation Clause, and domestic battery victim's written statements in affidavit given to police officer were testimonial, and therefore, were subject to Confrontation Clause.

Affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded.

Justice Thomas filed separate opinion concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part.

In No. 05-5224, a 911 operator ascertained from Michelle McCottry that she had been assaulted by her former boyfriend, petitioner Davis, who had just fled the scene. McCottry did not testify at Davis's trial for felony violation of a domestic no-contact order, but the court admitted the 911 recording despite Davis's objection, which he based on the Sixth Amendment's Confrontation Clause. He was convicted. The Washington Court of Appeals affirmed, as did the State Supreme Court, which concluded that, inter alia, the portion of the 911 conversation in which McCottry identified Davis as her assailant was not testimonial.

In No. 05-5705, when police responded to a reported domestic disturbance at the home of Amy and Hershel Hammon, Amy told them that nothing was wrong, but gave them permission to enter. Once inside, one officer kept petitioner Hershel in the kitchen while the other interviewed Amy elsewhere and had her complete and sign a battery affidavit. Amy did not appear at Hershel's bench trial for, inter alia, domestic battery, but her affidavit and testimony from the officer who questioned her were admitted over Hershel's objection that he had no opportunity to cross-examine her. Hershel was convicted, and the Indiana Court of Appeals affirmed in relevant part. The State Supreme Court also affirmed, concluding that, although Amy's affidavit was testimonial and wrongly admitted, it was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt.

Held:

1. The Confrontation Clause bars "admission of testimonial statements of a witness who did not appear at trial unless he was unavailable to testify, and the defendant had a prior opportunity for cross-examination." Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36, 53-54, 124 S.Ct. 1354, 158 L.Ed.2d 177. These cases require the Court to determine which police "interrogations" produce statements that fall within this prohibition. Without attempting to produce an exhaustive classification of all conceivable statements as either testimonial or nontestimonial, it suffices to decide the present cases to hold that statements are nontestimonial when made in the course of police interrogation under circumstances objectively indicating that the primary purpose of interrogation is to enable police assistance to meet an ongoing emergency. They are testimonial when the circumstances objectively indicate that there is no such ongoing emergency, and that the primary purpose of the interrogation is to establish or prove past events potentially relevant to later criminal prosecution. Pp. 2273 - 2274.

2. McCottry's statements identifying Davis as her assailant were not testimonial. Pp. 2274 - 2278.

(a) This case requires the Court to decide whether the Confrontation Clause applies only to testimonial hearsay, and, if so, whether the 911 recording qualifies. Crawford suggested the answer to the first question, noting that "the Confrontation Clause ... applies to 'witnesses' against the accused-in other words, those who 'bear testimony.' " Only "testimonial statements" cause a declarant to be a witness. The Court is unaware of any early American case invoking the Confrontation Clause or the common-law right to confrontation that did not involve testimony as thus defined. Well into the 20th century, this Court's jurisprudence was carefully applied only in the testimonial context, and its later cases never in practice dispensed with the Confrontation Clause requirements of unavailability and prior cross-examination in cases involving testimonial hearsay. Pp. 2274 - 2276.

(b) The question in Davis, therefore, is whether, objectively considered, the interrogation during the 911 call produced testimonial statements. In contrast to Crawford, where the interrogation took place at a police station and was directed solely at establishing a past crime, a 911 call is ordinarily designed primarily to describe current circumstances requiring police assistance. The difference is apparent here. McCottry was speaking of events as they were actually happening, while Crawford's interrogation took place hours after the events occurred. Moreover, McCottry was facing an ongoing emergency. Further, the statements elicited were necessary to enable the police to resolve the present emergency rather than simply to learn what had happened in the past. Finally, the difference in the level of formality is striking. Crawford calmly answered questions at a station house, with an officer-interrogator taping and taking notes, while McCottry's frantic answers were provided over the phone, in an environment that was not tranquil, or even safe. Thus, the circumstances of her interrogation objectively indicate that its primary purpose was to enable police assistance to meet an ongoing emergency. She was not acting as a witness or testifying. Pp. 2276 - 2278.

3. Amy Hammon's statements were testimonial. They were not much different from those in Crawford. It is clear from the circumstances that Amy's interrogation was part of an investigation into possibly criminal past conduct. There was no emergency in progress, she told the police when they arrived that things were fine, and the officer questioning her was seeking to determine not what was happening but what had happened. Objectively viewed, the primary, if not sole, purpose of the investigation was to investigate a possible crime. While the formal features of Crawford's interrogation strengthened her statements' testimonial aspect, such features were not essential to the point. In both cases, the declarants were separated from the defendants, the statements recounted how potentially criminal past events began and progressed, and the interrogation took place some time after the events were over. For the same reasons the comparison to Crawford is compelling, the comparison to Davis is unpersuasive. The statements in Davis were taken when McCottry was alone, unprotected by police, and apparently in immediate danger from Davis. She was seeking aid, not telling a story about the past. Pp. 2278 - 2279.

4. The Indiana courts may determine on remand whether a claim of forfeiture by wrongdoing-under which one who obtains a witness's absence by wrongdoing forfeits the constitutional right to confrontation-is properly raised in Hammon, and, if so, whether it is meritorious. Absent such a finding, the Sixth Amendment operates to exclude Amy Hammon's affidavit. Pp. 2279 - 2280.

No. 05-5224, 154 Wash.2d 291, 111 P.3d 844, affirmed; No. 05-5705, 829 N.E.2d 444, reversed and remanded.

Justice SCALIA delivered the opinion of the Court.
These cases require us to determine when statements made to law enforcement personnel during a 911 call or at a crime scene are “testimonial” and thus subject to the requirements of the Sixth Amendment's Confrontation Clause.

A

The relevant statements in Davis v. Washington, No. 05-5224, were made to a 911 emergency operator on February 1, 2001. When the operator answered the initial call, the connection terminated before anyone spoke. She reversed the call, and Michelle McCottry answered. In the ensuing conversation, the operator ascertained that McCottry was involved in a domestic disturbance with her former boyfriend Adrian Davis, the petitioner in this case:
"911 Operator: Hello.
"Complainant: Hello.
"911 Operator: What's going on?
"Complainant: He's here jumpin' on me again.
"911 Operator: Okay. Listen to me carefully. Are you in a house or an apartment?
"Complainant: I'm in a house.
"911 Operator: Are there any weapons?
"Complainant: No. He's usin' his fists.
"911 Operator: Okay. Has he been drinking?
"Complainant: No.
"911 Operator: Okay, sweetie. I've got help started. Stay on the line with me, okay?
"Complainant: I'm on the line.
"911 Operator: Listen to me carefully. Do you know his last name?
"Complainant: It's Davis.
"911 Operator: Davis? Okay, what's his first name?
"Complainant: Adrian
"911 Operator: What is it?
"Complainant: Adrian.
"911 Operator: Adrian?
"Complainant: Yeah.
"911 Operator: Okay. What's his middle initial?
"Complainant: Martell. He's runnin' now." App. in No. 05-5224, pp. 8-9.

As the conversation continued, the operator learned that Davis had "just r [un] out the door" after hitting McCottry, and that he was leaving in a car with someone else. Id., at 9-10. McCottry started talking, but the operator cut her off, saying, "Stop talking and answer my questions." Id., at 10. She then gathered more information about Davis (including his birthday), and learned that Davis had told McCottry that his purpose in coming to the house was "to get his stuff," since McCottry was moving. Id., at 11-12. McCottry described the context of the assault, id., at 12, after which the operator told her that the police were on their way. "They're gonna check the area for him first," the operator said, "and then they're gonna come talk to you." Id., at 12-13.

The police arrived within four minutes of the 911 call and observed McCottry's shaken state, the "fresh injuries on her forearm and her face," and her "frantic efforts to gather her belongings and her children so that they could leave the residence." 154 Wash.2d 291, 296, 111 P.3d 844, 847 (2005) (en banc).

The State charged Davis with felony violation of a domestic no-contact order. "The State's only witnesses were the two police officers who responded to the 911 call. Both officers testified that McCottry exhibited injuries that appeared to be recent, but neither officer could testify as to the cause of the injuries." Ibid. McCottry presumably could have testified as to whether Davis was her assailant, but she did not appear. Over Davis's objection, based on the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment, the trial court admitted the recording of her exchange with the 911 operator, and the jury convicted him. The Washington Court of Appeals affirmed, 116 Wash.App. 81, 64 P.3d 661 (2003). The Supreme Court of Washington, with one dissenting justice, also affirmed, concluding that the portion of the 911 conversation in which McCottry identified Davis was not testimonial, and that if other portions of the conversation were testimonial, admitting them was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. 154 Wash.2d, at 305, 111 P.3d, at 851. We granted certiorari. 546 U.S. ----, 126 S.Ct. 552, 163 L.Ed.2d 459 (2005).

In Hammon v. Indiana, No. 05-5705, police responded late on the night of February 26, 2003, to a "reported domestic disturbance" at the home of Hershel and Amy Hammon. 829 N.E.2d 444, 446 (Ind.2005). They found Amy alone on the front porch, appearing " 'somewhat frightened,' " but she told them that " 'nothing was the matter,' " id., at 446, 447. She gave them permission to enter the house, where an officer saw "a gas heating unit in the corner of the living room" that had "flames coming out of the ... partial glass front. There were pieces of glass on the ground in front of it and there was flame emitting from the front of the heating unit." App. in No. 05-5705, p. 16.

Hershel, meanwhile, was in the kitchen. He told the police "that he and his wife had 'been in an argument' but 'everything was fine now' and the argument 'never became physical.' " 829 N.E.2d, at 447. By this point Amy had come back inside. One of the officers remained with Hershel; the other went to the living room to talk with Amy, and "again asked [her] what had occurred." Ibid.; App. in No. 05-5705, at 17, 32. Hershel made several attempts to participate in Amy's conversation with the police, see id., at 32, but was rebuffed. The officer later testified that Hershel "became angry when I insisted that [he] stay separated from Mrs. Hammon so that we can investigate what had happened." Id., at 34. After hearing Amy's account, the officer "had her fill out and sign a battery affidavit." Id., at 18. Amy handwrote the following: "Broke our Furnace & shoved me down on the floor into the broken glass. Hit me in the chest and threw me down. Broke our lamps & phone. Tore up my van where I couldn't leave the house. Attacked my daughter." Id., at 2.

The State charged Hershel with domestic battery and with violating his probation. Amy was subpoenaed, but she did not appear at his subsequent bench trial. The State called the officer who had questioned Amy, and asked him to recount what Amy told him and to authenticate the affidavit. Hershel's counsel repeatedly objected to the admission of this evidence. See id., at 11, 12, 13, 17, 19, 20, 21. At one point, after hearing the prosecutor defend the affidavit because it was made "under oath," defense counsel said, "That doesn't give us the opportunity to cross examine [the] person who allegedly drafted it. Makes me mad." Id., at 19. Nonetheless, the trial court admitted the affidavit as a "present sense impression," id., at 20, and Amy's statements as "excited utterances" that "are expressly permitted in these kinds of cases even if the declarant is not available to testify." Id., at 40. The officer thus testified that Amy "informed me that she and Hershel had been in an argument. That he became irrate [sic] over the fact of their daughter going to a boyfriend's house. The argument became ... physical after being verbal and she informed me that Mr. Hammon, during the verbal part of the argument was breaking things in the living room and I believe she stated he broke the phone, broke the lamp, broke the front of the heater. When it became physical he threw her down into the glass of the heater.
"She informed me Mr. Hammon had pushed her onto the ground, had shoved her head into the broken glass of the heater and that he had punched her in the chest twice I believe." Id., at 17-18.

The trial judge found Hershel guilty on both charges, id., at 40, and the Indiana Court of Appeals affirmed in relevant part, 809 N.E.2d 945 (2004). The Indiana Supreme Court also affirmed, concluding that Amy's statement was admissible for state-law purposes as an excited utterance, 829 N.E.2d, at 449; that "a 'testimonial' statement is one given or taken in significant part for purposes of preserving it for potential future use in legal proceedings," where "the motivations of the questioner and declarant are the central concerns," id., at 456, 457; and that Amy's oral statement was not "testimonial" under these standards, id., at 458. It also concluded that, although the affidavit was testimonial and thus wrongly admitted, it was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt, largely because the trial was to the bench. Id., at 458-459. We granted certiorari. 546 U.S. ----, 126 S.Ct. 552, 163 L.Ed.2d 459 (2005).

II

The Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment provides: "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right ... to be confronted with the witnesses against him." In Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36, 53-54, 124 S.Ct. 1354, 158 L.Ed.2d 177 (2004), we held that this provision bars "admission of testimonial statements of a witness who did not appear at trial unless he was unavailable to testify, and the defendant had had a prior opportunity for cross-examination." A critical portion of this holding, and the portion central to resolution of the two cases now before us, is the phrase "testimonial statements." Only statements of this sort cause the declarant to be a "witness" within the meaning of the Confrontation Clause. See id., at 51, 124 S.Ct. 1354. It is the testimonial character of the statement that separates it from other hearsay that, while subject to traditional limitations upon hearsay evidence, is not subject to the Confrontation Clause.

Our opinion in Crawford set forth "[v]arious formulations" of the core class of " 'testimonial' " statements, ibid., but found it unnecessary to endorse any of them, because "some statements qualify under any definition," id., at 52, 124 S.Ct. 1354. Among those, we said, were "[s]tatements taken by police officers in the course of interrogations," ibid.; see also id., at 53, 124 S.Ct. 1354. The questioning that generated the deponent's statement in Crawford-which was made and recorded while she was in police custody, after having been given Miranda warnings as a possible suspect herself-"qualifies under any conceivable definition" of an " 'interrogation,' " 541 U.S., at 53, n. 4, 124 S.Ct. 1354. We therefore did not define that term, except to say that "[w]e use [it] ... in its colloquial, rather than any technical legal, sense," and that "one can imagine various definitions ..., and we need not select among them in this case." Ibid. The character of the statements in the present cases is not as clear, and these cases require us to determine more precisely which police interrogations produce testimony.

Without attempting to produce an exhaustive classification of all conceivable statements-or even all conceivable statements in response to police interrogation-as either testimonial or nontestimonial, it suffices to decide the present cases to hold as follows: Statements are nontestimonial when made in the course of police interrogation under circumstances objectively indicating that the primary purpose of the interrogation is to enable police assistance to meet an ongoing emergency. They are testimonial when the circumstances objectively indicate that there is no such ongoing emergency, and that the primary purpose of the interrogation is to establish or prove past events potentially relevant to later criminal prosecution.[FN1]

In Crawford, it sufficed for resolution of the case before us to determine that "even if the Sixth Amendment is not solely concerned with testimonial hearsay, that is its primary object, and interrogations by law enforcement officers fall squarely within that class." Id., at 53, 124 S.Ct. 1354. Moreover, as we have just described, the facts of that case spared us the need to define what we meant by "interrogations." The Davis case today does not permit us this luxury of indecision. The inquiries of a police operator in the course of a 911 call [FN2] are an interrogation in one sense, but not in a sense that "qualifies under any conceivable definition." We must decide, therefore, whether the Confrontation Clause applies only to testimonial hearsay; and, if so, whether the recording of a 911 call qualifies.

The answer to the first question was suggested in Crawford, even if not explicitly held:
"The text of the Confrontation Clause reflects this focus [on testimonial hearsay]. It applies to 'witnesses' against the accused-in other words, those who 'bear testimony.' 1 N. Webster, An American Dictionary of the English Language (1828). 'Testimony,' in turn, is typically 'a solemn declaration or affirmation made for the purpose of establishing or proving some fact.' Ibid. An accuser who makes a formal statement to government officers bears testimony in a sense that a person who makes a casual remark to an acquaintance does not." 541 U.S., at 51, 124 S.Ct. 1354.

A limitation so clearly reflected in the text of the constitutional provision must fairly be said to mark out not merely its "core," but its perimeter.

We are not aware of any early American case invoking the Confrontation Clause or the common-law right to confrontation that did not clearly involve testimony as thus defined.[FN3] Well into the 20th century, our own Confrontation Clause jurisprudence was carefully applied only in the testimonial context. See, e.g., Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145, 158, 25 L.Ed. 244 (1879) (testimony at prior trial was subject to the Confrontation Clause, but petitioner had forfeited that right by procuring witness's absence); Mattox v. United States, 156 U.S. 237, 240-244, 15 S.Ct. 337, 39 L.Ed. 409 (1895) (prior trial testimony of deceased witnesses admitted because subject to cross-examination); Kirby v. United States, 174 U.S. 47, 55-56, 19 S.Ct. 574, 43 L.Ed. 890 (1899) (guilty pleas and jury conviction of others could not be admitted to show that property defendant received from them was stolen); Motes v. United States, 178 U.S. 458, 467, 470-471, 20 S.Ct. 993, 44 L.Ed. 1150 (1900) (written deposition subject to cross-examination was not admissible because witness was available); Dowdell v. United States, 221 U.S. 325, 330-331, 31 S.Ct. 590, 55 L.Ed. 753 (1911) (facts regarding conduct of prior trial certified to by the judge, the clerk of court, and the official reporter did not relate to defendants' guilt or innocence and hence were not statements of "witnesses" under the Confrontation Clause).

Even our later cases, conforming to the reasoning of Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56, 100 S.Ct. 2531, 65 L.Ed.2d 597 (1980),[FN4] never in practice dispensed with the Confrontation Clause requirements of unavailability and prior cross-examination in cases that involved testimonial hearsay, see Crawford, 541 U.S., at 57-59, 124 S.Ct. 1354 (citing cases), with one arguable exception, see id., at 58, n. 8, 124 S.Ct. 1354 (discussing White v. Illinois, 502 U.S. 346, 112 S.Ct. 736, 116 L.Ed.2d 848 (1992)). Where our cases did dispense with those requirements-even under the Roberts approach-the statements at issue were clearly nontestimonial. See, e.g., Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171, 181-184, 107 S.Ct. 2775, 97 L.Ed.2d 144 (1987) (statements made unwittingly to a Government informant); Dutton v. Evans, 400 U.S. 74, 87-89, 91 S.Ct. 210, 27 L.Ed.2d 213 (1970) (plurality opinion) (statements from one prisoner to another).

Most of the American cases applying the Confrontation Clause or its state constitutional or common-law counterparts involved testimonial statements of the most formal sort-sworn testimony in prior judicial proceedings or formal depositions under oath-which invites the argument that the scope of the Clause is limited to that very formal category.

But the English cases that were the progenitors of the Confrontation Clause did not limit the exclusionary rule to prior court testimony and formal depositions, see Crawford, supra, at 52, and n. 3, 124 S.Ct. 1354. In any event, we do not think it conceivable that the protections of the Confrontation Clause can readily be evaded by having a note-taking policeman recite the unsworn hearsay testimony of the declarant, instead of having the declarant sign a deposition. Indeed, if there is one point for which no case-English or early American, state or federal-can be cited, that is it.

The question before us in Davis, then, is whether, objectively considered, the interrogation that took place in the course of the 911 call produced testimonial statements. When we said in Crawford, supra, at 53, 124 S.Ct. 1354, that "interrogations by law enforcement officers fall squarely within [the] class" of testimonial hearsay, we had immediately in mind (for that was the case before us) interrogations solely directed at establishing the facts of a past crime, in order to identify (or provide evidence to convict) the perpetrator. The product of such interrogation, whether reduced to a writing signed by the declarant or embedded in the memory (and perhaps notes) of the interrogating officer, is testimonial. It is, in the terms of the 1828 American dictionary quoted in Crawford, " '[a] solemn declaration or affirmation made for the purpose of establishing or proving some fact.' " 541 U.S., at 51, 124 S.Ct. 1354. (The solemnity of even an oral declaration of relevant past fact to an investigating officer is well enough established by the severe consequences that can attend a deliberate falsehood. See, e.g., United States v. Stewart, 433 F.3d 273, 288 (C.A.2 2006) (false statements made to federal investigators violate 18 U.S.C. § 1001); State v. Reed, 2005 WI 53, ¶ 30, 280 Wis.2d 68, 695 N.W.2d 315, 323 (state criminal offense to "knowingly giv[e] false information to [an] officer with [the] intent to mislead the officer in the performance of his or her duty").) A 911 call, on the other hand, and at least the initial interrogation conducted in connection with a 911 call, is ordinarily not designed primarily to "establis[h] or prov [e]" some past fact, but to describe current circumstances requiring police assistance.

The difference between the interrogation in Davis and the one in Crawford is apparent on the face of things. In Davis, McCottry was speaking about events as they were actually happening, rather than "describ [ing] past events," Lilly v. Virginia, 527 U.S. 116, 137, 119 S.Ct. 1887, 144 L.Ed.2d 117 (1999) (plurality opinion). Sylvia Crawford's interrogation, on the other hand, took place hours after the events she described had occurred. Moreover, any reasonable listener would recognize that McCottry (unlike Sylvia Crawford) was facing an ongoing emergency. Although one might call 911 to provide a narrative report of a crime absent any imminent danger, McCottry's call was plainly a call for help against bona fide physical threat. Third, the nature of what was asked and answered in Davis, again viewed objectively, was such that the elicited statements were necessary to be able to resolve the present emergency, rather than simply to learn (as in Crawford) what had happened in the past. That is true even of the operator's effort to establish the identity of the assailant, so that the dispatched officers might know whether they would be encountering a violent felon. See, e.g., Hiibel v. Sixth Judicial Dist. Court of Nev., Humboldt Cty., 542 U.S. 177, 186, 124 S.Ct. 2451, 159 L.Ed.2d 292 (2004). And finally, the difference in the level of formality between the two interviews is striking. Crawford was responding calmly, at the station house, to a series of questions, with the officer-interrogator taping and making notes of her answers; McCottry's frantic answers were provided over the phone, in an environment that was not tranquil, or even (as far as any reasonable 911 operator could make out) safe.

We conclude from all this that the circumstances of McCottry's interrogation objectively indicate its primary purpose was to enable police assistance to meet an ongoing emergency. She simply was not acting as a witness; she was not testifying. What she said was not "a weaker substitute for live testimony" at trial, United States v. Inadi, 475 U.S. 387, 394, 106 S.Ct. 1121, 89 L.Ed.2d 390 (1986), like Lord Cobham's statements in Raleigh's Case, 2 How. St. Tr. 1 (1603), or Jane Dingler's ex parte statements against her husband in King v. Dingler, 2 Leach 561, 168 Eng. Rep. 383 (1791), or Sylvia Crawford's statement in Crawford. In each of those cases, the ex parte actors and the evidentiary products of the ex parte communication aligned perfectly with their courtroom analogues. McCottry's emergency statement does not. No "witness" goes into court to proclaim an emergency and seek help.

Davis seeks to cast McCottry in the unlikely role of a witness by pointing to English cases. None of them involves statements made during an ongoing emergency. In King v. Brasier, 1 Leach 199, 168 Eng. Rep. 202 (1779), for example, a young rape victim, "immediately on her coming home, told all the circumstances of the injury" to her mother. Id., at 200, 168 Eng. Rep., at 202. The case would be helpful to Davis if the relevant statement had been the girl's screams for aid as she was being chased by her assailant. But by the time the victim got home, her story was an account of past events.

This is not to say that a conversation which begins as an interrogation to determine the need for emergency assistance cannot, as the Indiana Supreme Court put it, "evolve into testimonial statements," 829 N.E.2d, at 457, once that purpose has been achieved. In this case, for example, after the operator gained the information needed to address the exigency of the moment, the emergency appears to have ended (when Davis drove away from the premises). The operator then told McCottry to be quiet, and proceeded to pose a battery of questions. It could readily be maintained that, from that point on, McCottry's statements were testimonial, not unlike the "structured police questioning" that occurred in Crawford, 541 U.S., at 53, n. 4, 124 S.Ct. 1354. This presents no great problem. Just as, for Fifth Amendment purposes, "police officers can and will distinguish almost instinctively between questions necessary to secure their own safety or the safety of the public and questions designed solely to elicit testimonial evidence from a suspect," New York v. Quarles, 467 U.S. 649, 658-659, 104 S.Ct. 2626, 81 L.Ed.2d 550 (1984), trial courts will recognize the point at which, for Sixth Amendment purposes, statements in response to interrogations become testimonial. Through in limine procedure, they should redact or exclude the portions of any statement that have become testimonial, as they do, for example, with unduly prejudicial portions of otherwise admissible evidence. Davis's jury did not hear the complete 911 call, although it may well have heard some testimonial portions. We were asked to classify only McCottry's early statements identifying Davis as her assailant, and we agree with the Washington Supreme Court that they were not testimonial. That court also concluded that, even if later parts of the call were testimonial, their admission was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. Davis does not challenge that holding, and we therefore assume it to be correct.

Determining the testimonial or nontestimonial character of the statements that were the product of the interrogation in Hammon is a much easier task, since they were not much different from the statements we found to be testimonial in Crawford. It is entirely clear from the circumstances that the interrogation was part of an investigation into possibly criminal past conduct-as, indeed, the testifying officer expressly acknowledged, App. in No. 05-5705, at 25, 32, 34. There was no emergency in progress; the interrogating officer testified that he had heard no arguments or crashing and saw no one throw or break anything, id., at 25. When the officers first arrived, Amy told them that things were fine, id., at 14, and there was no immediate threat to her person. When the officer questioned Amy for the second time, and elicited the challenged statements, he was not seeking to determine (as in Davis) "what is happening," but rather "what happened." Objectively viewed, the primary, if not indeed the sole, purpose of the interrogation was to investigate a possible crime-which is, of course, precisely what the officer should have done.

It is true that the Crawford interrogation was more formal. It followed a Miranda warning, was tape-recorded, and took place at the station house, see 541 U.S., at 53, n. 4, 124 S.Ct. 1354. While these features certainly strengthened the statements' testimonial aspect-made it more objectively apparent, that is, that the purpose of the exercise was to nail down the truth about past criminal events-none was essential to the point. It was formal enough that Amy's interrogation was conducted in a separate room, away from her husband (who tried to intervene), with the officer receiving her replies for use in his "investigat[ion]." App. in No. 05-5705, at 34. What we called the "striking resemblance" of the Crawford statement to civil-law ex parte examinations, 541 U.S., at 52, 124 S.Ct. 1354, is shared by Amy's statement here. Both declarants were actively separated from the defendant-officers forcibly prevented Hershel from participating in the interrogation. Both statements deliberately recounted, in response to police questioning, how potentially criminal past events began and progressed. And both took place some time after the events described were over. Such statements under official interrogation are an obvious substitute for live testimony, because they do precisely what a witness does on direct examination; they are inherently testimonial.[FN5]

Both Indiana and the United States as amicus curiae argue that this case should be resolved much like Davis. For the reasons we find the comparison to Crawford compelling, we find the comparison to Davis unpersuasive. The statements in Davis were taken when McCottry was alone, not only unprotected by police (as Amy Hammon was protected), but apparently in immediate danger from Davis. She was seeking aid, not telling a story about the past. McCottry's present-tense statements showed immediacy; Amy's narrative of past events was delivered at some remove in time from the danger she described. And after Amy answered the officer's questions, he had her execute an affidavit, in order, he testified, "[t]o establish events that have occurred previously." App. in No. 05-5705, at 18.

Although we necessarily reject the Indiana Supreme Court's implication that virtually any "initial inquiries" at the crime scene will not be testimonial, see 829 N.E.2d, at 453, 457, we do not hold the opposite-that no questions at the scene will yield nontestimonial answers. We have already observed of domestic disputes that "[o]fficers called to investigate ... need to know whom they are dealing with in order to assess the situation, the threat to their own safety, and possible danger to the potential victim." Hiibel, 542 U.S., at 186, 124 S.Ct. 2451. Such exigencies may often mean that "initial inquiries" produce nontestimonial statements. But in cases like this one, where Amy's statements were neither a cry for help nor the provision of information enabling officers immediately to end a threatening situation, the fact that they were given at an alleged crime scene and were "initial inquiries" is immaterial. Cf. Crawford, supra, at 52, n. 3, 124 S.Ct. 1354.[FN6]

IV

Respondents in both cases, joined by a number of their amici, contend that the nature of the offenses charged in these two cases-domestic violence-requires greater flexibility in the use of testimonial evidence. This particular type of crime is notoriously susceptible to intimidation or coercion of the victim to ensure that she does not testify at trial. When this occurs, the Confrontation Clause gives the criminal a windfall. We may not, however, vitiate constitutional guarantees when they have the effect of allowing the guilty to go free. Cf. Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27, 121 S.Ct. 2038, 150 L.Ed.2d 94 (2001) (suppressing evidence from an illegal search). But when defendants seek to undermine the judicial process by procuring or coercing silence from witnesses and victims, the Sixth Amendment does not require courts to acquiesce. While defendants have no duty to assist the State in proving their guilt, they do have the duty to refrain from acting in ways that destroy the integrity of the criminal-trial system. We reiterate what we said in Crawford: that "the rule of forfeiture by wrongdoing ... extinguishes confrontation claims on essentially equitable grounds." 541 U.S., at 62, 124 S.Ct. 1354 (citing Reynolds, 98 U.S., at 158-159). That is, one who obtains the absence of a witness by wrongdoing forfeits the constitutional right to confrontation.

We take no position on the standards necessary to demonstrate such forfeiture, but federal courts using Federal Rule of Evidence 804(b)(6), which codifies the forfeiture doctrine, have generally held the Government to the preponderance-of-the-evidence standard, see, e.g., United States v. Scott, 284 F.3d 758, 762 (C.A.7 2002). State courts tend to follow the same practice, see, e.g., Commonwealth v. Edwards, 444 Mass. 526, 542, 830 N.E.2d 158, 172 (2005). Moreover, if a hearing on forfeiture is required, Edwards, for instance, observed that "hearsay evidence, including the unavailable witness's out-of-court statements, may be considered." Id., at 545, 830 N.E.2d, at 174. The Roberts approach to the Confrontation Clause undoubtedly made recourse to this doctrine less necessary, because prosecutors could show the "reliability" of ex parte statements more easily than they could show the defendant's procurement of the witness's absence. Crawford, in overruling Roberts, did not destroy the ability of courts to protect the integrity of their proceedings.

We have determined that, absent a finding of forfeiture by wrongdoing, the Sixth Amendment operates to exclude Amy Hammon's affidavit. The Indiana courts may (if they are asked) determine on remand whether such a claim of forfeiture is properly raised and, if so, whether it is meritorious.

* * *

We affirm the judgment of the Supreme Court of Washington in No. 05-5224. We reverse the judgment of the Supreme Court of Indiana in No. 05-5705, and remand the case to that Court for proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

FN1. Our holding refers to interrogations because, as explained below, the statements in the cases presently before us are the products of interrogations-which in some circumstances tend to generate testimonial responses. This is not to imply, however, that statements made in the absence of any interrogation are necessarily nontestimonial. The Framers were no more willing to exempt from cross-examination volunteered testimony or answers to open-ended questions than they were to exempt answers to detailed interrogation. (Part of the evidence against Sir Walter Raleigh was a letter from Lord Cobham that was plainly not the result of sustained questioning. Raleigh's Case, 2 How. St. Tr. 1, 27 (1603).) And of course even when interrogation exists, it is in the final analysis the declarant's statements, not the interrogator's questions, that the Confrontation Clause requires us to evaluate.

FN2. If 911 operators are not themselves law enforcement officers, they may at least be agents of law enforcement when they conduct interrogations of 911 callers. For purposes of this opinion (and without deciding the point), we consider their acts to be acts of the police. As in Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36, 124 S.Ct. 1354, 158 L.Ed.2d 177 (2004), therefore, our holding today makes it unnecessary to consider whether and when statements made to someone other than law enforcement personnel are "testimonial."

FN3. See, e.g., State v. Webb, 2 N.C. 103, 103-104, 1794 WL 98 (Super. L. & Eq. 1794) (per curiam) (excluding deposition taken in absence of the accused); State v. Atkins, 1 Tenn. 229, 1807 WL 107 (Super. L. & Eq. 1807) (per curiam) (excluding prior testimony of deceased witness); Johnston v. State, 10 Tenn. 58, 59, 1821 WL 401 (Err. & App. 1821) (admitting written deposition of deceased deponent, because defendant had the opportunity to cross-examine); Finn v. Commonwealth, 26 Va. 701, 707-708, 1827 WL 1081 (1827) (excluding prior testimony of a witness still alive, though outside the jurisdiction); *State v. FN4. "Roberts condition[ed] the admissibility of all hearsay evidence on whether it falls under a 'firmly rooted hearsay exception' or bears 'particularized guarantees of trustworthiness.' " Crawford, 541 U.S., at 60, 124 S.Ct. 1354 (quoting Roberts, 448 U.S., at 66, 100 S.Ct. 2531). We overruled Roberts in Crawford by restoring the unavailability and cross-examination requirements.

FN5. The dissent criticizes our test for being "neither workable nor a targeted attempt to reach the abuses forbidden by the [Confrontation] Clause," post, at 2285 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). As to the former: We have acknowledged that our holding is not an "exhaustive classification of all conceivable statements-or even all conceivable statements in response to police interrogation," supra, at 2273, but rather a resolution of the cases before us and those like them. For those cases, the test is objective and quite "workable." The dissent, in attempting to formulate an exhaustive classification of its own, has not provided anything that deserves the description "workable"-unless one thinks that the distinction between "formal" and "informal" statements, see post, at 2282 - 2283, qualifies. And the dissent even qualifies that vague distinction by acknowledging that the Confrontation Clause "also reaches the use of technically informal statements when used to evade the formalized process," post, at 2283, and cautioning that the Clause would stop the State from "us [ing] out-of-court statements as a means of circumventing the literal right of confrontation," post, at 2283. It is hard to see this as much more "predictable," ibid., than the rule we adopt for the narrow situations we address. (Indeed, under the dissent's approach it is eminently arguable that the dissent should agree, rather than disagree, with our disposition in Hammon v. Indiana, No. 05-5705.)

As for the charge that our holding is not a "targeted attempt to reach the abuses forbidden by the [Confrontation] Clause," which the dissent describes as the depositions taken by Marian magistrates, characterized by a high degree of formality, see post, at 2281 - 2282: We do not dispute that formality is indeed essential to testimonial utterance. But we no longer have examining Marian magistrates; and we do have, as our 18th-century forebears did not, examining police officers, see L. Friedman, Crime and Punishment in American History 67-68 (1993)-who perform investigative and testimonial functions once performed by examining Marian magistrates, see J. Langbein, The Origins of Adversary Criminal Trial 41 (2003). It imports sufficient formality, in our view, that lies to such officers are criminal offenses. Restricting the Confrontation Clause to the precise forms against which it was originally directed is a recipe for its extinction. Cf. Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27, 121 S.Ct. 2038, 150 L.Ed.2d 94 (2001).

FN6. Police investigations themselves are, of course, in no way impugned by our characterization of their fruits as testimonial. Investigations of past crimes prevent future harms and lead to necessary arrests. While prosecutors may hope that inculpatory "nontestimonial" evidence is gathered, this is essentially beyond police control. Their saying that an emergency exists cannot make it be so. The Confrontation Clause in no way governs police conduct, because it is the trial use of, not the investigatory collection of, ex parte testimonial statements which offends that provision. But neither can police conduct govern the Confrontation Clause; testimonial statements are what they are.

Justice THOMAS, concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part.

In Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36, 124 S.Ct. 1354, 158 L.Ed.2d 177 (2004), we abandoned the general reliability inquiry we had long employed to judge the admissibility of hearsay evidence under the Confrontation Clause, describing that inquiry as "inherently, and therefore permanently, unpredictable." Id., at 68, n. 10, 124 S.Ct. 1354 (emphasis in original). Today, a mere two years after the Court decided Crawford, it adopts an equally unpredictable test, under which district courts are charged with divining the "primary purpose" of police interrogations. Ante, at 2273. Besides being difficult for courts to apply, this test characterizes as "testimonial," and therefore inadmissible, evidence that bears little resemblance to what we have recognized as the evidence targeted by the Confrontation Clause. Because neither of the cases before the Court today would implicate the Confrontation Clause under an appropriately targeted standard, I concur only in the judgment in Davis v. Washington, No. 05-5224, and dissent from the Court's resolution of Hammon v. Indiana, No. 05-5705.

The Confrontation Clause provides that "[i]n all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right ... to be confronted with the witnesses against him ...." U.S. Const., Amdt. 6. We have recognized that the operative phrase in the Clause, "witnesses against him," could be interpreted narrowly, to reach only those witnesses who actually testify at trial, or more broadly, to reach many or all of those whose out-of-court statements are offered at trial. Crawford, supra, at 42-43, 124 S.Ct. 1354; White v. Illinois, 502 U.S. 346, 359-363, 112 S.Ct. 736, 116 L.Ed.2d 848 (1992) (THOMAS, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment). Because the narrowest interpretation of the Clause would conflict with both the history giving rise to the adoption of the Clause and this Court's precedent, we have rejected such a reading. See Crawford, supra, at 50-51, 124 S.Ct. 1354; White, supra, at 360, 112 S.Ct. 736 (opinion of THOMAS, J.).

Rejection of the narrowest view of the Clause does not, however, require the broadest application of the Clause to exclude otherwise admissible hearsay evidence. The history surrounding the right to confrontation supports the conclusion that it was developed to target particular practices that occurred under the English bail and committal statutes passed during the reign of Queen Mary, namely, the "civil-law mode of criminal procedure, and particularly its use of ex parte examinations as evidence against the accused." Crawford, supra, at 43, 50, 124 S.Ct. 1354; White, supra, at 361-362, 112 S.Ct. 736 (opinion of THOMAS, J.); Mattox v. United States, 156 U.S. 237, 242, 15 S.Ct. 337, 39 L.Ed. 409 (1895). "The predominant purpose of the [Marian committal] statute was to institute systematic questioning of the accused and the witnesses." J. Langbein, Prosecuting Crime in the Renaissance 23 (1974) (emphasis added). The statute required an oral examination of the suspect and the accusers, transcription within two days of the examinations, and physical transmission to the judges hearing the case. Id., at 10, 23, 15 S.Ct. 337. These examinations came to be used as evidence in some cases, in lieu of a personal appearance by the witness. Crawford, supra, at 43-44, 124 S.Ct. 1354; 9 W. Holdsworth, A History of English Law 223-229 (1926). Many statements that would be inadmissible as a matter of hearsay law bear little resemblance to these evidentiary practices, which the Framers proposed the Confrontation Clause to prevent. See, e.g., Crawford, supra, at 51, 124 S.Ct. 1354 (contrasting "[a]n off-hand, overheard remark" with the abuses targeted by the Confrontation Clause). Accordingly, it is unlikely that the Framers intended the word "witness" to be read so broadly as to include such statements. Cf. Dutton v. Evans, 400 U.S. 74, 94, 91 S.Ct. 210, 27 L.Ed.2d 213 (1970) (Harlan, J., concurring in result) (rejecting the "assumption that the core purpose of the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment is to prevent overly broad exceptions to the hearsay rule").

In Crawford we recognized that this history could be squared with the language of the Clause, giving rise to a workable, and more accurate, interpretation of the Clause. " '[W]itnesses,' " we said, are those who " 'bear testimony.' " 541 U.S., at 51, 124 S.Ct. 1354 (quoting 1 N. Webster, An American Dictionary of the English Language (1828)). And " '[t]estimony' " is " '[a] solemn declaration or affirmation made for the purpose of establishing or proving some fact.' " Ibid. (quoting Webster, supra). Admittedly, we did not set forth a detailed framework for addressing whether a statement is "testimonial" and thus subject to the Confrontation Clause. But the plain terms of the "testimony" definition we endorsed necessarily require some degree of solemnity before a statement can be deemed "testimonial."

This requirement of solemnity supports my view that the statements regulated by the Confrontation Clause must include "extrajudicial statements ... contained in formalized testimonial materials, such as affidavits, depositions, prior testimony, or confessions." White, supra, at 365, 112 S.Ct. 736 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). Affidavits, depositions, and prior testimony are, by their very nature, taken through a formalized process. Likewise, confessions, when extracted by police in a formal manner, carry sufficient indicia of solemnity to constitute formalized statements and, accordingly, bear a "striking resemblance," Crawford, supra, at 52, 124 S.Ct. 1354, to the examinations of the accused and accusers under the Marian statutes.[FN1] See generally Langbein, supra, at 21-34.

Although the Court concedes that the early American cases invoking the right to confrontation or the Confrontation Clause itself all "clearly involve[d] testimony" as defined in Crawford, ante, at 2274, it fails to acknowledge that all of the cases it cites fall within the narrower category of formalized testimonial materials I have proposed. See ante, at 2274, n. 3.[FN2] Interactions between the police and an accused (or witnesses) resemble Marian proceedings-and these early cases-only when the interactions are somehow rendered "formal." In Crawford, for example, the interrogation was custodial, taken after warnings given pursuant to Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 86 S.Ct. 1602, 16 L.Ed.2d 694 (1966). 541 U.S., at 38, 124 S.Ct. 1354. Miranda warnings, by their terms, inform a prospective defendant that " 'anything he says can be used against him in a court of law.' " Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428, 435, 120 S.Ct. 2326, 147 L.Ed.2d 405 (2000) (quoting Miranda, supra, at 479, 86 S.Ct. 1602). This imports a solemnity to the process that is not present in a mere conversation between a witness or suspect and a police officer.[FN3]

The Court all but concedes that no case can be cited for its conclusion that the Confrontation Clause also applies to informal police questioning under certain circumstances. Ante, at 2274 - 2276. Instead, the sole basis for the Court's conclusion is its apprehension that the Confrontation Clause will "readily be evaded" if it is only applicable to formalized testimonial materials. Ante, at 2276. But the Court's proposed solution to the risk of evasion is needlessly overinclusive. Because the Confrontation Clause sought to regulate prosecutorial abuse occurring through use of ex parte statements as evidence against the accused, it also reaches the use of technically informal statements when used to evade the formalized process. Cf. ibid. That is, even if the interrogation itself is not formal, the production of evidence by the prosecution at trial would resemble the abuses targeted by the Confrontation Clause if the prosecution attempted to use out-of-court statements as a means of circumventing the literal right of confrontation, see Coy v. Iowa, 487 U.S. 1012, 108 S.Ct. 2798, 101 L.Ed.2d 857 (1988). In such a case, the Confrontation Clause could fairly be applied to exclude the hearsay statements offered by the prosecution, preventing evasion without simultaneously excluding evidence offered by the prosecution in good faith.

The Court's standard is not only disconnected from history and unnecessary to prevent abuse; it also yields no predictable results to police officers and prosecutors attempting to comply with the law. Cf. Crawford, supra, at 68, n. 10, 124 S.Ct. 1354 (criticizing unpredictability of the pre-Crawford test); White, 502 U.S., at 364-365, 112 S.Ct. 736 (THOMAS, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment) (limiting the Confrontation Clause to the discrete category of materials historically abused would "greatly simplify" application of the Clause). In many, if not most, cases where police respond to a report of a crime, whether pursuant to a 911 call from the victim or otherwise, the purposes of an interrogation, viewed from the perspective of the police, are both to respond to the emergency situation and to gather evidence. See New York v. Quarles, 467 U.S. 649, 656, 104 S.Ct. 2626, 81 L.Ed.2d 550 (1984) ("Undoubtedly most police officers [deciding whether to give Miranda warnings in a possible emergency situation] would act out of a host of different, instinctive, and largely unverifiable motives-their own safety, the safety of others, and perhaps as well the desire to obtain incriminating evidence from the suspect"). Assigning one of these two "largely unverifiable motives," ibid., primacy requires constructing a hierarchy of purpose that will rarely be present-and is not reliably discernible. It will inevitably be, quite simply, an exercise in fiction.

The Court's repeated invocation of the word "objectiv[e]" to describe its test, see ante, at 2273, 2276 - 2277, 2278, however, suggests that the Court may not mean to reference purpose at all, but instead to inquire into the function served by the interrogation. Certainly such a test would avoid the pitfalls that have led us repeatedly to reject tests dependent on the subjective intentions of police officers.[FN4] It would do so, however, at the cost of being even more disconnected from the prosecutorial abuses targeted by the Confrontation Clause. Additionally, it would shift the ability to control whether a violation occurred from the police and prosecutor to the judge, whose determination as to the "primary purpose" of a particular interrogation would be unpredictable and not necessarily tethered to the actual purpose for which the police performed the interrogation.

Neither the 911 call at issue in Davis nor the police questioning at issue in Hammon is testimonial under the appropriate framework. Neither the call nor the questioning is itself a formalized dialogue.[FN5] Nor do any circumstances surrounding the taking of the statements render those statements sufficiently formal to resemble the Marian examinations; the statements were neither Mirandized nor custodial, nor accompanied by any similar indicia of formality. Finally, there is no suggestion that the prosecution attempted to offer the women's hearsay evidence at trial in order to evade confrontation. See 829 N.E.2d 444, 447 (Ind.2005) (prosecution subpoenaed Amy Hammon to testify, but she was not present); 154 Wash.2d 291, 296, 111 P.3d 844, 847 (2005) (en banc) (State was unable to locate Michelle McCottry at the time of trial). Accordingly, the statements at issue in both cases are nontestimonial and admissible under the Confrontation Clause.

The Court's determination that the evidence against Hammon must be excluded extends the Confrontation Clause far beyond the abuses it was intended to prevent. When combined with the Court's holding that the evidence against Davis is perfectly admissible, however, the Court's Hammon holding also reveals the difficulty of applying the Court's requirement that courts investigate the "primary purpose[s]" of the investigation. The Court draws a line between the two cases based on its explanation that Hammon involves "no emergency in progress," but instead, mere questioning as "part of an investigation into possibly criminal past conduct," ante, at 2269 - 2270, and its explanation that Davis involves questioning for the "primary purpose" of "enabl[ing] police assistance to meet an ongoing emergency," ante, at 2277. But the fact that the officer in Hammon was investigating Mr. Hammon's past conduct does not foreclose the possibility that the primary purpose of his inquiry was to assess whether Mr. Hammon constituted a continuing danger to his wife, requiring further police presence or action. It is hardly remarkable that Hammon did not act abusively towards his wife in the presence of the officers, ante, at 2278, and his good judgment to refrain from criminal behavior in the presence of police sheds little, if any, light on whether his violence would have resumed had the police left without further questioning, transforming what the Court dismisses as "past conduct" back into an "ongoing emergency." Ante, at 2277, 2278.[FN6] Nor does the mere fact that McCottry needed emergency aid shed light on whether the "primary purpose" of gathering, for example, the name of her assailant was to protect the police, to protect the victim, or to gather information for prosecution. In both of the cases before the Court, like many similar cases, pronouncement of the "primary" motive behind the interrogation calls for nothing more than a guess by courts.

II

Because the standard adopted by the Court today is neither workable nor a targeted attempt to reach the abuses forbidden by the Clause, I concur only in the judgment in Davis v. Washington, No. 05-5224, and respectfully dissent from the Court's resolution of Hammon v. Indiana, No. 05-5705.

FN1. Like the Court, I presume the acts of the 911 operator to be the acts of the police. Ante, at 2274, n. 2. Accordingly, I refer to both the operator in Davis and the officer in Hammon, and their counterparts in similar cases, collectively as "the police."

FN2. Our more recent cases, too, nearly all hold excludable under the Confrontation Clause materials that are plainly highly formal. See White v. Illinois, 502 U.S. 346, 365, n. 2, 112 S.Ct. 736, 116 L.Ed.2d 848 (1992) (THOMAS, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment). The only exceptions involve confessions of codefendants to police, and those confessions appear to have either been formal due to their occurrence in custody or to have been formalized into signed documents. See Douglas v. Alabama, 380 U.S. 415, 416, 85 S.Ct. 1074, 13 L.Ed.2d 934 (1965) (signed confession); Brookhart v. Janis, 384 U.S. 1, 86 S.Ct. 1245, 16 L.Ed.2d 314 (1966) (signed confession taken after accomplice's arrest, see Brief for Petitioner in Brookhart v. Janis, O.T.1965, No. 657, pp. 10-11); Bruton v. United States, 391 U.S. 123, 124, 88 S.Ct. 1620, 20 L.Ed.2d 476 (1968) (custodial interrogation); Roberts v. Russell, 392 U.S. 293, 88 S.Ct. 1921, 20 L.Ed.2d 1100 (1968)

(per curiam) (custodial interrogation following a warning that the co-defendant's statement could be used against her at trial, see Brief in Opposition, O.T.1967, No. 920, pp. 5-6).

FN3. The possibility that an oral declaration of past fact to a police officer, if false, could result in legal consequences to the speaker, see ante, at 2275 - 2276, may render honesty in casual conversations with police officers important. It does not, however, render those conversations solemn or formal in the ordinary meanings of those terms.

FN4. See New York v. Quarles, 467 U.S. 649, 655-656, and n. 6, 104 S.Ct. 2626, 81 L.Ed.2d 550 (1984) (subjective motivation of officer not relevant in considering whether the public safety exception to Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 86 S.Ct. 1602, 16 L.Ed.2d 694 (1966), is applicable); Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. 291, 301, 100 S.Ct. 1682, 64 L.Ed.2d 297 (1980) (subjective intent of police officer to obtain incriminatory statement not relevant to whether an interrogation has occurred); Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806, 813, 116 S.Ct. 1769, 135 L.Ed.2d 89 (1996) (refusing to evaluate Fourth Amendment reasonableness in light of the officers' actual motivations).

FN5. Although the police questioning in Hammon was ultimately reduced to an affidavit, all agree that the affidavit is inadmissible per se under our definition of the term "testimonial." Brief for Respondent in No. 05-5705, p. 46; Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae in No. 05-5705, p. 14.

FN6. Some of the factors on which the Court relies to determine that the police questioning in Hammon was testimonial apply equally in Davis. For example, while Hammon was "actively separated from the [victim]" and thereby "prevented ... from participating in the interrogation," Davis was apart from McCottry while she was questioned by the 911 operator and thus unable to participate in the questioning. Ante, at 2271, 2278. Similarly, "the events described [by McCottry] were over" by the time she recounted them to the 911 operator. Ibid. See 154 Wash.2d 291, 295-296, 111 P.3d 844, 846-847 (2005) (en banc).

185 W. Va. 512, 408 S.E.2d 91

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia

STATE of West Virginia, Plaintiff Below, Appellant,

v.

Karen Sue DeBERRY, Defendant Below, Appellee.

No. 19990

Submitted May 14, 1991

Decided July 25, 1991

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. In order to obtain a conviction under W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4(b) [1988], the State must prove that the defendant neglected a minor child within the meaning of the term "neglect," as that term is defined by W.Va.Code, 61- 8D-1(6) [1988], which definition is "the unreasonable failure by a parent, guardian, or any person voluntarily accepting a supervisory role towards a minor child to exercise a minimum degree of care to assure said minor child's physical safety or health." Furthermore, the State must prove that such neglect caused serious bodily injury. However, there is no requirement to prove criminal intent in a prosecution under W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4(b) [1988].

2. "A criminal statute must be set out with sufficient definiteness to give a person of ordinary intelligence fair notice that his contemplated conduct is prohibited by statute and to provide adequate standards for adjudication." Syl. pt. 1, State v. Flinn, 158 W. Va. 111, 208 S.E.2d 538 (1974).

3. The term "neglect," as defined by W.Va.Code, 61-8D-1(6) [1988], is not unconstitutionally vague in violation of due process principles contained in U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1, and W.Va. Const. art. III, § 10. Therefore, W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4(b) [1988] is not unconstitutionally vague in violation of due process principles contained in U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1, and W.Va. Const. art. III, § 10, because such statute's use of the term "neglect" gives a person of ordinary intelligence fair notice that his or her contemplated conduct is prohibited and it also provides adequate standards for adjudication.

Edmund J. Matko, David A. Jones, Harrison County Prosecutor's Office, Clarksburg, Joanna I. Tabit, Deputy Atty. Gen., Appellate Div., Charleston, for the plaintiff below, appellant.

James M. Pool, Clarksburg, for the defendant below, appellee.

McHUGH, Justice:

This case is before the Court upon the appeal of the State of West Virginia. The appellee is Karen Sue DeBerry, the defendant below (hereinafter "defendant").

I

This appeal arises from the dismissal of an indictment in the Circuit Court of Harrison County. Because there was no trial, the record is very brief, with little factual development. The State's allegations, however, are as follows: In May, 1989, the defendant went to a party at her neighbor's house and took her twelve-year-old daughter, Valerie, with her. The defendant knew that alcohol would be served at this party.

At the party, the defendant encouraged her daughter to drink alcohol and to play "drinking games" with adults who were at the party. Valerie consumed alcohol until she lost consciousness.

The defendant apparently arranged for someone else to carry Valerie home and put her in bed, while she (the defendant) engaged in sexual intercourse with another guest at the party.

The next morning, the defendant found Valerie dead in her bedroom. The medical examiner determined that the cause of death was "acute ethanol intoxication" resulting from vast consumption of alcohol.

The defendant was charged in a three-count indictment. The first count charged the defendant and a William Thomas Reaser with first degree murder (by administering poison). See footnote 1 The second count charged the defendant with causing serious bodily injury to her child by felonious neglect, pursuant to W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4(b) [1988]. The third count of the indictment charged Reaser with aiding and abetting the defendant's violation of W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4(b) [1988]. See footnote 2

The second count of the indictment is at issue in this case, specifically, the constitutionality of W.Va.Code, 61-8D4(b) [1988], which makes it a felony for a parent, guardian, or custodian to neglect a child, and by such neglect, cause the child serious bodily injury. We must necessarily address the constitutionality of W.Va.Code, 61-8D-1(6) [1988] as well, which sets forth the definition of "neglect," as that term is used in W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4(b) [1988].

On February 13, 1990, the defendant moved to dismiss the indictment on the grounds that W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4(b) [1988] is unconstitutionally vague. The circuit court agreed, and, on November 28, 1990, an order was entered dismissing the indictment. See footnote 3

W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4 [1988] provides, in pertinent part:

> (b) If any parent, guardian or custodian shall neglect a child and by such neglect cause said child serious bodily injury, as such te rm is defined in section one, article eight-b of this ch apter, then such parent, guardian or custodian shall be guilty of a felony, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not m ore than three thousa nd dollars and im prisoned in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than ten years, or both such fine and imprisonment.
> (emphasis supplied)

" 'Neglect' " is defined as "the unreasonable failure by a parent, guardian, or any person voluntarily accepting a supervisory role towards a minor child to exercise a minimum degree of care to assure said minor child's physical safety or health." W.Va.Code, 61-8D-1(6) [1988] (emphasis supplied). See footnote 4

In dismissing the indictment, the circuit court held that the definition of the word "neglect," as that term is set forth in W.Va.Code, 61-8D-1(6) [1988] is unconstitutionally void for vagueness, in violation of principles of due process. See footnote 5 Thus, the circuit court agreed with the defendant's contention that the use of that term in W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4(b) [1988] is so indefinite and uncertain that it does not inform the accused as to the act or acts necessary to constitute the offense charged with such certainty that the defendant would be able to determine whether or not she had violated the law at the time the alleged offense occurred. We do not agree with the circuit court's judgment in this case, and, accordingly, we reverse the circuit court's order.

III

In arguing before the lower court that W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4(b) [1988] and W.Va.Code, 61-8D-1(6) [1988] are unconstitutionally vague, the defendant attacked the alleged ambiguity of the terms "unreasonable failure," and "minimum degree of care," as those terms are used in the definition of "neglect." W.Va.Code, 61-8D-1(6) [1988]. The State, on the other hand, asserts that W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4(b) [1988] establishes a standard of ordinary negligence.

In support of its contention, the State points to the definition of the term "unreasonable," which means, inter alia, unwise, senseless, or not rational. Black's Law Dictionary 1379 (5th ed. 1979). The State further looks to the use of the term "minimum degree of care," as that term is used in the statutory definition of "neglect." W.Va.Code, 61-8D-1(6) [1988]. "Minimum," the State points out, is the least quantity that is possible or assignable in a particular case. Black's Law Dictionary 898 (5th ed. 1979).

The defendant contends that the State wrongfully equates neglect with negligent, arguing that in a statutory crime, the element of intent may only be dispensed with where the legislature has clearly expressed so in the statute. This Court has held: "The legislative purpose to dispense with the element of intent in a statutory crime must be clearly expressed." Syl., State v. Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. of America, 111 W.Va. 148, 161 S.E. 5 (1931).

The statute at issue in this case does not require intent because it sets forth a standard of neglect. Although we do not use the words neglect and negligence interchangeably, a comparison to criminal negligence is illustrative of our conclusion that intent is not required to obtain a conviction under W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4(b) [1988]. "There can be no attempt to commit a crime the gravamen of which is negligent conduct. By definition, the actor must intend to commit the target crime. His intent to commit a negligent act would be a contradiction in terms." IV C. Torcia, Wharton's Criminal Law § 741, at 569 (14th ed. 1981) (emphasis supplied).

We agree with the State's contention that W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4(b) [1988] and W.Va.Code, 61-8D-1(6) [1988] are not ambiguous. Clearly, the legislature intended to impose a standard of neglect, as opposed to requiring intent, by enacting W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4(b) [1988]. Because this statute involves neglect in a criminal context, again we view the law of criminal negligence as instructive.

> There can be no intent to com mit an unlawful act when the underlying conduct constitutes culpable negligence. Criminal negligence occurs in those instances in which neither specif ic nor general criminal intent is present but there exists such disregard of the interest of others that the offender's conduct am ounts to a gross devi ation below the standard of care expected to be m aintained by a reasonably careful person under like circumstances. Criminal negligence is of a higher degree than is required for civil liability and requires signifi cantly more than ordinary tort negligence.

22 C.J.S. Criminal Law § 38, at 44 (1989) (emphasis supplied) (footnotes omitted). See Eslava v. State, 473 So.2d 1143, 1147 (Ala.Crim.App.),cert. denied, 473 So.2d 1143 (Ala.1985). See footnote 6

Similarly, other states, in their criminal child abuse statutes, include the term "negligence" therein. For example, in State v. Lucero, 87 N.M. 242, 531 P.2d 1215, cert. denied, 87 N.M. 239, 531 P.2d 1212 (1975), the court held that a criminal child abuse statute does not require proof of criminal intent. Rather, as the court pointed out, "[t]he Legislature has the authority to make a negligent act a crime as well as an intentional one." 87 N.M. at 245, 531 P.2d at 1218. See footnote 7 See also People v. Hoehl, 193 Colo. 557, 568 P.2d 484 (1977); see generally, annotation, Validity and Construction of Penal Statute Prohibiting Child Abuse, 1 A.L.R.4th 38, § 12[b] (1980 & Supp.1990).

Accordingly, in order to obtain a conviction under W.Va.Code, 61-8D- 4(b) [1988], the State must prove that the defendant neglected a minor child within the meaning of the term "neglect," as that term is defined by W.Va.Code, 61-8D-1(6) [1988], which definition is "the unreasonable failure by a parent, guardian, or any person voluntarily accepting a supervisory role towards a minor child to exercise a minimum degree of care to assure said minor child's physical safety or health." Furthermore, the State must prove that such neglect caused serious bodily injury. However, there is no requirement to prove criminal intent in a prosecution under W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4(b) [1988].

IV

As for the State's contention that the terms used in W.Va.Code, 61- 8D-4(b) [1988] and W.Va.Code, 61-8D-1(6) [1988] are not unconstitutionally vague, we turn to well established constitutional principles.

In State v. Flinn, 158 W.Va. 111, 208 S.E.2d 538 (1974), this Court set forth the requirements for a criminal statute to pass constitutional muster, where that statute is challenged upon grounds of vagueness. In syllabus point 1 thereto, we held: "A criminal statute must be set out with sufficient definiteness to give a person of ordinary intelligence fair notice that his contemplated conduct is prohibited by statute and to provide adequate standards for adjudication." We have recognized that this "vagueness standard is well settled[.]" State v. Less, 170 W.Va. 259, 263, 294 S.E.2d 62, 66 (1981). See syl. pt. 2, Less; syl. pt. 1, State v. Reed, 166 W.Va. 558, 276 S.E.2d 313 (1981); State ex rel. Whitman v. Fox, 160 W.Va. 633, 638-39, 236 S.E.2d 565, 569 (1977); State ex rel. Cogar v. Kidd, 160 W.Va. 371, 376-77, 234 S.E.2d 899, 902 (1977); Anderson v. George, 160 W.Va. 76, 84, 233 S.E.2d 407, 411 (1977) (Miller, J., concurring); State v. Grinstead, 157 W.Va. 1001, 1009, 206 S.E.2d 912, 918 (1974).

This Court is of the opinion that neither W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4(b) [1988], nor W.Va.Code, 61-8D-1(6) [1988] are unconstitutionally vague.

In reaching this conclusion, we look to see whether the criminal statute at issue notifies a potential offender that he or she may be in violation thereof. Although

> [t]here is no satisfactory form ula to deci de if a statute is so vague as to violate the due process clauses of the State and Fede ral Constitutions[,] [t]he basic requirements are that such a statute m ust be couched in such language so as to notify a potential o ffender of a crim inal provision as to > what he should avoid doing in order to ascertain if he has violated the offense provided and it may be couched in general language.

Syl. pt. 1, State ex rel. Myers v. Wood, 154 W.Va. 431, 175 S.E.2d 637 (1970).

As pointed out previously herein, the term "unreasonable" means unwise, senseless, or not rational. Black's Law Dictionary 1379 (5th ed. 1979). See also Beerman v. City of Kettering, 14 Ohio Misc. 149, 154, 237 N.E.2d 644, 648 (1965). The statute's use of this term is clear. Furthermore, the "minimum degree of care" is a term which requires little explanation in ascertaining proscribed conduct under the statute at issue.

The definition of "neglect" is comprised of these terms and set forth in W.Va.Code, 61-8D-1(6) [1988]. The term "neglect," in turn, is used in W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4(b) [1988], which makes it a crime to neglect a child where such neglect results in a serious injury.

Clearly, the term "neglect," as that term is used in W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4(b) [1988], and defined in W.Va.Code, 61-8D-1(6) [1988], "give[s] the person of ordinary intelligence a reasonable opportunity to know what is prohibited, so that he may act accordingly." Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104, 108, 92 S.Ct. 2294, 2298-99, 33 L.Ed.2d 222, 227 (1972). See syl. pt. 1, State ex rel. Myers v. Wood, 154 W.Va. 431, 175 S.E.2d 637 (1970).

Consistent with the foregoing, we hold that the term "neglect," as defined by W.Va.Code, 61-8D-1(6) [1988], is not unconstitutionally vague in violation of due process principles contained in U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1, and W.Va. Const. art. III, § 10. Therefore, W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4(b) [1988] is not unconstitutionally vague in violation of due process principles contained in U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1, and W.Va. Const. art. III, § 10, because such statute's use of the term "neglect" gives a person of ordinary intelligence fair notice that his or her contemplated conduct is prohibited and it also provides adequate standards for adjudication.

Accordingly, the judgment of the Circuit Court of Harrison County is reversed. See footnote 8

Reversed.

Footnote: 1 See W.Va.Code, 61-2-1, as amended.

Footnote: 2 See W.Va.Code, 61-11-6 [1931].

Footnote: 3 The hearing on the motion to dismiss was held on November 1, 1990. On November 2, 1990, the State moved to dismiss the first count of the indictment. The defendant opposed the State's motion. The record before this Court does not indicate why the State desired dismissal of the indictment's first count, nor why the defendant would oppose such a motion. However, during the oral argument of this case, counsel for the defendant asserted that the defendant objected to the motion to dismiss because the defendant was prepared to prove that she did not commit murder. In so asserting, counsel for the defendant, during oral argument, stated that the defendant's daughter was murdered, but not by the defendant. Counsel also asserted that the autopsy revealed semen in the victim's vagina, a blood alcohol content of .17%, and that the examining pathologist was not even certified. In any event, the dismissal of the first degree murder count of the indictment has no bearing on the issue that confronts us in this case, specifically, the constitutionality of W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4(b) [1988] and W.Va.Code, 61-8D-1(6) [1988].

Footnote: 4 W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4(b) [1988] also refers to the term "serious bodily injury," as that term is defined by W.Va.Code, 61-8B-1(10) [1986], which provides: " 'Serious bodily injury' means bodily injury which creates a substantial risk of death, which causes serious or prolonged disfigurement, prolonged impairment of health, or prolonged loss or impairment of the function of any bodily organ."
W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4(a) [1988] is essentially the same as subsection (b), except subsection (a) deals with only "bodily injury," and not "serious bodily injury." The penalties under subsection (a) are less severe as well.
Subsection (c) of W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4 [1988] prohibits application of that section where the neglect is "due primarily to a lack of financial means on the part of" the parent. Subsection (d) prohibits application to a parent who, due to conflicting tenets and practices of religion, "fails or refuses, or allows another person to fail or refuse, to supply a child under the care, custody or control of such parent, guardian or custodian with necessary medical care[.]"

Footnote: 5 Due process principles are contained in section 1 of the fourteenth amendment to the United States Constitution, which provides, in part, "[n]o State shall ... deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law[,]" and article III, section 10 of the West Virginia Constitution, which similarly provides that "[n]o person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, and the judgment of his peers."

Footnote: 6 We note that W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4(b) [1988] does not establish a standard of negligence, such as "reckless disregard," which is contained in this state's vehicular negligent homicide statute, W.Va.Code, 17C-5- 1 [1979]. In State v. Vollmer, 163 W.Va. 711, 259 S.E.2d 837 (1979), we recognized that that statute requires more than ordinary negligence. Id., syl. pt. 2.

If W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4(b) [1988] expressed another specific standard of negligence as its standard of criminal liability, then we would be bound to apply that standard. For example, in a similar context, "[w]here a statute adopts degrees of negligence as a basis for fixing criminal responsibility, the court must give effect to them, even though they are not recognized in civil cases." 22 C.J.S. Criminal Law § 38, at 45 (1989). Our decision is limited to holding that W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4(b) [1988] requires neglect, which, as defined in W.Va.Code, 61-8D-1(6) [1988], is, fundamentally, of a higher degree than ordinary negligence.

The State maintains that even under a more stringent standard, the defendant's conduct in this case is violative of such a standard. As stated in note 3, supra, our decision in this case does not specifically address the defendant's alleged conduct. Rather, we limit ourselves to deciding the constitutionality of W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4(b) [1988] and W.Va.Code, 61-8D-1(6) [1988].

Footnote: 7 The defendant maintains that the State's reliance upon Lucero is misplaced because in that case, the court was faced with a statute in which the legislature had expressly eliminated the intent requirement by including the term "negligently" in the statute. Lucero is not dispositive of the case now before us. It is, however, persuasive. As stated previously herein, we believe that W.Va.Code, 61-8D-4(b) [1988] does not require intent. The defendant also claims that Lucero is distinguishable from this case because in Lucero, the court addressed a child abuse statute, whereas here, we are reviewing a child neglect statute. We believe that this distinction is inapposite for purposes of our decision in this case. While it is true that abuse refers more to the commission of an act and neglect refers to the omission of an act, the terms "child abuse" and "child neglect" are intertwined in several contexts. See, for example, W.Va.Code, 49-1-3 [1990], which sets forth definitions relating to child abuse and neglect in a civil context. See also State v. Eagle Hawk, 411 N.W.2d 120, 123-24 (S.D.1987) (agreeing with State's reasoning that, at some point, parental neglect may become abuse of child).

Footnote: 8 Our decision in this case is limited to reversing the judgment of the circuit court only with respect to the issue of the constitutionality of the statutes at issue in this case. Our decision does not address the question of the defendant's guilt or innocence, but merely allows the State to reindict the defendant under the applicable statute. See supra note 3.

The Opinion of the Court was delivered PER CURIAM.
JUSTICE STARCHER, deeming himself disqualified, did not participate in the consideration or decision of this case.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Though constitutionally protected, the right of the natural parent to the custody of minor children is not absolute and it may be limited or terminated by the State, as parens patriae, if the parent is proved unfit to be entrusted with child care." Syl. pt. 5, In Re: Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973).

2. "Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W.Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W.Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected." Syl. pt. 2, In Re: R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

3. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syl. pt. 1, In Re: Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

Per Curiam:

This case is before this Court upon the appeal of Julie F. from the July 24, 2003, order of the Circuit Court of Harrison County, West Virginia, terminating her parental rights to her infant daughter, Dejah Rose P., now known as Dejah Rose F.[1] The Circuit Court concluded that appellant Julie F.'s long-term addiction to drugs and past failures in responding to treatment have resulted in the identification of Dejah Rose as a neglected or abused child as defined by law in this State. Dejah Rose has been in the custody of the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources since April 2002 and has resided in the same foster home since that time.

Specifically, the Circuit Court found that, in view of the appellant's failure to fully comply with the terms of her post-adjudicatory improvement period, and because the time required for the appellant's recovery from addiction is uncertain under her current treatment program, there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future. As a result, the Circuit Court held that the welfare of Dejah Rose required the termination of the appellant's parental rights. Nor did the Circuit Court grant the appellant any post-termination visitation with Dejah Rose.

Appellant Julie F., conceding that immediate reunification with her daughter is unwarranted, contends that the Circuit Court committed error in not granting her an alternative to termination. Acknowledging her drug addiction and emphasizing that she is currently enrolled in a treatment program on a voluntary basis, the appellant asserts that the Circuit Court should have allowed her a gradual reunification with Dejah Rose under the supervision of the Circuit Court and the Department of Health and Human Resources while the appellant continues with her treatment. On the other hand, the brief of the Department of Health and Human Resources filed in this Court in support of the order terminating the appellant's parental rights was joined by the guardian ad litem appointed by the Circuit Court for the child.

This Court has before it the petition for appeal, all matters of record and the briefs and argument of counsel. Upon a careful review of this sad and distressing case, this Court concludes that the Circuit Court acted within its discretion in making the difficult decision to terminate the appellant's parental rights to Dejah Rose. The Circuit Court's decision was based upon extensive findings of fact. In that context, this Court notes the observation made in State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 200 W.Va. 555, 490 S.E.2d 642 (1997), that the "intangibles" in abuse and neglect cases justify the deferential approach this Court takes regarding Circuit Court findings. 200 W.Va. at 562, 490 S.E.2d at 649.

Accordingly, the July 24, 2003, order of the Circuit Court of Harrison County is affirmed.

I.
FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

For a number of years, the appellant, Julie F., has been an abuser of drugs, such as OxyContin and Xanax. As indicated by the Department of Health and Human Resources, the appellant was incarcerated, prior to the birth of her child, on bad check charges in connection with her drug habit and had failed to respond to treatment for her addiction on two prior occasions.

In March 2002, the appellant was living in Clarksburg, West Virginia, with Robert P. who also has a history of drug abuse. On March 16, 2002, Dejah Rose was born. At that time, the hospital staff noticed drug related "track marks" on the appellant's arms and feet. As later determined, the appellant had not consistently pursued prenatal care and had abused drugs during her pregnancy.[2] After her release from the hospital with her baby, the appellant continued to abuse drugs. Dejah Rose is the appellant's only child.

In April 2002, the Department of Health and Human Resources obtained emergency custody of Dejah Rose and, soon after, placed her in a foster home where she has remained throughout these proceedings. In addition, the Department filed a petition in the Circuit Court of Harrison County alleging that Dejah Rose was a neglected or abused child[3] and asking the Circuit Court to terminate the appellant's parental rights.[4] Thereafter, the

---

[2] The record indicates that at birth the child, Dejah Rose, exhibited symptoms indicative of drug addiction.

[3] Pursuant to W.Va. Code, 49-1-3 (1999), the phrase child abuse or neglect (or child abuse and neglect) is defined as "physical injury, mental or emotional injury . . . or negligent treatment or maltreatment of a child by a parent, guardian or custodian who is responsible for the child's welfare, under circumstances which harm or threaten the health and welfare of the child."

Specifically, an abused child is defined in that section to include a child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by a parent, guardian or custodian "who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home [.]"

A neglected child is defined in that section to include a child whose physical or mental health is harmed or threatened by a failure of the child's parent, guardian or custodian "to supply the child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care or education, when such refusal, failure or inability is not due primarily to a lack of financial means on the part of the parent, guardian or custodian [.]"

[4] The petition filed by the Department alleged that the biological father of Dejah Rose is unknown.

Circuit Court appointed a guardian ad litem for the child and a separate Court-Appointed Special Advocate to further the child's best interests.[5]

On April 29, 2002, the Circuit Court conducted a preliminary hearing and ruled that Dejah Rose should remain in the custody of the Department of Health and Human Resources and should continue to reside in the foster home. W.Va. Code, 49-6-3 (1998). The appellant, however, was granted supervised visitation with her daughter. Thereafter, the appellant signed a stipulated adjudication pursuant to Rule 26 of this Court's Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings[6] in which she acknowledged that, as a

A paternity test conducted in May 2002 indicated that Robert P. is not the biological father of the child. Thereafter, a test conducted in February 2003 indicated that an individual by the name of Darryl H. is the biological father of Dejah Rose. Darryl H. later acknowledged the child as his own, and the Circuit Court determined Darryl H. to be a neglectful parent. In fact, the record indicates that Darryl H. is the biological father of several other children and that he has not provided them with financial or emotional support. The Department recommends that the parental rights of Darryl H. to Dejah Rose be terminated. This appeal, however, is limited to a consideration of the parental rights of the appellant, Julie F.

[5] Rule 52 of this Court's Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings provides for the appointment of a Court-Appointed Special Advocate (CASA) who has the authority in abuse and neglect cases to independently review the record and advocate the best interests of the child.

[6] Rule 26 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings states, in part, that any stipulated or uncontested adjudication shall include the following information: "(1) Agreed upon facts supporting court involvement regarding the respondent's(s') problems, conduct or condition; and (2) A statement of respondent's(s') (continued...)

result of her drug addiction, Dejah Rose was a neglected or abused child under the laws of this State. In that regard, the appellant admitted that she used illicit drugs during the last trimester of her pregnancy and that she had jeopardized the health of her baby by not regularly attending prenatal care. On the other hand, the appellant indicated in the adjudicated stipulation that she left the Clarksburg area and was receiving treatment for her addiction at a half-way house known as the Mid-Ohio Valley Fellowship Home in Parkersburg, West Virginia.

An adjudicatory hearing was conducted in the case on July 16, 2002. W.Va. Code, 49-6-2 (1996). The Circuit Court directed that custody of Dejah Rose continue with the Department and that she remain in the foster home. However, in addition to permitting further visitation with her daughter, the Circuit Court granted the appellant, Julie F., a six-month post-adjudicatory improvement period, conditioned, as set forth in the family case plan filed by the Department, upon the appellant's continued participation in the program at the Mid-Ohio Valley Fellowship Home.

In September 2002, the Department of Health and Human Resources filed a motion to revoke the improvement period because, in August 2002, the appellant tested positive for opiates and had been expelled from the Fellowship Home. A secondary ground for the motion was the allegation that the appellant had been involved in a relationship with a male resident against the rules of the Home. The Circuit Court conducted an evidentiary hearing upon the motion and ruled that, although the allegations of the Department were true, the appellant would be granted a three-month extension of the post-adjudicatory improvement period. See, W.Va. Code, 49-6-12(g) (1996), permitting such extensions. The Court's ruling was based upon the fact that, since her expulsion from the Mid-Ohio Valley Fellowship Home, the appellant returned to Clarksburg and voluntarily enrolled in a methadone treatment program at the Clarksburg Treatment Center.

problems or deficiencies to be addressed at the final disposition."

On April 15, 2003, the Circuit Court conducted a disposition hearing. W.Va. Code, 49-6-5 (2002); Rule 35(b), West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings. At that time, Dejah Rose was approximately 13 months old and had been in the same foster home since April 2002. Following the hearing, the Circuit Court entered the order of July 24, 2003, terminating the appellant's parental rights. The order was prepared by the guardian ad litem for the child.

In terminating the appellant's parental rights, the Circuit Court noted that the appellant failed to respond to treatment for her drug addiction on prior occasions and had violated the terms of the post-adjudicatory improvement period as discussed above. Moreover, the Circuit Court emphasized that, based upon the evidence, the appellant would be unable to complete her current methadone treatment program in the near future and that, in fact, it is unknown how much more time would be required. As the Circuit Court concluded: "[T]here is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect can be substantially corrected in the near future, and it is necessary for the welfare of the infant child to terminate the parental rights of [Julie F.]"

II.
DISCUSSION

This Court has long recognized the principle that parental rights are not absolute when in conflict with the health and welfare of the child. Syllabus point 5 of In Re: Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973), holds: "Though constitutionally protected, the right of the natural parent to the custody of minor children is not absolute and it may be limited or terminated by the State, as parens patriae, if the parent is proved unfit to be entrusted with child care." Syl. pt. 3, In Re: Carolyn Jean, 181 W.Va. 383, 382 S.E.2d 577 (1989); syl. pt. 1, State v. C.N.S., 173 W.Va. 651, 319 S.E.2d 775 (1984). Moreover, as this Court said in syllabus point 3 of In Re: Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996): "Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syl. pt. 4, In Re: Frances J.A.S., 213 W.Va. 636, 584 S.E.2d 492 (2003).

Specifically, a circuit court has the authority under W.Va. Code, 49-6-5(a)(6) (2002), to terminate parental rights when necessary for the welfare of the child, upon a finding "that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future [.]" Pursuant to that statute, the circuit court shall, in such cases, consider: "(A) The child's need for continuity of care and caretakers; (B) the amount of time required for the child to be integrated into a stable and permanent home environment; and (C) other factors as the court considers necessary and proper." Moreover, W.Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) (2002), provides in relevant part:

> As used in this section, "no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected" shall mean that, based upon the evidence before the court, the abusing adult or adults have demonstrated an inadequate capacity to solve the problems of abuse or neglect on their own or with help. Such conditions shall be considered to exist in the following circumstances, which shall not be exclusive:
> (1) The abusing parent or parents have habitually abused or are addicted to alcohol, controlled substances or drugs, to the extent that proper parenting skills have been seriously impaired and such person or persons have not responded to or followed through the recommended and appropriate treatment which could have improved the capacity for adequate parental functioning [.]

Finally, W.Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) (2002), sets forth several less restrictive alternatives to the termination of parental rights. Those alternatives include, for example, permitting the child to remain with the parents but under the supervision of the Department of Health and Human Resources. However, in certain circumstances those alternatives are not feasible. Syllabus point 2 of In Re: R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980), holds: "Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W.Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W.Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected."[7] Syl. pt. 2, In Re: Erica C., 214 W.Va. 375, 589 S.E.2d 517 (2003); syl. pt. 2, DHHR ex rel. Mills v. Billy Lee C., 199 W.Va. 541, 485 S.E.2d 710 (1997).

In the case now to be determined, the Circuit Court concluded that "there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect can be substantially corrected in the near future, and it is necessary for the welfare of the infant child to terminate the parental rights of [Julie F.]" In reviewing that conclusion, this Court is guided by the standard of review set forth in syllabus point 1 of In Re: Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996):

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and > shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

Syl. pt. 1, In Re: Stephen Tyler R., 213 W.Va. 725, 584 S.E.2d 581 (2003); syl. pt. 1, In Re: Jamie Nicole H., 205 W.Va. 176, 517 S.E.2d 41 (1999); syl. pt. 4, In Re: Taylor B., 201 W.Va. 60, 491 S.E.2d 607 (1997).

The appellant, Julie F., emphasizes that, since the removal of her child by the Department of Health and Human Resources in April 2002, she has obtained new housing and employment, completed classes in parenting skills and voluntarily enrolled in the methadone treatment program at the Clarksburg Treatment Center. Moreover, the appellant states that she has stayed away from Robert P., who also has a history of drug abuse. Thus, the appellant contends that she is entitled to a gradual reunification with Dejah Rose under the supervision of the Circuit Court and the Department.

On the other hand, the record contains substantial evidence, largely undisputed, justifying the Circuit Court's concern for the welfare of the child and warranting the termination of the appellant's parental rights.

In terms of drug abuse or drug addiction, W.Va. Code, 49-6-5 (2003), contemplates an inquiry into the parent's past conduct as well as the parent's prognosis. As discussed above, the statute authorizes a circuit court to determine: (1) whether the parent has demonstrated an inadequate capacity to solve the problems of neglect or abuse on his or her own or with help, and (2) whether the parent has habitually abused drugs or is addicted to drugs. Here, it is undisputed that the appellant abused drugs for a number of years and jeopardized the health of Dejah Rose by abusing drugs during her pregnancy and by not regularly attending prenatal care. After her release from the hospital with her baby, the appellant continued to abuse drugs. Counting her expulsion from the Mid-Ohio Valley Fellowship Home, during the improvement period, after testing positive for opiates, the appellant has failed to respond to treatment for her addiction three times.

The appellant enrolled in the methadone treatment program at the Clarksburg Treatment Center in November 2002. While this Court is not unmindful of the appellant's efforts to remain drug free, W.Va. Code, 49-6-5 (2002), further provides that, in terminating parental rights, a circuit court shall consider: (A) the child's need for "continuity of care and caretakers" and (B) "the amount of time required for the child to be integrated into a stable and permanent home environment." Here, Dejah Rose has resided in the same foster home since April 2002. As the Circuit Court found, the time required for the appellant's recovery from addiction at the Clarksburg Treatment Center is uncertain. The testimony given at the April 15, 2003, disposition hearing concerning the Treatment Center revealed that, due to the individualized nature of the program, a patient could remain in treatment from six months to beyond one year. Moreover, such a period would not necessarily include the time required for other needed services, such as outpatient counseling. During the disposition hearing, David Jeffrey, a psychologist, testified that parenting would be difficult while involved in a methadone treatment program.

In the parental termination case of In Re: Emily B., 208 W.Va. 325, 540 S.E.2d 542 (2000), the Circuit Court of Mercer County granted the mother an improvement period scheduled to commence upon the mother's successful completion of a substance abuse treatment program. This Court reversed, suggesting, in part, that the indefinite nature of such an improvement period contradicts the intent of the West Virginia Legislature to expedite abuse and neglect proceedings in order to safeguard the welfare of children. 208 W.Va. at 337, 540 S.E.2d at 554.[8]

This Court observed in State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W.Va. 251, 470 S.E.2d 205 (1996), that a child deserves "resolution and permanency" in his or her life and deserves the right to rely on his or her caretakers "to be there to provide the basic nurturance

[8] The In Re: Emily B. opinion indicates that the Circuit Court's implementation of the mother's improvement period was problematic because, by the very terms of the Court's ruling, the delay was indefinite. Moreover, this Court observed that, under the circumstances of the case, basing the commencement of the improvement period upon the mother's successful completion of a substance abuse treatment program was speculative. 208 W.Va. at 337, 540 S.E.2d at 554.

of life." 196 W.Va. at 260, 470 S.E.2d at 214. In this case, the ruling of the Circuit Court to terminate the appellant's parental rights to Dejah Rose was based upon extensive findings of fact and a correct application of the law. Consequently, this Court is of the opinion that the ruling of the Circuit Court terminating the appellant's parental rights, as well as the Circuit Court's decision at the disposition stage not to employ less restrictive alternatives[9], should not be disturbed.

III.
CONCLUSION

Upon all of the above, the July 24, 2003, order of the Circuit Court of Harrison County, West Virginia, terminating the appellant's parental rights is affirmed.

Affirmed.

[9] As stated above, the Circuit Court did not grant the appellant, Julie F., any post-termination visitation with Dejah Rose, although it had the authority to do so. Syl. pt. 5, In Re: Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995). Upon a review of the record, this Court affirms the denial of post-termination visitation. In that regard, this Court notes the representations of counsel during oral argument before this Court to the effect that, at some point after the July 24, 2003, order of the Circuit Court, the appellant may have temporarily left the State of West Virginia, and has, in any event, been somewhat out of contact with those concerned in this appeal.

Supreme Court Of Appeals Of West Virginia

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA, Plaintiff Below, Appellee,

v.

DENZIL DELANEY, Defendant Below, Appellant

No. 19837

Submitted: March 10, 1992

Filed: April 16, 1992

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Where a counsel's performance, attacked as ineffective, arises from occurrences involving strategy, tactics and arguable courses of action, his conduct will be deemed effectively assistive of his client's interest, unless no reasonably qualified defense attorney would have so acted in the defense of an accused." Syllabus point 21, State v. Thomas, 157 W.Va. 640, 203 S.E.2d 445 (1974).

2. "A statement is not hearsay if the statement is offered against a party and is his own statement, in either his individual or a representative capacity." Syllabus point 1, Heydinger v. Adkins, ___ W.Va. ___, 360 S.E.2d 240 (1987).

3. In order for a trial court to determine whether to grant a party's request for additional physical or psychological examinations, the requesting party must present the judge with evidence that he has a compelling need or reason for the additional examinations. In making the determination, the judge should consider: (1) the nature of the examination requested and the intrusiveness inherent in that examination; (2) the victim's age; (3) the resulting physical and/or emotional effects of the examination on the victim; (4) the probative value of the examination to the issue before the court; (5) the remoteness in time of the examination to the alleged criminal act; and (6) the evidence already available for the defendant's use.

Joanna I. Tabit, Deputy Attorney General, Charleston, West Virginia, Attorney for the Appellee

Mark G. Sargent, Spencer, WV, Attorney for the Appellant

Brotherton, Justice:

The appellant, Denzil Delaney, appeals from the verdict of the Circuit Court of Calhoun County, which found the appellant guilty on six counts of sexual assault. The appellant was sentenced to thirty-to-fifty years in the State penitentiary, fined $10,000, and ordered to pay restitution for medical and counseling expenses incurred by the victims.

Denzil Delaney was married to Joyce Nicholas. He lived with his wife and their daughter, Patty, on a farm in Orma, Calhoun County, West Virginia. Also living with Denzil and Joyce Delaney were Joyce's parents and Joyce's two young sisters, Emma and Missy Nicholas.

The first of the alleged sexual assaults which form the basis of this case occurred in January, 1983, when the appellant assaulted seven-year-old Emma Nicholas after feeding the hogs. Later that summer, he again allegedly assaulted Emma while she was sleeping in her parents' bed. Next, in the summer of 1984, the appellant took Emma outside early one morning and again sexually assaulted her. He then gave her a handful of change and told her not to tell anyone.

In June, 1985, the appellant allegedly assaulted Emma's eight-year-old sister, Missy, while she was in her bedroom. Again, the appellant gave her a handful of change and told her not to tell anyone what he had done.

On July 21, 1985, Emma, Missy, and Patty Delaney, the appellant's daughter, told the appellant's wife, Joyce, that Denzil had been making them pull their clothes down. The appellant denied the allegation and accused the girls of lying. In July, 1988, Patty claimed that the appellant sexually assaulted her. A second sexual assault happened later that month. After both occasions, he gave her money and told her not to tell anyone.

After hearing that the appellant had molested Patty, Missy and Emma again decided to tell someone what had happened. Missy constructed a diary, in which she wrote, on July 18, 19, and 20, 1988, what had happened to her, Emma, and Patty. She also drew sketches of the appellant, portraying him as the devil. Missy placed the diary on the kitchen table on July 19, 1988, hoping that her mother, Missouri Nicholas, would read it. Her mother did not see it. Missy then copied one of the pages from the diary onto a separate piece of paper and gave it to a friend to give to her mother. Word got back to Missy's older sister, Robin McCumbers, who told the appellant's wife what the girls had said. The appellant's wife, Joyce, then ordered the appellant to pack his clothes and leave. He moved to his mother's home in Pennsylvania.

On July 21, 1988, Joyce Delaney and Missouri Nicholas took the three girls to the State Police headquarters in Grantsville, where all three girls gave statements to Trooper Garrett. On July 22, 1988, they were examined by Dr. Kathryn Grant. Based upon the statements given, Trooper Garrett investigated the appellant and filed criminal complaints against him in Calhoun County Magistrate Court. The appellant waived extradition, returned to West Virginia, and was incarcerated in the Calhoun County jail.

While incarcerated, the appellant made several phone calls to Joyce, by then his ex-wife, and his ex-father-in-law, Denver Nicholas. Denver Nicholas visited the appellant at the jail at the appellant's request. At that time, the appellant allegedly confessed to sexually assaulting the three girls and indicated that, although he wanted to plead guilty, he was not permitted to do so because he was not represented by counsel at that time. During the next visit, Denver Nicholas reported that the appellant asked him to have the girls recant their statements, but Denver refused. When the appellant called his ex-wife, Joyce, she spoke with the appellant while her sister, Robin, listened on the extension. At that time, the appellant confessed that he had sexually assaulted the girls, but stated that he wanted the girls to lie because he didn't want to go to jail for it.

Trial began in the Circuit Court of Calhoun County on July 11, 1989. Denver Nicholas, Robin McCumbers, and Joyce Nicholas testified to the appellant's alleged confessions. Dr. Katherine Grant, the physician who examined the three victims on July 22, 1988, also testified that Patty, the appellant's daughter, had physiological symptoms that were normal for a mature woman having sexual intercourse, but not for a five-year-old girl. Dr. Grant also examined Missy and Emma, but the examination revealed no physiological indications of recent sexual intercourse. However, Dr. Grant stated that the physical signs of sexual intercourse could recede within as little as six months. Also testifying was Pamela Rockwell, a sexual assault counselor for the Charleston-based Family Services. Ms. Rockwell had counseled Missy, Emma, and Patty on several occasions prior to trial. Ms. Rockwell testified that the three girls displayed symptoms of children who had been sexually assaulted or abused.

Following the closing statements, the jury found the appellant guilty on all six counts. Accordingly, the trial court sentenced him to thirty-to-fifty years in the State penitentiary, fined him $10,000, and ordered him to pay for the medical and counseling expenses incurred by the three girls. It is from the conviction that the appellant files this appeal.

The appellant presents twenty-four separate allegations of error to this Court for review. This Court will address only those assignments of error which have some substance and merit discussion. The remaining assignments of error, which we believe to be meritless, will not be addressed in this opinion.

Initially, we note that the appellant's argument that he had ineffective assistance of counsel at the trial level is erroneous. A review of the transcript reveals that the appellant's trial counsel, who is also his appellate counsel, did all things reasonable and necessary to defend his client. In State v. Thomas, 157 W.Va. 640, 203 S.E.2d 445 (1973), this Court set the standards for determining ineffective assistance of counsel:

Where a counsel's performance, attacked as ineffective, arises from occurrences involving strategy, tactics and arguable courses of action, his conduct will be deemed effectively assistive of his client's interest, unless no reasonably qualified defense attorney would have so acted in the defense of an accused.

Id. at syl. pt. 21. Further, the Thomas Court ruled that "[o]ne who charges on appeal that his trial counsel was ineffective and that such resulted in his conviction, must prove the allegation by a preponderance of the evidence." Id. at syl. pt. 22. As we can find no evidence that the trial counsel's performance resulted in the appellant's conviction or that no reasonably qualified defense attorney would have so acted, we do not find ineffective assistance of counsel.

The appellant next argues that the trial court erred when it allowed Joyce Nicholas, the appellant's ex-wife, to testify regarding his acts and statements which occurred while they were still married. The appellant argues that his ex-wife's testimony should have been limited to acts alleged to have been committed against their daughter, Patty, and that the marital privilege would prevent her from testifying regarding Emma and Missy.

West Virginia Code § 57-3-3 (1931) explains the marital privilege against acting as a witness against a spouse:

> In criminal cases husband and wife shall be allowed, and, subject to the rules of evidence governing other witnesses, may be compelled to testify in behalf of each other, but neither shall be compelled, nor, without the consent of the other, allowed to be called as a witness against the other except in the case of a prosecution for an offense committed by one against the other, or against the child, father, mother, sister or brother of either of them . . . . (Emphasis added.)

In this case, the charged sexual assaults were against their child and against the wife's two younger sisters. Thus, the marital privilege is not applicable to this case by the specific language of W.Va. Code § 57-3-3.

The appellant next argues that the statements made by him to Denver and Joyce Nicholas while in jail were hearsay and thus, should have been held inadmissible by the court below. We disagree. Rule 801(d)(2)(A) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence holds that admissions by a party opponent do not fall within the hearsay rule. In syllabus point 1 of Heydinger v. Adkins, 178 W.Va. 463, 360 S.E.2d 240 (1987), this Court stated that "[a] statement is not hearsay if the statement is offered against a party and is his own statement, in either his individual or representative capacity." We believe the statements were properly admitted by the trial court.

The appellant next contends that his constitutional right to due process was violated when the Circuit Court of Calhoun County denied his request to order court appointed experts access to the victims for physical and psychological examinations. The appellant was permitted both medical and psychological experts to interpret the examinations that had already been performed upon the three girls, but denied the opportunity to have the three girls re-examined by another physician and psychologist.

While we agree that a defendant has a right to present evidence on his own behalf and to confront adverse witnesses, pre-trial discovery is generally within the discretion of the trial court. Syl. pt. 8, State v. Audia, 171 W.Va. 568, 301 S.E.2d 199 (1983); see also, State v. Fortner, 182 W.Va. 345, 387 S.E.2d 812 (1989). This Court has held that the decision whether to require a psychiatric evaluation prior to determining a child's capacity to testify is within the trial court's discretion. Burdette v. Lobban, 174 W.Va. 120, 323 S.E.2d 601, 602 (1984). However, the Court has also ruled that "the traditional challenge to the competency of minors . . . does not require a psychological profile." State v. McPherson, 179 W.Va. 612, 371 S.E.2d 333, 339-40 (1988).

The State counters that the court must balance the defendant's right to discover possible evidence against the victims' privacy interests in ordering another physical examination. The State urges this Court to adopt a balancing test in order to determine whether additional examinations would be required, pointing to the test developed in State v. Ramos, 553 A.2d 1059 (R.I. 1989). See footnote 1 In Ramos, the Supreme Court of Rhode Island adopted "a compelling need or reason" test, stating that:

The practice of granting physical examinations of criminal witnesses must be approached with utmost judicial restraint and respect for an individual's dignity. In determining whether to order an independent medical examination, the trial justice should consider (1) the complainant's age, (2) the remoteness in time of the alleged criminal incident to the proposed examination, (3) the degree of intrusiveness and humiliation associated with the procedures, (4) the potentially debilitating physical effects of such an examination, and (5) any other relevant considerations.

Id. at 1062.

Although less specific than the Ramos test, Alaska utilizes a similar balancing test in determining whether the trial court was correct. In Moor v. State, 709 P.2d 498 (Alaska App. 1985), the Alaska Court of Appeals required a strong showing of materiality on the part of the requesting party before it would reverse a trial court's decision not to grant a psychiatric evaluation of a prosecution witness. Id. at 508. In making the decision, the court weighed the defendant's right to a fair trial and to challenge the veracity of the prosecution witnesses against the witness' right to privacy and the risk that such crimes would go unreported if witnesses were subject to harassment. Id. The Alaska court concluded that the defendant's offer of proof was inadequate and the trial court's denial of the evaluation would be upheld where the defendant's evidence showed the victim had discussed possible imaginary sexual activity with friends.

We believe the guidelines established in Ramos are a reasonable method of balancing the defendant's need for the examinations against the victim's right to privacy. Thus, in order for a trial court to determine whether to grant a party's request for additional physical or psychological examinations, the requesting party must present the judge with evidence he has a compelling need or reason for the additional physical or psychological examinations. In making the determination, the judge should consider (1) the nature of the examination requested and the intrusiveness inherent in that examination; (2) the victim's age; (3) the resulting physical and/or emotional effects of the examination on the victim; (4) the probative value of the examination to the issue before the court; (5) the remoteness in time of the examination to the alleged criminal act; and (6) the evidence already available for the defendant's use.

Although the trial court below does not state specific and detailed reasons for denying the request, we believe that it followed, in essence, the test enunciated in Ramos. In light of the victims' tender ages, the intrusiveness and humiliation associated with a gynecological examination of the three young girls, and the remoteness in time from the incidents in question to the proposed examinations, the court was correct in denying the request for a physical examination. Most persuasive to this Court is the fact that the State's expert testified that physical symptoms of sexual assault can dissipate in as little as six months. It has been several years since the dates of the alleged assaults. Thus, any evidence the appellant hopes to obtain from these tests would have long ago disappeared. In balancing the appellant's need against the consideration of the victims' ages, the intrusiveness of the examinations, and the remoteness of time, we conclude that there would be no probative value of such physical examinations at this point. Thus, the trial court was correct in denying additional physical examinations of the three victims.

The appellant's request for a psychological evaluation likewise fails. In many cases with similar circumstances, the trial court would be justified in allowing the examination. In this case, however, despite the appellant's professed need, he did little more than ask for the evaluation. Under the six part test set forth above, the appellant failed to present any reason, compelling or otherwise, to justify the examination. Given the effect of a probing mental interrogation on children of their tender years, we believe the trial court was correct in ruling that, in essence, the probative value to the appellant was outweighed by the trauma and intrusiveness to the victims. The appellant had available to him a psychologist to assist with the evaluation and cross-examination of the State's expert testimony. The appellant's counsel cross-examined the State's witness extensively on perceived failures in her treatment and questioning of the children's background. See footnote 2 Since we cannot find that the appellant's need is greater or more compelling than the burden it would impose on the victims, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying the appellant's request. See footnote 3

The appellant's remaining assignments of error are without merit and are not addressed by the Court in this opinion. Accordingly, we affirm the verdict of the Circuit Court of Calhoun County.

Affirmed.

1. Other jurisdictions have adopted some form of the "compelling need or reason" test in determining whether a request for an additional physical examination should be granted. See People v. Chard, 808 P.2d 351 (Colo. 1991), cert. denied ___ U.S. ___, 112 S.Ct. 186, 116 L.Ed.2d 147 (1991); State v. Farr, 558 So.2d 437 (Fla.App. 1990); State v. Drab, 546 So.2d 54 (Fla.App. 1989); People v. Beauchamp, 483 N.Y.S.2d 946 (N.Y.Supp. 1985); Lanton v. State, 456 So.2d 873 (Ala.Crim.App. 1984), cert. denied 471 U.S. 1095, 105 S.Ct. 2314, 85 L.Ed.2d 834 (1985); State v. Glover, 273 N.E.2d 367 (Ill. 1971).

A balancing test has also been applied in cases in which psychological testing was requested. See People v. Chard, 808 P.2d 351 (Colo. 1991); State v. LeBlanc, 558 So.2d 507 (Fla.App. 1990); State v. Nelson, 453 N.W.2d 454 (Neb. 1990); People v. Graham, 434 N.W.2d 165 (Mich.App. 1988); Moor v. State, 709 P.2d 498 (Alaska App. 1985); State v. Filson, 613 P.2d 938 (Idaho 1982).

2. Ms. Rockwell qualified as an expert at trial. She testified that she had a bachelors degree with fifteen hours toward her masters degree and approximately ninety hours of continuing education specializing in childhood sexual abuse. At the time of trial, she had been employed by the Sexual Assault Program at the Charleston-based Family Services for five and one-half years and in social services for another two years. She testified that she had treated approximately 400-450 children as victims of sexual assault, with ages ranging from three years through teenagers. Ms. Rockwell also stated that she received training in California, Chicago, and Washington, D.C. No objection was made by the appellant's counsel at the time of her testimony.

3. We also note the appellant's argument that the testimony of the rape counselor expert was improper is erroneous. In syllabus point 7 of State v. Edward Charles L., ___ W.Va. ___, 398 S.E.2d 123 (1990), this Court held that:

Expert psychological testimony is permissible in cases involving incidents of child sexual abuse. An expert may state an opinion as to whether the child comports with the psychological and behavioral profile of a child sexual abuse victim, and may offer an opinion based on objective findings that the child has been sexually abused . . . .

As a result, we believe that the testimony of Ms. Rockwell was proper.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "'When this Court reviews challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, a two-prong deferential standard of review is applied. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard.' Syl. Per Curiam:

This is an appeal by Shannon R.[1] (hereinafter "Appellant") from a final order of the Circuit Court of Hampshire County terminating her parental rights to her three children, Britney, Destiny, and Desarae M.[2] The Appellant appeals that termination order to this Court, alleging that the lower court committed several reversible errors. Upon thorough evaluation of the record, briefs, and arguments of counsel, we reverse the determination of the lower court and remand for one additional improvement period to be conducted in compliance with applicable statutory mandates and consistent with this opinion.

I. Factual and Procedural History

The Appellant and Dwayne M.[3] are the biological parents of Destiny, Britney, and Desarae M. On March 9, 2002, Desarae, then two years of age, was admitted to Hampshire Memorial Hospital in Romney, West Virginia, suffering from anemia and

[1]We follow our past practice in juvenile and domestic relations cases which involve sensitive facts and do not utilize the last names of the parties. See, e.g., West Virginia Dept. of Human Services v. La Rea Ann C.L., 175 W. Va. 330, 332 S.E.2d 632 (1985).

[2]Britney was born on March 20, 1996; Destiny was born on May 28, 1998; and Desarae was born on January 26, 2000.

[3]Dwayne M. is currently incarcerated in Maryland until 2024 for attempted murder and robbery, and we consequently do not address any issues surrounding the termination of his parental rights to these children. While the father has not appealed, and we therefore do not have a complete record regarding the father, it appears that Dwayne M. refused service of process at the prison in which he was incarcerated.

vomiting. She was then transferred to Cumberland Memorial Hospital in Cumberland, Maryland. Examining physicians observed that Desarae had suffered a double fracture of her left leg which had been placed in a cast on March 1, 2002. Desarae also had a bruise on her forehead; a scar between her eyes which resembled the pattern of her leg cast; several bruises on her thighs, knees, back, upper abdomen, and calves; and severe abdominal pain due to a mass in her stomach which resulted from a pancreatic split due to something striking Desarae with blunt force.[4] The Appellant was unable to explain the origin of these wounds, except to state that Desarae had been bouncing on a stair step. Likewise, the mother failed to provide a explanation for the abdominal bruising, except to state that this injury may have occurred at the same time Desarae broke her leg. Moreover, the Appellant's accounts of the injury and who may have witnessed the injury were inconsistent. She first said that only children had witnessed the incident; she later indicated that her boyfriend, Victor, was with the children when the incident occurred. Britney, the oldest child, indicated that both her mother and Victor were home when the incident occurred.

Desarae was subsequently transferred to Ruby Memorial Hospital in Morgantown, West Virginia.[5] She was also transported to Pittsburgh Children's Hospital in [4]Desarae also suffered anemia. Her medical history revealed that she had been prescribed iron drops; however, the Appellant admitted that she had not given the iron drops to Desarae routinely because she thought Desarae was gagging on the drops.

Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, for a period of approximately one week before returning to Ruby Memorial Hospital. Including all four hospitals, Desarae was hospitalized from March 9, 2002, through April 29, 2002.

On March 11, 2002, the Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR") filed an application for emergency custody, alleging imminent danger to all three children. On March 13, 2002, the DHHR filed an Abuse and Neglect Petition requesting that custody of all three children be placed with the DHHR. The DHHR alleged that all three children were "abused and neglected children primarily based upon the unexplained multiple and serious injuries to Desarea and the failure of [the mother] to provide the children with needed medications and supervision." Attorney Joyce Stewart was appointed as guardian ad litem for the children. Attorney Karen Garrett was appointed to represent the Appellant, and Attorney William Keaton was appointed to represent the children's father, Dwayne M.

Psychologist Renee Harris began working with the children in April 2002 and reported that Destiny had indicated that she had been subjected to sexual abuse by the Appellant's boyfriend. Subsequent medical examinations of Destiny and Britney were inconclusive regarding the alleged sexual abuse. On May 2, 2002, the lower court conducted an adjudicatory hearing and received testimony from Child Protective Services Worker Susan Wilt regarding her visit to Desarae at Cumberland Memorial Hospital and subsequent experience in this matter. The lower court also entertained telephonic testimony concerning Desarae's injuries from Dr. Peter Ehrlich, a pediatric surgeon in Morgantown, West Virginia. Dr. Susan Nuber of Cumberland, Maryland, also testified telephonically and explained her findings regarding Desarae's injuries. Both physicians opined that Desarae's injuries were caused by physical abuse rather than accidental means. The Appellant also testified at this hearing, maintaining that neither she nor her boyfriend, Victor, had caused any of Desarae's injuries. At the conclusion of the adjudicatory hearing, the lower court found that Desarae was an abused and neglected child.

During a May 29, 2002, hearing, the lower court granted the Appellant an improvement period[6] and placed goals and requirements for such improvement period on the [6]The guardian ad litem for the children objected to the improvement period based upon the Appellant's continued relationship with Victor and her denial of abuse to Desarae. The guardian ad litem also asserted that the Appellant had not located a permanent place of residence or employment and that service workers had found it difficult to contact the Appellant to schedule services.

record.[7] A formal family case plan, as required by West Virginia Code § 49-6D-3(a) (1984) (Repl. Vol. 2001), was not submitted.

The record reveals multiple areas of difficulty and delay encountered by all parties during the improvement period. One of the most troubling issues is the Appellant's apparent lack of ability to remove herself from the relationship with her boyfriend, Victor. Counsel for the Appellant informed the lower court during the May 29, 2002, hearing that her client had chosen her children over her boyfriend, but economic limitations had made it difficult to remove herself from the home she and Victor shared.

The Appellant also alleges that personnel shortages within DHHR limited her success during her improvement period. She emphasizes an incident in September 2002 in which the children were not transported to the designated visitation site for visitation. The caseworkers had apparently terminated their employment with the DHHR and alternate arrangements had not been made.

The Appellant was initially counseled by Mr. Greg Trainor but was requested by the DHHR to begin counseling with Cindy Hay since Ms. Hay had conducted some [7]Pursuant to these requirements, the Appellant was to become gainfully employed, to visit with the children, to continue parenting classes, to continue individual therapy, to obtain permanent housing, and to continue to participate in in-home services.

parenting classes in which the Appellant had participated. The Appellant asserts that her counseling sessions were limited since the therapist was on vacation from July 15, 2002, through August 5, 2002.

During a September 2002 MDT meeting, the Appellant reported that she had maintained a job for two weeks at a gas station store in Winchester, Virginia. Although the Appellant alleged that she had not seen Victor for a few months, members of Victor's family had allegedly informed the DHHR that Victor had been staying with the Appellant. The DHHR also presented a letter from the Appellant to Victor, written in September 2002, in which she had told Victor that she wanted to have a child with him. The Appellant was also incarcerated in Baltimore City Jail on a warrant for Failure to Appear at a scheduled court hearing.

On December 18, 2002, the lower court conducted a dispositional hearing and heard testimony from the individual counselor providing services to the Appellant, the therapist for the children, a representative from Family Preservation Services, and a caseworker from the DHHR. The evidence revealed that the Appellant was unable to locate steady employment during the improvement period, continued to maintain some degree of relationship with Victor, and failed to follow through with all therapy goals. Guardian ad litem Joyce Stewart, DHHR caseworkers, the therapist for children, and therapist for mother all indicated that termination of parental rights was in best interest of children. The lower court found that, pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(6), there was no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse could be substantially corrected in the near future, and the Appellant's parental rights were terminated to all children by order dated January 29, 2003.

The Appellant appeals the termination of parental rights, alleging that the lower court erred by (1) allowing physicians from Morgantown, West Virginia, and Cumberland, Maryland, to testify at the adjudicatory hearing through a telephonic conference; (2) failing to require the DHHR to prepare an individualized family case plan; (3) erroneously ruling that the conditions of neglect or abuse cannot be corrected; (4) failing to recognize a conflict of interest of a DHHR worker because she had previously worked in the Appellant's home; (5) failing to grant a less restrictive alternative; (6) allowing a psychologist for Britney and Destiny to testify regarding the statements of the children on the issue of sexual abuse; (7) terminating her parental rights to Britney and Destiny despite the absence of an adjudication finding them to be neglected or abused; (8) refusing to permit counsel for the Appellant to argue a motion for return of custody of Britney and Destiny.

II. Standard of Review

In reviewing the proceedings conducted in the lower court and the lower court's resolution of this matter, this Court is guided by the two-prong deferential standard enunciated in syllabus point one of State v. Michael M., 202 W. Va. 350, 504 S.E.2d 177

(1998), as follows: "'When this Court reviews challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, a two-prong deferential standard of review is applied. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard.' Syl. Pt. 1, McCormick v. Allstate Insurance Company, 197 W. Va. 415, 475 S.E.2d 507 (1996)."

III. Discussion

A. Failure to Formulate Family Case Plan

At the outset, our evaluation of this record guides us to the firm conviction that the record of the adjudicatory hearing is totally supportive of the findings of abuse and neglect notwithstanding any deficiency in the circumstances under which the telephonic testimony of the two physicians was received. It is beyond doubt that the children who are the subject of this case are abused and neglected children. Of the multitude of alleged errors asserted by the Appellant, however, our evaluation reveals that the Appellant's most compelling argument is the absence of a statutorily-required family case plan.[8] We therefore proceed to address two significant assignments of error presented by the Appellant because it is apparent from the record that the Appellant is entitled to an additional opportunity to put forth a genuine effort to preserve her parental relationship with these children.

[8]We address only two assignments of error: the absence of the family case plan, upon which we are premising the reversal and remand, and the failure of the lower court to specifically find that Destiny and Britney were abused children. We find no merit to the other assignments of error forwarded by the Appellant and decline to address those issues.

The Appellant alleges, and the State concedes, that a family case plan, as envisioned and mandated by West Virginia Code § 49-6D-3(a), was not formulated in the present case. The State maintains that a list of goals and requirements for the improvement period placed on the record by the lower court satisfied the "spirit," if not the "letter," of the law. We disagree. A formal family case plan, as mandated by West Virginia Code § 49-6D-3(a), is not only for the benefit and information of the parent seeking improvement; it is equally beneficial and necessary for the caseworkers and other assistive personnel. Without a family case plan, the individuals seeking to assist a parent are limited in their ability to formulate distinct goals, methods of achieving such goals, or means by which success will be judged. While we applaud the lower court for attempting to clarify matters by placing specific goals upon the record in open court, such means of clarification could have been used in conjunction with the implementation of a family case plan but should not have been employed to the exclusion thereof.

This Court has repeatedly examined the benefits of a family case plan and the statutory requirement for the family case plan as an important component of an improvement period. See In re Jamie Nicole H., 205 W. Va. 176, 182, 517 S.E.2d 41, 47 (1999)

("Pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6D-3 (1998), a family case plan must be developed by the DHHR and submitted to the circuit court"). In syllabus point five of State ex rel. Department of Human Services v. Cheryl M., 177 W. Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987), we explained that "[t]he purpose of the family case plan as set out in W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3(a) (1984), is to clearly set forth an organized, realistic method of identifying family problems and the logical steps to be used in resolving or lessening these problems." Syllabus point three of Cheryl M. stated: "Under W.Va. Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), when an improvement period is authorized, then the court by order shall require the Department of Human Services to prepare a family case plan pursuant to W.Va. Code, 49-6D-3 (1984)." 177 W. Va. at 688, 356 S.E.2d at 181 (emphasis supplied). Syllabus point four of Cheryl M. continued as follows: "Under W.Va. Code, 49-6D-3 (1984), the Department of Human Services is required to prepare a family case plan with participation by the parties and their counsel and to submit it to the court for approval within thirty days."

In Cheryl M., somewhat similar to the case at bar, the lower court and the Department of Human Services had failed to formulate a family case plan.[9] This Court in Cheryl M. emphasized that a family case plan "is designed to foreclose a natural parent from being placed in an amphorous improvement period where there are no detailed standards by which the improvement steps can be measured." 177 W. Va. at 693-94, 356 S.E.2d at 186-87. The Cheryl M. Court also noted that the family case plan "also provides a meaningful blueprint that the [DHHR] can monitor and which will also give the court specific information to determine whether the terms of the improvement period were met. Without such a plan, a court is then confronted with general testimony as to whether the natural parent has shown the requisite 'improvement.'" 177 W. Va. at 694, 356 S.E.2d at 187.

[9]In Cheryl M., unlike the case at bar, the lower court had also refused to grant an improvement period. This Court in Cheryl M. reversed and remanded based upon the absence of the family case plan and the denial of the improvement period. 177 W. Va. at 695, 356 S.E.2d at 188.

In Cheryl M, this Court provided the following explanation of the improtance of the family case plan:

> The point that bears emphasizing is that under W.Va. Code, 49-6-2(b), the family case plan is triggered when a court orders an improvement period. Here, the court took no formal action to order an improvement period and, as a consequence, there was never any court-approved family case plan as required by W.Va. Code, 49-6D-3(b).
>
> It must be remembered that W.Va. Code, 49-6D-3, is a part of a larger enactment known as the West Virginia Child Protective Services Act (CPSA), W.Va. Code, 49-6D-1, et seq. Its purpose and intent are set out in W.Va. Code, 49-6D-2, which emphasizes that "the intention of the legislature [is] to provide for the removal of a child from the custody of the child's parents only when the child's welfare cannot be otherwise adequately safeguarded." (Emphasis added).

177 W. Va. at 694, 356 S.E.2d at 187.

This Court in Cheryl M. also addressed the issue of rigorous compliance with statutory mandates and quoted the following language from a Connecticut case, In re Juvenile Appeal, 420 A.2d 875 (Conn. 1979):

> Insistence upon strict compliance with the statutory criteria before termination of parental rights and subsequent adoption proceedings can occur is not inconsistent with concern for the best interests of the child. Rather, it enhances the child's best interests by promoting autonomous families and by reducing the dangers of arbitrary and biased decisions amounting to state intrusion disguised under the rubric of the child's 'best interests.'

420 A.2d at 886-87. We also explained as follows in syllabus point four of In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991):

> In formulating the improvement period and family case plans, courts and social service workers should cooperate to provide a workable approach for the resolution of family problems which have prevented the child or children from receiving appropriate care from their parents. The formulation of the improvement period and family case plans should therefore be a consolidated, multi-disciplinary effort among the court system, the parents, attorneys, social service agencies, and any other helping personnel involved in assisting the family.

Id. at 616, 408 S.E.2d at 368. We further explained as follows in Carlita B.:

> The goal [of improvement periods and case plans] should be the development of a program designed to assist the parent(s) in dealing with any problems which interfere with his ability to be an effective parent and to foster an improved relationship between parent and child with an eventual restoration of full parental rights a hoped-for result. The improvement period and family case plans must establish specific measures for the achievement of these goals, as an improvement period must be more than a mere passage of time. It is a period in which the

> D.H.S. and the court should attempt to facilitate the parent's success, but wherein the parent must understand that he bears a responsibility to demonstrate sufficient progress and improvement to justify return to him of the child.

Id. at 625, 408 S.E.2d at 377.

The record in this case indicated that extreme cruelty was inflicted upon Desarae. Despite the egregiousness of these accusations, however, once the lower court grants an improvement period, certain procedural requirements have to be followed. It is very tempting to circumvent the statutory requirement by focusing upon the severity of abuse, the absence of clear indication that the mother is capable of improvement even given a concise family case plan, or the recalcitrance of the mother in removing herself from the relationship with the alleged abuser. Indeed, these are compelling arguments. The fact remains, however, that the Legislature has set forth certain requirements, explained in detail in the statutes, for the proper conduct of an improvement period during an abuse and neglect proceeding. A pre-eminent factor is the preparation and adoption of a family case plan.

One of the purposes served by such a family case plan is the identification not only of goals but of specific means of measuring progress or the lack of progress toward those goals. A properly prepared and implemented family case plan provides the parent or parents, the DHHR, and the court with a means of measuring progress and effort, of dealing promptly with failure to provide or avail oneself of services, or in the best of circumstances, of documenting successful completion of an improvement effort. By contrast, a mere recital of goals, as included on the record in this case, may lead, as it has here, to conflicting testimony about which, if any, goals were met or the degree to which such goals were met. It may also lead to uncertainty regarding whether the failure to achieve one or more of the goals arises from mere obstinacy, the lack of or interruption of services to the family, or some other cause or circumstances.

This Court concludes that we cannot overlook the requirement of a family case plan in this case where it is crystal clear that none was prepared and there is substantial evidence that oversight of the family's progress was simply non-existent during the weeks in which there were no DHHR caseworkers available to monitor that progress. Moreover, we believe it inappropriate to overlook the absence of a family case plan in this case, lest courts, workers, and families who strive to meet designated requirements and work through such plans come to view such plans as optional rather than the mandatory tools our statute envisions.

Based upon the foregoing, we find that the lower court committed reversible error in failing to require a family case plan as mandated by West Virginia Code § 49-6D-3. In an effort to formulate an appropriate remedy for this error, we instruct the lower court, on remand, to grant one final six-month improvement period to the Appellant. Such improvement period shall include the formulation and implementation of a family case plan.

While we require a new improvement period in lieu of the one previously awarded, we heartily endorse the past efforts of the lower court to require strict compliance by the Appellant with the factors which the lower court deemed to be critically important to the Appellant's success. Accordingly, notwithstanding our grant of a new improvement period, the Appellant must be aware that this is essentially a last opportunity. The circuit court retains discretion to terminate the new improvement period and enter an order terminating the Appellant's parental rights to all three children if, at any time during such improvement period, the lower court finds that (1) the Appellant has resumed a relationship with Victor M. (2) has failed to provide permanent housing for the children, or (3) has failed to maintain steady employment.

While we do not anticipate that a family case plan would include a provision for immediate reunification, we caution that based upon the length of separation between the mother and children, the family case plan, as well as any subsequent reunification plan, must provide for the gradual development of parental contacts with the children at a pace and in circumstances specifically reviewed and approved by the trial court. In a later section of this opinion, we address the question of reunification at the conclusion of the improvement period, if such reunification is deemed appropriate by the lower court. We leave it to the discretion of the lower court to assure that any contacts during the improvement period are developed in a gradual and orderly manner to minimize the trauma to the children. Finally, at the conclusion of the improvement period, the circuit court must make such dispositional order as it deems appropriate under its findings of fact and conclusions of law then found and determined.

B. Termination of Rights to Britney and Destiny

The Appellant assigns error to the lower court's termination of parental rights to Britney and Destiny without an explicit finding of abuse and neglect of these children in the adjudicatory order. While the favorable practice would be to place an explicit explanation for this action on the record, we do not find reversible error in this matter. The statutory basis for the lower court's termination of parental rights to Britney and Destiny is solid and indisputable. In syllabus point two of In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995), this Court held as follows: "Where there is clear and convincing evidence that a child has suffered physical and/or sexual abuse while in the custody of his or her parent(s), guardian, or custodian, another child residing in the home when the abuse took place who is not a direct victim of the physical and/or sexual abuse but is at risk of being abused is an abused child under W.Va. Code, 49-1-3(a) (1994)." West Virginia Code § 49-1-3(a) (1994) (Repl. Vol. 2001) states as follows:

> "Abused child" means a child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by:
>
> (1) A parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home; or

(2) Sexual abuse or sexual exploitation[.]

We explained as follows in Christina:

> We find that the language of the statute is clear on its face. The West Virginia Legislature plainly articulated its intention that "an 'abused child' means a child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by" the abuse inflicted upon "another child in the home." Under the statute, there need not be a showing by the Department that each child in the home is directly abused, either sexually or physically, before termination of parental rights is sought.

194 W. Va. at 452, 460 S.E.2d at 697-98 (footnote omitted).

C. Subsequent Reunification of the Family, If Deemed Appropriate

If the Appellant satisfies the requirements of the improvement period, including both the requirements set forth above and additional requirements implemented in the family case plan, and the lower court determines that reunification of the family is appropriate, such reunification should be accomplished through a gradual, orderly plan of transition. As this Court explained in syllabus point three of James M. v. Maynard, 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991):

> It is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians. Lower courts in cases such as these should provide, whenever possible, for a gradual transition period, especially where young children are involved. Further, such gradual transition periods should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment of the children to this change and to maintain as much stability as possible in their lives.

If, however, reunification is not suitable, the lower court should consider the possibility of post-termination sibling contact, as explained in syllabus point four of James M., as follows: "In cases where there is a termination of parental rights, the circuit court should consider whether continued association with siblings in other placements is in the child's best interests, and if such continued association is in such child's best interests, the court should enter an appropriate order to preserve the rights of siblings to continued contact."

IV. Conclusion

Based upon the foregoing reasoning, we reverse the termination of parental rights ordered by the lower court and remand for the implementation of a final six-month improvement period, with conditions as outlined above. As this Court explained in syllabus point six of Carlita B.,

> At the conclusion of the improvement period, the court shall review the performance of the parents in attempting to attain the goals of the improvement period and shall, in the court's discretion, determine whether the conditions of the improvement period have been satisfied and whether sufficient improvement has been made in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child.

185 W. Va. at 616, 408 S.E.2d at 368. If the Appellant fails to comply with the required conditions, the lower court shall immediately conclude the improvement period and make such further order as it deems appropriate, which may include an order that the Appellant's parental rights to all three children be terminated.

Reversed and Remanded with Directions.

SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS
OF WEST VIRGINIA

Davis, J., concurring, in part, and dissenting, in part:

I agree with the majority's decision insofar as it concluded that family case plans are an integral and necessary part of a parent's improvement period in abuse and neglect cases. However, I dissent from the majority's ultimate conclusion that the failure to develop a formal family case plan in this case was reversible error insofar as the conditions of the appellant mother's improvement period were clearly communicated to her; she nevertheless failed to achieve those goals; and there is no evidence that, during this additional improvement period, she will be likely to successfully correct the conditions of abuse and neglect with which she has been charged.[1]

I am most troubled, however, by the potentially devastating effect that the majority's Opinion will have on the most important parties to this proceeding–the children of the appellant for whose benefit and safety the underlying abuse and neglect proceedings were initiated. Time and again we have reiterated that abuse and neglect cases must be given

We have recognized this need for immediate disposition in an attempt to shield the children subject to such proceedings from the extreme trauma they face when they are first removed from their parents' home, then shuttled to numerous foster placements, and finally are placed into a permanent home or returned to their parents upon the conclusion of such proceedings. See Syl. pt. 3, in part, *James M. v. Had there been any indication that the appellant herein was a fit and suitable mother for her children or that she could correct the conditions of abuse and neglect with which she has been charged, I would wholeheartedly agree with the majority's attempt to protect and preserve her parental rights. See Syl. pt. 6, State ex rel. Jeanette H. v. Pancake, 207 W. Sadly, though, such evidence is not before us, and the majority has even conceded that "the record of the adjudicatory hearing is totally supportive of the findings of abuse and neglect . . . . It is beyond doubt that the children who are the subject of this case are abused and neglected children." Maj. op. at 8. Despite this recognition, however, the majority has blatantly refused to acknowledge the paramount consideration at issue in this case: the best interests of the appellant's minor children. "Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Mindful of the best interests of Desarae, Destiny, and Britney and the need to provide them with the safe and secure home which they so rightfully deserve, I respectfully dissent from the majority's decision to grant the appellant an additional improvement period. Such an award can serve no purpose other than to prolong the dangerous and uncertain living conditions these three little girls have far too long already endured.

For the foregoing reasons, I respectfully concur, in part, with and dissent, in part, from the Opinion of the Court.

SYLLABUS

"When this Court reviews challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, a two-prong deferential standard of review is applied. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard." Syllabus Point 1, McCormick v. Allstate Insurance Company, 197 W. Va. 415, 475 S.E.2d 507 (1996).

Per Curiam:

This is an appeal by the guardian ad litem for Destiny Asia H., an infant child, from a decision of the Circuit Court of Cabell County holding that Destiny Asia H. was not a neglected and abandoned child and holding that she should be returned to the custody of her natural mother, Shacara H.[1] The guardian ad litem, on appeal, claims that the evidence shows that Destiny Asia H. was neglected and abandoned and that the circuit court erred in ruling that she was not.

I.
FACTS

The child whose custody is in issue in this case, Destiny Asia H., was born in Florida on February 13, 2001. Shortly after her birth, Destiny's mother, Shacara H., met a lady in Florida named K. T. K. T. was a resident of Huntington, West Virginia, but was visiting her son at the time.

At a certain point, K. T. decided to return to West Virginia and invited Shacara H. and Destiny Asia H. to accompany her.

[1]Actually two petitions for appeal were filed in this matter, one by the guardian ad litem, and one by K. T., the individual who had actual custody of the child at the time of the institution of the original neglect and abandonment proceeding. Since the issues and facts are the same, the Court has treated the two petitions as a single appeal.

Upon arriving in West Virginia, Shacara H. and Destiny Asia H. originally lived with K. T. in K. T.'s home. Eventually, however, they moved out and moved into an apartment. In June 2001, Shacara H. decided to return to Florida. At the time, she told K. T. that she intended to return in about a week and asked if K. T. would care for Destiny Asia H. during her absence. K. T. agreed.[2]

Shacara H. did not return in one week, and, in fact, did not return during the following four months. Over that period of time, although she called K. T. approximately six times, she provided no financial support for Destiny Asia H., and she provided K. T. with no information regarding her whereabouts.

In October 2001, K. T. approached the West Virginia Department of Health of Human Resources to request financial assistance for Destiny Asia H. At the time, she indicated that it would be difficult for her to continue to care for Destiny Asia H. without such assistance.

Based on the information that the whereabouts of Shacara H. were at the time unknown, as well as the fact that she had been absent for approximately four months and had

[2]Before leaving, Shacara H. provided K. T. with a Power of Attorney authorizing her to act in loco parentis. Although the Power of Attorney extended from June 26, 2001, to June 26, 2005, it is clear from the record that the understanding between Shacara H. and K. T. was that Shacara would return in about a week.

failed to provide K. T. with the means of contacting her, the Department of Health and Human Resources on October 29, 2001, filed an abuse and neglect petition alleging that Destiny Asia H. had been neglected and abandoned.

A preliminary hearing was held in the matter on November 5, 2001, and at that hearing, the circuit court ruled that there was probable cause for the taking of Destiny Asia H. The court also scheduled an adjudicatory hearing in the matter for January 14, 2002.

By the time of the adjudicatory hearing, some information regarding the whereabouts of Destiny's mother, Shacara H., had been developed and counsel for Shacara H. moved for a continuance to allow time for Shacara H. to travel from Florida to West Virginia so that she could be heard. The circuit court granted the motion, and the adjudicatory hearing was reset for January 28, 2002.

Shacara H. returned to West Virginia and attended the adjudicatory hearing on January 28, 2002. This was the first time she had returned to West Virginia since leaving in late June 2001. At the hearing, evidence was adduced describing how Shacara H. had met K. T., and how she and Destiny Asia H. had accompanied K. T. to West Virginia.

Additional evidence showed that Shacara H. had only rarely called to check on Destiny Asia H. between June 26 when she left West Virginia, and October 2001, when the neglect petition was filed, and that thereafter she had not called at all. Evidence was also introduced showing that she had not provided any financial support for Destiny Asia H. during the time of Destiny's stay with K. T. The evidence also showed that Destiny Asia H. was four and one-half months old when Shacara H. left for Florida, and that Shacara H. had not seen her for a full seven-month period thereafter.

After reviewing the evidence, the circuit court, while recognizing that Shacara H. had physically left West Virginia and Destiny Asia H., also noted that the child had been left in the care of K. T. who appropriately cared for her and had not neglected or abused her. The court stated: "The evidence before the Court is not sufficient to prove abandonment to any extent. Instead, what happened was a transfer of guardianship." The Court also found that the Department of Health and Human Resources had acted properly in taking custody of Destiny Asia H., but that its actions had been based on miscommunications.

Subsequent to the entry of the final order in the case, information was produced by the State of Florida relating to Shacara H. and her care of Destiny Asia H. in Florida. That information showed that Shacara H. suffers from a mental disability. The information also showed that in May 2001, Destiny Asia H. was hospitalized in Florida due to weight loss, apparently due to malnutrition, and that at that time she had not receive the appropriate shots. Additionally, there is also some suggestion that Shacara H. had been attending, but stopped attending, parenting classes.

In the present proceeding, the guardian ad litem and K. T. claim that the circuit court erred in failing to find Destiny Asia H. neglected and abandoned.

II.
STANDARD OF REVIEW

In In Re: Beth Ann B., 204 W. Va. 424, 513 S.E.2d 472 (1998), this Court indicated that in a child abuse and neglect case the Court employs the two-pronged standard of review set forth in Syllabus Point 1 of McCormick v. Allstate Insurance Company, 197 W. Va. 415, 475 S.E.2d 507 (1996):

> When this Court reviews challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, a two-prong deferential standard of review is applied. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard.

III.
DISCUSSION

For the purposes of child abuse and neglect proceedings, the West Virginia Code defines as neglected child as a child:

> Whose physical or mental health is harmed or threatened by a present refusal, failure or inability of the child's parent, guardian or custodian to supply the child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care or education, when such refusal, failure or inability is not due primarily to a lack of financial means on the part of the parent, guardian or custodian. . . .

W. Va. Code 49-1-3(h)(1)(A).

The facts in the present case show that Shacara H. left Destiny Asia H. temporarily in the custody of K. T. with the understanding that Shacara H. would return in about a week. She failed to return during that time, and, in fact, had not returned some four months later. Thus, the length of her absence before the bringing of the present proceeding was some fifteen to sixteen times what was contemplated when K. T. initially undertook to care for the child.

During the absence, Shacara H. maintained some sporadic contact with K. T. but provided nothing toward the support or care of the child. Eventually, the sporadic contact ceased, and Shacara H. failed to provide K. T. with information as to her whereabouts or as to how she could be contacted.

The circuit court, as has previously been stated, found that Shacara H. did not abandon Destiny Asia H. but transferred her "guardianship." In reviewing the facts presented, the Court believes that those facts show clearly and convincingly that initially Shacara H. did temporarily transfer custody to K. T. who, it appears from the evidence, adequately cared for the child. Thus, the evidence, in this Court's view, supports a finding that in June 2001, when Shacara H. initially returned to Florida, she did not abandon, or neglect, Destiny Asia H., as contemplated by W. Va. Code 49-1-3(h)(1)(A).

The facts also show clearly and convincingly that it was contemplated that the initial transfer was to be for a limited time only, and Shacara's absence extended far beyond her initially anticipated return date. If she had not returned precisely upon the date fixed for her return, but within a reasonable time thereafter, in the Court's view, there would be a factual question as to whether she had abandoned or neglected Destiny Asia H. However, Shacara's lengthy absence in the present case, in this Court's view, extended so far beyond the originally contemplated period as to throw into question her intent to return, her motivation to provide for the care of Destiny Asia H., and Destiny's actual future.

While there may have been an initial custodial arrangement, the evidence shows that that arrangement was to be of limited duration, and after the expiration of the limited period of time, there is no evidence that Shacara H. made any additional arrangement or showed any substantial interest in the welfare of the child. Eventually, she even ceased to contact K. T. or keep K. T. informed of her whereabouts.

Overall, this Court believes that the facts as developed show that Destiny Asia H. was abandoned and neglected, not when Shacara H. initially left for Florida, but when her stay exceeded what was contemplated and when she allowed the thread of potential contact between her and the child's actual care giver to break. Under the circumstances, this Court believes that the circuit court erred in failing to hold that Destiny Asia H. was an abused and neglected child within the meaning of the statute.

For the reasons stated, the judgment of the Circuit Court of Cabell County is reversed, and this case is remanded with directions that the circuit court enter an order granting the petition of the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources.

Reversed and remanded
with directions.

SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS
OF WEST VIRGINIA

Albright, Justice, concurring in part, and dissenting in part:

While I concur with the majority's determination that Destiny should not be returned to her mother (Shacara H.), I must respectfully dissent from the majority's conclusion that the facts establish that Destiny was neglected within the meaning of West Virginia Code § 49-1-3(h)(1) (1999) (Repl.Vol.2001). The statute is clear regarding what conduct amounts to neglect:

> (h)(1) "Neglected child" means a child:
> (A) Whose physical or mental health is harmed or threatened by a present refusal, failure or inability of the child's parent, guardian or custodian to supply the child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care or education, when such refusal, failure or inability is not due primarily to a lack of financial means on the part of the parent, guardian or custodian; or
> (B) Who is presently without necessary food, clothing, shelter, medical care, education or supervision because of the disappearance or absence of the child's parent or custodian[.]

W.Va. Code § 49-1-3(h)(1) (A), (B).

Under these standards, the lower court was correct in determining that Destiny was not a "neglected child." See id. There is no indication in the record that the care Destiny received was inadequate at the time the petition was filed and she was residing with her guardian and custodian K.T., or that she was then without the necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, or medical care. Id. K.T. was presumably taking good care of, or at least adequate care of, Destiny, as the lower court specifically found that "[t]here has been no showing of abuse or neglect on the part of the guardian, Kim T."

In its rush to approve this child's removal from her caretaker's home, the majority has concluded, with little discussion of the law, that Shacara S. abandoned Destiny for purposes of our neglect statutes. See W.Va. Code §§ 49-6-1 to -12 (Repl.Vol.2001). Unfortunately, the term "abandonment" is not defined within the sections of the Code that address abuse and neglect other than for purposes of an emergency taking situation. See W.Va. Code § 49-6-9 (1980) (Repl.Vol.2001) (defining "abandoned" as "without supervision . . . for an unreasonable period of time in light of the child's age and the ability to care for himself or herself in circumstances presenting an immediate threat of serious harm to such child"); cf. W.Va. Code §§ 48-22-102, -306 (2001) (providing definition of abandonment for purposes of adoption law and identifying conduct presumptively constituting abandonment). Given this statutory omission, this Court has on occasion looked to the definition provided in the adoption statutes for guidance in specific cases. See State ex rel. Paul B. v. Hill, 201 W.Va. 248, 496 S.E.2d 198 (1997) (involving issue of whether voluntary relinquishment of parental rights incident to adoption placement could constitute abandonment for abuse and neglect purposes). That definition identifies as abandonment "any conduct . . . that demonstrates a settled purpose to forego all duties and relinquish all parental claims to the child." W.Va. Code § 48-22-102.

Based on the mother's execution of a Power of Attorney and, apparently, the intermittent, albeit limited, contact that Shacara S. had with Destiny during the months she resided in Florida, the trial judge viewed the evidence in this case as not rising to the level of abandonment. While enunciating the proper standard for reversing the lower court's finding of fact, the majority fails to state that the lower court was clearly erroneous in its determination regarding the issue of abandonment.[1] Interestingly, the majority suggests that

[1]This case aptly illustrates the point made by Justice Starcher, who joins in this concurrence and dissent, in State of West Virginia v. Julie G., 201 W.Va. 764, 500 S.E.2d 877 (1997), when he observed how a double standard appears at times to exist with regard to the level of deference this Court gives to circuit court decisions regarding neglect findings:

> When circuit judges determine that a child is neglected, or that parental rights be terminated, the decisions of this court often (and in my view quite properly) state that in these difficult cases we must give deference to the circuit court's perception and weighing of the evidence. Why? Because the judges see the people involved. The judges get a sense and feel of the situation and can size it up. Is this parent well-meaning and trying? Could the parent, with enough support, do a decent job? Look at the child – is it really fair to say that the child is neglected? Is it really fair to say that the parent is an abuser? Is it fair to separate a child from a parent, even when limited parenting skills are obvious? It's a tough call to make such determinations, and I think that it's a call that requires a face-to-face look at the people involved, to be done well.
> But when circuit judges say – based on the same sorts of assessments – that a child should not be found to be neglected, or factual issues arose regarding "her [Shacara H.'s] intent to return, her motivation to provide for the care of Destiny . . . and Destiny's actual future." Rather, than remanding for a determination of those issues, however, this Court summarily concluded that abandonment had occurred.

The facts of this case demonstrate, as the lower court noted in its order,[2] that the statutes at issue do not expressly provide a method for dealing with the situation that was presented below. Certainly, the issues presented in the instant case demonstrate a flaw inherent to the system for providing financial assistance to care givers. Apparently, the DHHR determined that it could not provide K.T. any financial assistance in the care of the child, but could provide such financial assistance if the child were placed with other persons selected by > that parental rights should not be terminated, that the court should give the parent-child relationship another chance – then I sense that our decisions too often tend to find reasons why we shouldn't defer to or trust the circuit judge's judgment.

Id. at 775, 500 S.E.2d at 888.

In this case, the majority simply discarded the lower court's determination that Destiny had not been neglected under our law to expedite the process under which DHHR could obtain legal custody of the child. Engaging in statutory "end runs," such as that employed by the majority in this case to obtain the specific result of removing a child from his or her home, especially where no statutory basis for the removal exists, can only serve to harm both the child in the short term and the judicial system in the long run.

[2]The lower court observed: "There is some confusion as to how to proceed in matters such as this. When someone asks, a petition o[f] abuse and neglect may be the only option, or the only way to handle a situation [such as that presented here by the guardian's request for financial assistance]."

the DHHR who were perfect strangers to this little child.

What the majority overlooks in its rush to rubberstamp Destiny's removal from the only continuous care givers she had known at the time the petition was filed,[3] is the critical issue of the child's psychological and emotional attachment to K.T. This Court has long advised the DHHR and the courts dealing with these matters that children cannot be plucked from one home environment, absent emergency situations that were not present here, without due consideration of the effects on the child and the child's attachment to caretakers and siblings. See In re Brian D., 194 W.Va. 623, 638, 461 S.E.2d 129, 144 (1995) (recognizing that "a child has a right to continued association with those to whom he has formed an emotional bond") (citing Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W.Va. 448, 452-53, 388 S.E.2d 322, 325-26 (1989)). Yet, in this case, the child was apparently removed from K.T.'s home with little concern for these important issues that play an undeniably pivotal role in the child's formation as an individual.

Further troubling is the majority's use of a validly executed document transferring physical custody of Destiny to a guardian, ostensibly prepared not for the purpose of abandoning the child, but to secure the child's attainment of proper medical care, if necessary, and to alleviate any question of K.T.'s legal right to have Destiny in her physical custody. While the majority makes clear in its opinion that this document on its own was not evidence of Sharcara H.'s intent to abandon Destiny, my concern is that the decision will perhaps be relied upon to obtain rulings of abandonment, possibly without the proper statutory basis, rather than forcing the DHHR to go through the requisite statutory steps of proving that a child was in actuality "abused" or "neglected" within the statutory scheme established by the Legislature. See W.Va. Code §§ 49-6-1 to -12.

When the facts of this case are fairly examined, one is left with a definite sense that the DHHR has managed to obtain legal custody of Destiny with no proper showing that the child was "abused" or "neglected" under our law. See W.Va. Code § 49-1-3. Any conclusion that the mother in this instance never intended to return and reclaim her child amounts to rank speculation on the record before us. In my judgment, it is simply wrong for this Court to sanction, even indirectly, a finding of abandonment that is grounded in fact on the proper exercise by the mother of her legal right and duty to provide for the care of her minor child during an anticipated absence, especially in light of the fact that there were no findings of improper care related to the guardian's (or custodian's) physical custody of the child.[4] Obviously, if actual evidence of neglect had been present, this would be an open and shut case.

[4]A "benefit" to the DHHR that obtains when a child is removed from a home based on abandonment is that the agency does not have to "make reasonable efforts" to preserve the family unit for temporary custody purposes. See W.Va. Code § 49-6-3(d).

Paradoxically, the child was removed from the home of the only care givers she knew based primarily on the care givers's professed need of financial assistance and yet, the statutory definition of a "neglected child" expressly excludes a determination of neglect based on "lack of financial means on the part of the parent, guardian or custodian." W.Va. Code § 49-1-3(h)(1)(A).

My final concern involves the manner in which the majority grants relief to the DHHR. Typically, in a case where the underlying decision of the circuit court included a finding of no abuse and/or neglect, and this Court determined that a reversal of such decision was warranted, the matter would be remanded with specific instructions that the lower court enter an order adjudicating the child to be abused and/or neglected. The majority opinion lacks any such direction. This is of concern as this Court cannot sua sponte make such a factual finding. Also missing from the relief delineated in the majority opinion is any direction for the circuit court, upon its entry of a finding of neglect, to proceed to the dispositional phase of such litigation. See W.Va. Code § 49-6-5. As we observed in In re Travis W., 206 W.Va. 478, 525 S.E.2d 669 (1999), "neither this Court nor circuit courts can simply ignore mandatory procedural requirements." Id. at 486, 525 S.E.2d at 677.

I am authorized to state that Justice Starcher joins in this concurring and dissenting opinion.

The Opinion of the Court was delivered PER CURIAM.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Prohibition is available to abused and/or neglected children to restrain courts from granting improvement periods of a greater extent and duration than permitted under West Virginia Code §§ 49–6–2(b) and 49–6–5(c) (1995)." Syllabus Point 2, State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W.Va. 251, 470 S.E.2d 205 (1996).

2. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syllabus Point 1, In the Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

Per curiam:

The West Virginia Department of Health and Human Services, Bureau for Children and Families ("DHHR"), and the Guardian ad Litem ("GAL") of four infant children, E.P., K.P., L.P., III, and N.P. ("infant children") jointly seek a writ of prohibition. They ask this Court to prohibit the enforcement of the circuit court's order granting each of the respondent parents, S.P., and L.P., Jr., a six month post-adjudication improvement period (collectively referred to as "improvement period").

In the petition the DHHR and GAL endeavor to convey a sense of "urgency" for this Court to rule on the requested writ. However, ninety-seven days passed between the date of the circuit court's order granting the improvement period and the date that the petition for a writ of prohibition was filed with this Court. Stated differently, the improvement period was more than half over before the writ was filed. No satisfactory explanation for this delay was offered by the petitioners.

Having fully considered the record, the petition for a writ of prohibition is denied.

I. Factual Background

In the abuse and neglect action below the respondent parents filed stipulated admissions "that they had neglected their children by failing to maintain their home in a safe and sanitary condition, and by failing to provide their children with adequate supervision." The circuit court accepted the stipulations and adjudicated that the parents had neglected their children. The parents then moved for a post-adjudication improvement period, stating that with help and assistance they believed they could become better parents and eventually be reunited with their children.

The DHHR and GAL objected, arguing that the parents had been provided every service that the DHHR had to offer during a pre-adjudication improvement period and, despite those efforts, they remained unable to provide for the health, safety and well-being of their children. The DHHR and GAL indicated a preference for termination of parental rights and placement of the children for adoption.[1]

The circuit court held a hearing on the parents' motion. During the hearing the parents introduced evidence that they had successfully completed a substance abuse program after the neglect action was filed. The mother's substance abuse therapist testified that the mother not only complied with all that was required of her, but that she "went beyond what was required to successfully complete" the program. It was the therapist's opinion that the mother's "attitude and willingness . . . showed . . . that her probability of doing well, [were she] given that opportunity for some added time, [is] higher than average." The therapist described that the mother had been helped with self-esteem issues, which included making her aware that it was not a bad thing "to reach out to access some of the services that folks need[,] whether it's mental health issues or community service issues[.]" The therapist also testified that the mother "refused to allow individuals over to her home because they had alcohol," and that she was "very impressed with her ability to stand up to set boundaries and not allow folks who were under the influence, or had alcohol or other drugs on them into her home."

The Director of the substance abuse program testified on behalf of the father. This testimony related that the father had also completed a several-week-long substance abuse program. The Director testified that, at the beginning of the program, the father was resistant to the help being offered to him. However, "something finally clicked" and the father began taking advantage of the help being offered to him. On cross-examination by the GAL, the Director explained that while he could not assess the father's parenting abilities, the father had often discussed his children with him. In these discussions the father would talk about not being able to see his children, and "how much he wanted to be a father to his children."

The DHHR and GAL sought to introduce evidence that formed the basis for the abuse and neglect action. They argued that this evidence was relevant to the issue of whether a post-adjudication improvement period should be granted. The circuit court refused to allow the testimony, concluding that the parents had already admitted that they were neglectful parents. The circuit court held that the issue was not whether the parents were neglectful (because by the parents' own admission they were neglectful). Instead, the issue was whether the parents should be given another chance to improve.

In addition, DHHR argued that the parents had not met their pre-adjudication improvement goals despite efforts to help them. The circuit court acknowledged that "[w]hat is in the past may be prologue" of what may occur should the court grant a post-adjudication improvement period. Nevertheless, the parents had "both carried out their burden to show, by clear and convincing evidence, they will fully participate in the improvement period" were the court to grant it. The circuit court further noted that the statutory scheme permitting post-adjudication improvement periods is not a superfluous bagatelle. Instead, this statutory scheme shows the Legislature's intent that a parent's failed effort at a pre-adjudication improvement period does not automatically foreclose further efforts at reunifying the family by giving the parent even more help. The court may allow a post-adjudication improvement period as a final effort to try and save the nuclear family.

At the end of the May 30, 2012, hearing the circuit court orally granted the parents a six month post-adjudication improvement period, and ordered that a plan outlining the parents' goals and responsibilities be completed within thirty days. A written order was entered on June 19, 2012.

Improvement period plans, reflecting the findings of the multidisciplinary treatment team tasked to the parents case, were thereafter filed with the circuit court. These plans described "exactly what the [parents] needed to do to regain custody of the children," and set forth two broad goals that would need to be met: (1) "provide a clean, healthy, and safe living environment" for the children; and (2) "provide a level of parenting that ensures the health, safety and well-being" of the children.

On September 25, 2012, the DHHR and GAL filed with this Court a joint petition seeking a writ of prohibition to bar enforcement of the Circuit Court's June 19, 2012, order. In the petition, the DHHR and GAL argue that the circuit court erred by not allowing evidence of the parents' pre-adjudication neglect, and that the parents failed to meet the requisite legal standards for granting a post-adjudication improvement period.

By order dated November 20, 2012, this Court issued a rule to show cause as to why a writ of prohibition should not be granted.

II. Standard of Review

In Syllabus Point 1 of Crawford v. Taylor, 138 W.Va. 207, 75 S.E.2d 370 (1953), we made clear that a writ of "[p]rohibition lies only to restrain inferior courts from proceeding in causes over which they have no jurisdiction, or, in which, having jurisdiction, they are exceeding their legitimate powers and may not be used as a substitute for writ of error, appeal or certiorari." See also Syllabus Point 2, State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W.Va. 251, 470 S.E.2d 205 (1996) ("Prohibition is available to abused and/or neglected children to restrain courts from granting improvement periods of a greater extent and duration than permitted under West Virginia Code §§ 49–6–2(b) and 49–6–5(c) (1995).").

In Syllabus Point 4 of State ex rel. Hoover v. Berger, 199 W.Va. 12, 483 S.E.2d 12 (1996), we set forth the standard of review for cases where it is alleged that the circuit court exceeded its legitimate powers:

> In determining whether to entertain and issue the writ of prohibition for cases not involving an absence of jurisdiction but only where it is claimed that the lower tribunal exceeded its legitimate powers, this Court will examine five factors: (1) whether the party seeking the writ has no other adequate means, such as direct appeal, to obtain the desired relief; (2) whether the petitioner will be damaged or prejudiced in a way that is not correctable on appeal; (3) whether the lower tribunal's order is > clearly erroneous as a matter of law; (4) whether the lower tribunal's order is an oft repeated error or manifests persistent disregard for either procedural or substantive law; and (5) whether the lower tribunal's order raises new and important problems or issues of law of first impression. These factors are general guidelines that serve as a useful starting point for determining whether a discretionary writ of prohibition should issue. Although all five factors need not be satisfied, it is clear that the third factor, the existence of clear error as a matter of law, should be given substantial weight.

We also made clear that in reviewing the conclusions of law and findings of fact by a circuit court in abuse and neglect cases, we will not overturn a finding simply because we would have decided it differently, and will affirm the finding if it is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirely. See Syllabus Point 1, In the Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

III. Discussion

Post-adjudication improvement periods are permitted by W.Va. Code § 49-6-12(b) [2012] [Supp.2012].[2] In its June 19, 2012, order, the circuit court found that "granting

[2]W.Va. Code § 49-6-12(b) states as follows:

> (b) After finding that a child is an abused or neglected child pursuant to section two of this article, a court may grant a respondent an improvement period of a period not to exceed six months when:
> (1) The respondent files a written motion requesting the improvement period;
> (2) The respondent demonstrates, by clear and convincing

Respondents' motion for a post-adjudicatory improvement period will not jeopardize the health, safety, and well-being" of the infant children, and that the parents had "demonstrated by clear and convincing evidence that they are likely to fully participate in a post-adjudicatory improvement period." The circuit court ordered that the parents be granted a six month improvement period, that a hearing to review the parents' progress be held as required by W.Va. Code § 49-6-12(b)(3),[3] that the DHHR submit an individualized family > evidence, that the respondent is likely to fully participate in the improvement period and the court further makes a finding, on the record, of the terms of the improvement period;

> (3) In the order granting the improvement period, the court (A) orders that a hearing be held to review the matter within sixty days of the granting of the improvement period; or (B) orders that a hearing be held to review the matter within ninety days of the granting of the improvement period and that the department submit a report as to the respondent's progress in the improvement period within sixty days of the order granting the improvement period;
> (4) Since the initiation of the proceeding, the respondent has not previously been granted any improvement period or the respondent demonstrates that since the initial improvement period, the respondent has experienced a substantial change in circumstances. Further, the respondent shall demonstrate that due to that change in circumstances the respondent is likely to fully participate in a further improvement period; and
> (5) The order granting the improvement period requires the department to prepare and submit to the court an individualized family case plan in accordance with the provisions of section three, article six-d of this chapter.

case plan as required by W.Va. Code § 49-6D-3 [2012] [Supp.2012], and that legal and physical custody of the infant children remain with the DHHR.

It is clear that the circuit court had statutory authority to grant a post-adjudication improvement period to the parents. It is also clear that the circuit court properly considered the factors set forth in W.Va. Code § 49-6-12(b) when it approved the parents' motion for a post-adjudication improvement period. Therefore, the circuit court had jurisdiction under the statute to grant a post-adjudication improvement period. The more pertinent question is whether the circuit court, having jurisdiction, exceeded its legitimate powers. Syllabus Point 1, in part, Crawford v. Taylor, supra.

While the DHHR and GAL dispute the weight of the evidence introduced by the parents at the May 30, 2012, hearing, and contend that the circuit court erroneously found that the parents had met the required legal standards set forth in W.Va. Code § 49-6-12(b)(2), we do not find the circuit court's findings of fact and conclusions of law to be "clearly erroneous as a matter of law." Syllabus Point 4, in part, State ex rel. Hoover v. Berger, supra. In Syllabus Point 1 of In the Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., supra, Justice Cleckley set forth our standard for determining whether a circuit court's ruling is "clearly erroneous as a matter of law":

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse > and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

(Emphasis added).

Reviewing the circuit court's June 19, 2012, order, and the hearing transcript of May 30, 2012, it is clear that the circuit court took evidence on the parents' motions for a post-adjudication improvement period, and entertained the objections to the motions by the DHHR and GAL. The DHHR and GAL contend that the circuit court erred by not permitting them to introduce additional evidence of the failed pre-adjudication improvement periods or the parents' neglect. We agree with the circuit court's conclusion that the proffered evidence was already known to the court—the parents admitted that they had been neglectful and were adjudicated as such following failed efforts to help them become better parents.

The circuit court indicated to the parties that it was not focusing on past events, but whether circumstances had changed showing that the parents would now fully participate in a post-adjudication improvement period. The fact that the parents had been neglectful was not a fact in dispute. Neither was it in dispute that the DHHR had made prior efforts to assist the parents, and that those efforts had not been successful. The proffered value of the excluded testimony would not have been helpful to the circuit court in making its decision—the evidence was already known and part of the record.

In the case sub judice the circuit court was intimately familiar with the facts of the abuse and neglect case against the parents. That familiarity was likely to give the circuit court a feel for the case that is not readily apparent from the sterile record that is before this Court. This may include such subtleties as the demeanor of the parents—were they earnest in their requests? Was there an impression that they would really try this time? The circuit court took evidence, heard the parties' objections, and made findings and a ruling that it believed to be in the best interest of the infant children. These actions were within the circuit court's discretion and requirements of applicable law. It is not for this Court to reverse that decision simply because we may have decided the case differently. Syllabus Point 1, In the Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., supra.

IV. Conclusion

The petitioners have failed to demonstrate that the circuit court lacked jurisdiction to grant the parents a six month post-adjudication improvement period, or that the circuit court exceeded its legitimate powers in granting the same. Accordingly, the petition for a writ of prohibition is denied.

Writ denied.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "In determining whether to entertain and issue the writ of prohibition for cases not involving an absence of jurisdiction but only where it is claimed that the lower tribunal exceeded its legitimate powers, this Court will examine five factors: (1) whether the party seeking the writ has no other adequate means, such as direct appeal, to obtain the desired relief; (2) whether the petitioner will be damaged or prejudiced in a way that is not correctable on appeal; (3) whether the lower tribunal's order is clearly erroneous as a matter of law; (4) whether the lower tribunal's order is an oft repeated error or manifests persistent disregard for either procedural or substantive law; and (5) whether the lower tribunal's order raises new and important problems or issues of law of first impression. Syllabus Point 4, State ex rel. Hoover v. Berger, 199 W.Va. 12, 483 S.E.2d 12 (1996).

2. "Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syllabus Point 3, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996).

3. "At the conclusion of the improvement period, the court shall review the performance of the parents in attempting to attain the goals of the improvement period and shall, in the court's discretion, determine whether the conditions of the improvement period have been satisfied and whether sufficient improvement has been made in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child." Syllabus Point 6, In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

Per Curiam:

In these consolidated matters, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter DHHR) and the guardian ad litem for Lawrence A.[1], a 19-month-old infant, invoke this Court's original jurisdiction seeking a writ of prohibition to halt the enforcement of two orders entered by the Honorable John C. Yoder, Judge of the Circuit Court of Berkeley County. These two orders direct the DHHR to return custody of Lawrence A. to his mother, Crystal W., and grant her a dispositional improvement period. The petitioners argue that Judge Yoder's findings in these two orders are clearly erroneous and contrary to the evidence presented to the circuit court. The petitioners contend that returning custody of Lawrence to his mother is not in the child's best interest because of her continued association with an individual involved in illegal drug activity. The petitioners also cite numerous instances in which Crystal W. committed perjury while testifying before the circuit court and argue that Judge Yoder committed clear error by relying on her testimony.

After thoroughly reviewing these two matters, we conclude that the two orders issued by Judge Yoder are in excess of the circuit court's jurisdiction and are not in the best interest of Lawrence A. We therefore grant the requested writ of prohibition.

I.
Facts & Background

Lawrence A. was born on January 22, 2009. Three days later, a referral was made to Child Protective Services (hereinafter CPS) after Lawrence tested positive for amphetamines, cocaine and opiates. CPS subsequently interviewed Lawrence's mother, Crystal W., who admitted to smoking crack cocaine and using heroin during her pregnancy. On January 26, 2009, CPS initiated an in-home safety plan requiring Crystal and Lawrence's father, James A., who lived together, to refrain from using illegal drugs, submit to random drug testing, and attend Narcotics Anonymous meetings three times a week.

Approximately two months after entering into the in-home safety plan, James and Crystal tested positive for cocaine. Thereafter, Crystal admitted that she and James used cocaine together and did not attend any Narcotics Anonymous meetings as required by the in-home safety plan. Following the positive drug test and interview with Crystal, the DHHR filed an abuse and neglect petition against Crystal and James, alleging that their child, Lawrence, was in imminent danger due to their continuing drug use. By order entered March 26, 2009, the circuit court removed the child from the family residence and awarded temporary custody to the DHHR. On May 21, 2009, the circuit court found that Crystal and James abused and neglected Lawrence and granted both of them post-adjudicatory improvement periods. These improvement periods required Crystal and James to comply with a number of conditions including:

> James A. and Crystal W. may not have contact with anyone involved in illegal activities and he/she may not participate in any illegal activities of any kind during his/her improvement period.

(Emphasis added).

From June through September of 2009, James and Crystal seemingly complied with the terms of their improvement periods. Based on their compliance, the DHHR asked the circuit court to return custody of Lawrence to his parents for a trial reunification period, which Judge Yoder granted by order dated September 28, 2009. Approximately one month after Lawrence was returned to his parents, the Eastern Panhandle Drug and Violent Crimes Task Force executed a raid on James and Crystal's residence, 226 Avondale Road. The task force seized crack cocaine from the residence that was hidden behind a fire alarm in the kitchen, as well as $500 in cash, two flat screen high-definition televisions and a printer. The task force found $300 in a jewelry box that belonged to Crystal. This $300 was identified by serial number as money the task force provided to a confidential informant to make a controlled drug purchase at 226 Avondale Road.

Following the task force raid, James A. was arrested and charged with distributing crack cocaine in violation of W.Va. Code, § 60A-4-401 [2005].[2] After learning about the task force raid at 226 Avondale Road, the DHHR removed Lawrence from the residence and the guardian ad litem filed a motion to revoke Crystal and James' improvement periods. Two weeks after the task force raid, Crystal filed a motion for the return of physical custody of Lawrence, arguing that she had complied with the terms of her improvement period, was unaware that James was engaging in criminal activity in the family residence, and "is no longer living with (James) nor continuing a relationship with him." (Emphasis added). The circuit court held evidentiary hearings on February 18, 2010, and March 24, 2010, to consider the guardian ad litem's motion to revoke Crystal and James' improvement periods and Crystal's motion to return physical custody of Lawrence to her.

[2]These charges were subsequently dismissed in anticipation of federal drug charges being brought against him.

At the February 18, 2010, hearing, Crystal testified that she was a recovering crack cocaine addict and had previously sold crack[3], but was unaware of any illegal drug activity that was taking place at her residence in October 2009. She also stated that the $300 that was seized from her jewelry box was money she made from selling promotional candy through her job at Walgreens Pharmacy and offered the following explanation why she was in possession of the marked bills:

> I asked James the night before when the door got kicked in to switch me out on the small bills to bigger bills, like I said, my savings. I always want bigger money and not just like twenties and fives and tens.

[3]Q. And tell us why you're familiar with crack cocaine?

A. Because I am a recovering addict.

Q. And isn't it true you also sold crack cocaine?

A. Yeah, but I never got charged for that. I got charged – I pled guilty to possession of a controlled substance.

Crystal testified that she has had no contact with James since the October 30, 2009, task force raid because associating with someone involved in illegal drug activity is "not safe for my son." Crystal was asked a second time whether she had any contact with James since October 30, 2009, and stated that she had not seen or spoken to him at all, other than occasionally seeing him in court, "because after Lawrence was taken again I decided that it would be better off not to have him (James) involved in my life at this moment."

Following Crystal's testimony, the circuit court continued the hearing until March 24, 2010. Crystal was called at the beginning of the March hearing and asked if she wanted to change or clarify any of her testimony from the February hearing. She replied:

> Well, now that you bring that up, I guess on March 3rd – my lawyer approached me with some new evidence. On March 3rd James and I were seen at the Roc's Shell in Charles Town I believe. We were resolving some property issues and matters that we had with where his property was going to go, I mean, and some of his dog kennel stuff that he's left at the trailer.
> And we were resolving that and he helped me with gas. He ended up there. So we went to the Shell to fill up the tank. I'm finalizing that. Thank you for giving me the opportunity to bring that to light.

Crystal and James were observed at the gas station by Kimberley Crockett, counsel for the DHHR. A video of this meeting was taken[4] and provided to Crystal's attorney prior to the March 24, 2010, hearing. Crystal stated that this gas station meeting was the only time she had seen James since the October 30, 2009, task force raid. She also reiterated the reason she ended her relationship with James was because he was involved in dealing crack cocaine, which she acknowledged is a dangerous and illegal activity.

James A. testified after Crystal and stated that he had been back at 226 Avondale Road on a number of occasions since October 30, 2009. He testified that he went there when Crystal was at work and said that he had a key to the residence until January 2010. When asked about the task force raid on October 30, 2009, and whether he had taken part in illegal drug activity at the family residence, James A. invoked his Fifth Amendment Rights and declined to answer questions relating to the raid and his subsequent arrest.

West Virginia State Trooper Brian Bean, who was a member of the task force that raided 226 Avondale Road on October 30, 2009, testified that Crystal could face a federal charge in connection with the drug activity that occurred at her residence. When asked specifically what charges Crystal could face, Trooper Bean replied:

> Aiding and abetting, possibly what's commonly referred to as the crack house statute which is the federal statute that deals with maintaining a residence and allowing controlled substances to be sold from it.[5]

The guardian ad litem next called Deputy Thomas Funk of the Berkeley County Sheriff's Office. Deputy Funk testified that he went to 226 Avondale Road on December 11, 2009, to serve property forfeiture papers on both James and Crystal. James answered the door and accepted service for both he and Crystal. James advised Deputy Funk that Crystal was his girlfriend and that they lived together. This occurred approximately five weeks after the task force raid.

[5] Crystal has not been charged with these crimes in connection with the October 30, 2009, task force raid.

Deputy Funk had another paper to serve on James in January 2010. He again went to 226 Avondale Road and this time Crystal answered the door. Deputy Funk asked Crystal if James was home, she said yes and called to him. James then came to the door and Deputy Funk served him with the papers.

Travis Lutrell was called by the guardian ad litem and testified that he saw Crystal and James together in late January or early February 2010, in a K-Mart parking lot. Mr. Lutrell stated that he got into an argument with Crystal in the parking lot because she blamed Mr. Lutrell for losing custody of Lawrence.[6]

The guardian ad litem next called Jimmy Williams, an investigator for the Berkeley County Prosecuting Attorney's Office. Mr. Williams stated that he conducted surveillance on 226 Avondale Road on February 18, 2010, and on March 24, 2010. On both occasions, he observed Crystal and James leaving the residence in different vehicles, approximately fifteen minutes apart, both traveling to the county courthouse for the hearings in this matter.[7]

[6]At an August 10, 2010, forfeiture hearing, West Virginia State Trooper Brian Bean testified that Travis Lutrell was the confidential informant who made the drug purchase from James at 226 Avondale Road on October 30, 2009. During cross-examination at the March 24, 2010, hearing, Mr. Lutrell stated that he was convicted for drug possession in February 2010 and that he was currently taking methadone.

[7]During cross-examination, there was some question as to whether Mr. Williams could (continued...)

Jennifer Foster was the CPS case worker assigned to this case. She testified that the DHHR's official position was that James and Crystal violated the terms of their improvement period. Ms. Foster was asked:

> Q. Okay. What concerns do you have about the fact that we've heard testimony from witness after witness that she's (Crystal) continued to have contact with him (James) after learning about this, after the raid occurred?
>
> A. Well, it's very concerning because she's maintained that she wants her child back and yet she's participating in something that could be unsafe by maintaining a relationship, plus she's lied to the Department. So, there's lack of truth and putting positively identify James A. as the man who exited 226 Avondale Road on February 18, 2010. Mr. Williams stated that the African-American male who exited 226 Avondale Road was wearing the same clothes that James A. had on in court that morning. The guardian ad litem asked Mr. Williams:

> Q. Okay. And you feel fairly certain, well, you've testified so I assume you are certain that the gentleman that you saw on February 18th leave the house, come in here to the van, come into the courtroom was the same gentleman from point A at Avondale Road to the courthouse, correct?

> Q. Okay. Do you have any doubt that it's James A. this morning (March 24, 2010)? You've testified about him wearing the same clothes?

> Q. So you're sure that it's James A. today?

> herself at risk regarding her own sobriety and interacting with someone who as she said, you know, risked her losing her child for an illegal activity.

Following Ms. Foster's testimony, Crystal was again called to testify and asked about the discrepancies in her testimony. Crystal admitted that she lied to the court at both the February 18th and March 24th hearings. She admitted that she had maintained contact with James after the October 30, 2009, task force raid, explaining that he came to 226 Avondale Road from time to time to check on his pit bull dogs.[8] Crystal admitted that James was at the residence when Mr. Williams came to serve the forfeiture papers in January 2010. Crystal admitted that James was at the residence with her on the morning of February 18, 2010, before the court hearing in this matter, the same hearing in which she denied having seen James at all since the October 30, 2009, task force raid. When asked about being seen at the gas station, counsel asked Crystal:

> Q. The reason you did that (admitted you met with James there) is that Ms. Crockett caught you and we have a video, is that true?
>
> A. Is it? I think it might be true.
>
> Q. So you don't tell the truth do you?
>
> A. I haven't been completely honest, no.

[8] James A. operated a pit bull kennel at 226 Avondale Road.

Crystal also initially denied that she had seen Travis Lutrell in the K-Mart parking lot, but later confirmed that she did see him and that she did get into an argument with him there.

At the conclusion of the March 24, 2010, hearing, Judge Yoder asked the parties to submit proposed findings of facts and conclusions of law. By order dated June 18, 2010, Judge Yoder denied the guardian ad litem's motion to revoke Crystal's improvement period and granted Crystal's motion to return custody of Lawrence to her. The DHHR filed a motion to reconsider and reverse this order, which Judge Yoder denied on July 22, 2010. The circuit court subsequently entered an order, on July 27, 2010, granting Crystal a dispositional improvement period over the objection of the DHHR and the guardian ad litem.

On August 12, 2010, the DHHR and Lawrence A.'s guardian ad litem filed separate petitions for writs of prohibition with this Court, seeking to halt enforcement of the June 18, 2010, and July 27, 2010, orders from the circuit court. The petitions requested that we issue a rule to show cause against Judge Yoder. On September 22, 2010, we entered an order commanding the respondents to show cause why a writ of prohibition should not be awarded against Judge Yoder.

II.
Standard of Review

"The writ of prohibition will issue only in clear cases, where the inferior tribunal is proceeding without, or in excess of, jurisdiction." Syllabus, State ex rel. Vineyard

v. O'Brien, 100 W.Va. 163, 130 S.E. 111 (1925). See also Syllabus Point 1, Crawford v. Taylor, 138 W.Va. 207, 75 S.E.2d 370 (1953) ("Prohibition lies only to restrain inferior courts from proceeding in causes over which they have no jurisdiction, or, in which, having jurisdiction, they are exceeding their legitimate powers and may not be used as a substitute for writ of error, appeal or certiorari."); Syllabus Point 2, State ex rel. Peacher v. Sencindiver, 160 W.Va. 314, 233 S.E.2d 425 (1977) ("A writ of prohibition will not issue to prevent a simple abuse of discretion by a trial court. It will only issue where the trial court has no jurisdiction or having such jurisdiction exceeds its legitimate powers. W.Va. Code 53-1-1.").

In Syllabus Point 4 of State ex rel. Hoover v. Berger, 199 W.Va. 12, 483 S.E.2d 12 (1996), we set forth the following standard for issuance of a writ of prohibition when it is alleged a lower court is exceeding its authority:

> In determining whether to entertain and issue the writ of prohibition for cases not involving an absence of jurisdiction but only where it is claimed that the lower tribunal exceeded its legitimate powers, this Court will examine five factors: (1) whether the party seeking the writ has no other adequate means, such as direct appeal, to obtain the desired relief; (2) whether the petitioner will be damaged or prejudiced in a way that is not correctable on appeal; (3) whether the lower tribunal's order is clearly erroneous as a matter of law; (4) whether the lower tribunal's order is an oft repeated error or manifests persistent disregard for either procedural or substantive law; and (5) whether the lower tribunal's order raises new and important problems or issues of law of first impression. These factors are general guidelines that serve as a useful starting point for determining whether a discretionary writ of prohibition should issue. Although all five factors need not be satisfied, it is clear that the third factor, the existence of clear error as a matter of law, should be given substantial weight.

With this standard in mind, we turn to the parties' arguments.

III.
Discussion

The guardian ad litem and the DHHR argue that the circuit court's orders denying the motion to revoke Crystal's improvement period and granting the order returning custody of Lawrence to Crystal are in excess of the circuit court's jurisdiction based upon the evidence presented at the February 18, 2010, and March 24, 2010, hearings.

In this case, as with all abuse and neglect proceedings, "the best interests of the child is the polar star by which decisions must be made which affect children." Michael K.T. v. Tina L.T., 182 W.Va. 399, 405, 387 S.E.2d 866, 872 (1989) (citation omitted). This Court has repeatedly stated that "[a]lthough parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syllabus Point 3, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996).

In the case sub judice, the petitioners contend that the circuit court should have revoked Crystal's improvement period. This Court has explained that "an improvement period in the context of abuse and neglect proceedings is viewed as an opportunity for the miscreant parent to modify his/her behavior so as to correct the conditions of abuse and/or neglect with which he/she has been charged." In re Emily, 208 W.Va. 325, 334, 540 S.E.2d 542, 551 (2000). In Syllabus Point 6 of In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408

S.E.2d 365 (1991), we provided direction on how a court should assess a parent's compliance with an improvement period, stating:

> At the conclusion of the improvement period, the court shall review the performance of the parents in attempting to attain the goals of the improvement period and shall, in the court's discretion, determine whether the conditions of the improvement period have been satisfied and whether sufficient improvement has been made in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child.

In his June 18, 2010, order, Judge Yoder stated that the court did not "look favorably" upon Crystal's "lack of candor and willingness to be forthcoming with information regarding her contact" with James. Judge Yoder determined, however, that Crystal did not lack credibility on all matters. The order goes on to state:

> That (Crystal's) contact with (James), while ill-advised, did not violate the terms of her improvement period, as there was no written provision forbidding contact with (James). Further the Court recognizes that some contact with (James) may have been necessary to divide up communal property and relocate (James') business from the home.

This finding is clearly erroneous. Crystal's motion to return custody of Lawrence to her was based in large part on her contention that following the drug raid, she was "no longer living with (James) nor continuing a relationship with him." (Emphasis added). Crystal testified that she ended her relationship with James following the drug raid because associating with someone involved in illegal drug activity is "not safe for my son." It is undisputed that following the October 30, 2009, drug raid, Crystal was aware that James was involved in illegal drug activity.[9] Crystal's improvement period requires that she "may not have contact with anyone involved in illegal activities." Therefore, if Crystal had contact with James after October 30, 2009, when she was aware that he was involved in illegal activity, she violated the terms of her improvement period.

As discussed at length above, the evidence presented at the March 24, 2010, hearing overwhelmingly supports the DHHR and guardian ad litem's contention that Crystal continued to have a relationship with James after October 30, 2009. James testified that he went to 226 Avondale Road on multiple occasions following the task force raid and that he had a key to the residence until January 2010. Deputy Funk served papers at 226 Avondale Road in December 2009 and January 2010, and James was at the residence on both occasions. Investigator Jimmy Williams observed James and Crystal together at the residence on the mornings of February 18, 2010, and March 24, 2010. On both occasions, they drove to the courthouse in separate vehicles in an apparent attempt to maintain the

[9]At the February 18, 2010, hearing, Crystal testified as follows:

Q. And what part of the relationship with Mr. A.'s not safe?

A. Whatever is illegal that's going on. I mean, anything illegal.

Q. And is it your understanding that illegal activity is drug dealing?

A. Drug dealing is illegal.

Q. And is it your understanding that's what he's alleged to have been involved in?

A. Yes.

appearance that their relationship was over. James and Crystal were also seen together in late January or early February 2010 at a K-Mart parking lot and on March 3, 2010, at a gas station.

This evidence clearly shows that Crystal continued to maintain a relationship with James after the October 30, 2009, task force raid, even though she admitted that maintaining this relationship would be "unsafe for my son." These multiple contacts between Crystal and James far exceeded the minimal contact that would have been necessary to divide up their communal property, and we find it difficult to understand how Judge Yoder arrived at that conclusion.

Consistent with our principle that "the best interests of the child is the polar star by which decisions must be made which affect children," we granted the guardian ad litem's motion to supplement the file and will consider matters that have occurred since Judge Yoder issued his June 18, 2010, and July 27, 2010, orders. One such matter was an August 10, 2010, property forfeiture hearing in the Circuit Court of Berkeley County before the Honorable Gina M. Groh.[10] At this hearing, Crystal was asked whether she continued living with James after the task force raid and she stated, "Yes, we did. Yes, I did. But I did - we are no longer together and I live with my grandfather." Crystal testified that she has lived with her grandfather since June 2010, and was then asked:

[10] Crystal filed a motion to have the $300, two high-definition televisions and printer that the task force seized during the October 30, 2009, raid at 226 Avondale Road returned to her. Judge Groh found that all of these items were gained from illegal drug transactions and were therefore forfeited into the State's possession.

> Q. Okay. And so until that time, were you residing at the Avondale residence?
>
> A. Yes, I was. I was on a lease and so was he (James).
>
> Q. Okay. So the two of you continued to reside together until June (2010) at the Avondale residence?
> A. Yes.

While there was overwhelming evidence presented at the March 2010 hearing that Crystal continued to maintain a relationship with James after October 30, 2009, the above testimony removes any doubt on this issue. We are confident that had Judge Yoder heard this testimony - that Crystal not only maintained a relationship with James, but continued living with him for eight months following the task force raid - he would not have ordered custody of Lawrence returned to Crystal and he would have granted the motion to revoke her improvement period.

Based on all of the foregoing, Judge Yoder's finding that Crystal's contact with James did not violate the terms of her improvement period is clearly erroneous. We find that granting a writ of prohibition to halt enforcement of Judge Yoder's June 18, 2010, and July 27, 2010, orders is necessary to protect Lawrence from imminent danger.

IV.
Conclusion

Crystal continued living with James for eight months after he was arrested and charged with selling crack cocaine out of the residence where their infant son lived. Crystal testified that continuing a relationship with James would be unsafe for her son. We agree with her and accordingly issue the requested writ of prohibition halting the enforcement of Judge Yoder's June 18, 2010, and July 27, 2010, orders returning custody of Lawrence to Crystal and granting her a dispositional improvement period. We further direct Judge Yoder to enter an order granting the DHHR and guardian ad litem's proposed order revoking Crystal's improvement period.

Because the circuit court exceeded its jurisdiction and did not act in the best interest of the child, this writ of prohibition is warranted.

Supreme Court Of Appeals Of West Virginia

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA EX REL. DIVA P., AND THE STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA, Petitioners

v.

HONORABLE TOD J. KAUFMAN, JUDGE OF THE CIRCUIT COURT OF KANAWHA COUNTY, AND SHERRY P., Respondents

No. 23928
Submitted: February 25, 1997
Filed: July 12, 1997

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "'Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.' Syl. Pt. 1, In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996)." Syl. Pt. 1, State ex rel. Virginia M. v. Virgil Eugene S. II, 197 W.Va. 456, 475 S.E.2d 548 (1996).

2. "In determining whether to grant a rule to show cause in prohibition when a court is not acting in excess of its jurisdiction, this Court will look to the adequacy of other available remedies such as appeal and to the over-all economy of effort and money among litigants, lawyers and courts; however, this Court will use prohibition in this discretionary way to correct only substantial, clear-cut, legal errors plainly in contravention of a clear statutory, constitutional, or common law mandate which may be resolved independently of any disputed facts and only in cases where there is a high probability that the trial will be completely reversed if the error is not corrected in advance." Syl. Pt. 1, Hinkle v. Black, 164 W.Va. 112, 262 S.E.2d 744 (1979).

3. "The prosecuting attorney is a constitutional officer who exercises the sovereign power of the State at the will of the people and he is at all times answerable to them. W.Va. Const., art. 2, Sec. 2; art. 3, Sec. 2; art. 9, Sec. 1." Syl. Pt. 2, State ex rel. Preissler v. Dostert, 163 W.Va. 719, 260 S.E.2d 279 (1979).

4. In civil abuse and neglect cases, the legislature has made DHHR the State's representative. In litigations that are conducted under State civil abuse and neglect statutes, DHHR is the client of county prosecutors. The legislature has specifically indicated through W.Va. Code § 49-6-10 (1996) that prosecutors must cooperate with DHHR's efforts to pursue civil abuse and neglect actions. The relationship between DHHR and county prosecutors under the statute is a pure attorney-client relationship. The legislature has not given authority to county prosecutors to litigate civil abuse and neglect actions independent of DHHR. Such authority is granted to prosecutors only under State criminal abuse and neglect statutes. Therefore, all of the legal and ethical principles that govern the attorney-client relationship in general, are applicable to the relationship that exists between DHHR and county prosecutors in civil abuse and neglect proceedings.

5. When county prosecutors represent the DHHR, they may not invoke the Supreme Court of Appeals' appellate or original jurisdiction in a civil abuse and neglect proceeding, unless they have the express consent and approval of DHHR.

6. "In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody or his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions." Syl. Pt. 1, In Re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973).

7. "Prior acts of violence, physical abuse, or emotional abuse toward other children are relevant in a termination of parental rights proceeding, are not violative of W.Va.R.Evid. 404(b), and a decision regarding the admissibility thereof shall be within the sound discretion of the trial court." Syl. Pt. 8, In Interest of Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

8. "Where there is clear and convincing evidence that a child has suffered physical and/or sexual abuse while in the custody of his or her parent(s), guardian, or custodian, another child residing in the home when the abuse took place who is not a direct victim of the physical and/or sexual abuse but is at risk of being abused is an abused child under W.Va. Code, 49-1-3(a) (1994)." Syl. Pt. 2, In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995).

9. "W.Va. Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), permits a parent to move the court for an improvement period which shall be allowed unless the court finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial." Syl. Pt. 2, State ex rel. West Virginia Dep't of Human Servs. v. Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987).

10. "'Under W.Va. Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), when an improvement period is authorized, then the court by order shall require the Department of Human Services to prepare a family case plan pursuant to W.Va. Code, 49-6D-3 (1984)." Syl. pt. 3, State ex rel. W.Va. Department of Human Services v. Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987)." Syl. Pt. 3, In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

Davis, Justice:

This case is before the Court on a petition for a writ of prohibition, mandamus and writ of error See footnote 1 against the Honorable Tod J. Kaufman, Judge of the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, by the petitioners, Diva P. (hereinafter the "child" or "Diva") See footnote 2 and the State of West Virginia. Sherry P., mother of the child, is also named as a respondent. See footnote 3 Both the State and the child's guardian ad litem See footnote 4 seek relief from the November 19, 1996, disposition order which returned Diva to her mother for a three month improvement period. Petitioners contend that an additional improvement period is not in the best interest of Diva. Petitioners seek termination of Sherry P.'s parental rights.

I.
FACTUAL BACKGROUND

At the age of 16, Sherry P. gave birth to Diva on May 11, 1993. At the time of the child's birth Sherry P. lived with her mother and two sisters Brandy and Shelly. See footnote 5 Sherry P.'s sister Shelly is autistic and has extremely limited functioning capabilities. On July 17, 1993, Sherry P. and her mother left home to go to a local store. Diva was left in the care of Brandy. Without Brandy's knowledge, Shelly removed baby Diva from her crib. When Brandy attempted to take baby Diva from Shelly, Shelly threw the baby against the wall.

Upon learning that the child was thrown against a wall by Shelly, Sherry P. and her mother immediately took the child to Women's and Children's Hospital. The child was diagnosed as having a closed head injury. No further diagnosis was made at that time. The record indicates that Sherry P. questioned hospital personnel about what appeared to be a soft area on the left side of the child's head. Sherry P.'s concern about the soft area was dismissed as insignificant. Sherry P. was permitted to take the child home within hours of bringing her to the hospital.

On July 18, 1993, Sherry P. again took Diva to the hospital because of a lethargic look on her face. While at the hospital the second time, it was discovered that the child had a fractured right arm, hairline right skull fracture, as well as a depressed skull fracture. See footnote 6

The West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR") was contacted regarding the child's injuries. DHHR filed a neglect and abuse petition against Sherry P. on July 23, 1993. Diva was taken into the custody of DHHR. After successfully completing an improvement period, the circuit court entered an agreed order on May 27, 1994, dismissing the petition. Diva was returned to Sherry P. See footnote 7

On October 16, 1994, Sherry P. gave birth to a second child, Destiny P. (hereinafter the "Destiny"). Destiny was born prematurely. Sherry P.'s physician recommended a heart monitor be used for the infant because of a high risk of sudden infant death syndrome. The heart monitor was designed to sound an alarm if Destiny's heart stopped beating. Sherry P. utilized the heart monitor for two months. During that two month period the evidence showed that the heart monitor was only disconnected a few days. See footnote 8 Unknown to Sherry P. the heart monitor was actually defective. Medical expert , Dr. Joseph Werthammer testified that a review of the recorded printout from the heart monitor revealed that it recorded a total of 6,000 alarms during the two month period that Sherry P. had the infant connected to the monitor. See footnote 9

There was further evidence that both the hospital and the supplier of the heart monitor were aware after the first month of use by Sherry P., that the monitor was defective. Neither took steps to inform Sherry P. of this fact. See footnote 10 On December 29, 1994, Sherry P. gave Destiny a bath. Sherry P. laid down on a sofa holding the infant in her arms. A short time afterwards Sherry P.'s mother picked the infant up while Sherry P. slept and found that Destiny was dead. An autopsy was performed on Destiny. The autopsy determined that Destiny died of natural causes. See footnote 11

Immediately after the death of Destiny an amended abuse and neglect petition was filed by DHHR against Sherry P. The petition alleged that Diva was abused and neglected. On October 4, 1996, Judge Kaufman held a final adjudication hearing on the matter. On October 30, 1996 the court issued an order, which was subsequently amended on November 15, 1996, finding the child to be neglected within the meaning of W.Va. 49-6-2 (1996). See footnote 12 A disposition hearing was held on October 21, 1996. Based upon testimony at the disposition hearing and the recommendation of DHHR, the court entered a disposition order on November 19, 1996. Diva was ordered returned to the custody of Sherry P. for a three month post-dispositional improvement period. See footnote 13 The State objected to the disposition order and urged the court to terminate the parental rights of Sherry P. Shortly after entry of the disposition order, Sherry P. was "indicted by the grand jury for the murder of her infant child, Destiny P." See footnote 14 Subsequent to the indictment, petitioners instituted this proceeding challenging the disposition order.

II.
STANDARD OF REVIEW

We begin by outlining the standard of review in civil abuse and neglect proceedings. The standard of review was established by this Court in syllabus point 1 of State ex rel. Virginia M. v. Virgil Eugene S. II, 197 W.Va. 456, 475 S.E.2d 548 (1996) as follows:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its > entirety. Syl. Pt. 1, In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S. , 196 W.V a. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

The above standard of review requires deference by this Court to the findings of a circuit court in a civil abuse and neglect proceeding. The critical nature of unreviewable intangibles justify the deferential approach we accord findings by a circuit court. As we said in Brown v. Gobble, 196 W.Va. 559, 563, 474 S.E.2d 489, 493 (1996), "the standard of review for judging a sufficiency of evidence claim is not appellant friendly." See Gentry v. Mangum, 195 W.Va. 512, 520 n.6, 466 S.E.2d 171, 179 n.6 (1995) ("Only rarely and in extraordinary circumstances will we, from the vista of a cold appellate record, reverse a circuit court's on-the-spot judgment concerning the relative weighing of probative value and unfair effect.").

A writ of prohibition is an appropriate remedy in cases where the lower court has no jurisdiction over the subject matter in controversy, or, having such jurisdiction, exceeds its legitimate powers. W.Va. Code § 53-1-1 (1994). In the instant matter the circuit court has jurisdiction, therefore we look to syllabus point 1 of Hinkle v. Black, 164 W.Va. 112, 262 S.E.2d 744 (1979):

In determining whether to grant a rule to show cause in prohibition when a court is not acting in excess of its jurisdiction, this Court will look to the adequacy of other available remedies such as appeal and to the over-all economy of effort and money among litigants, lawyers and courts; however, this Court will use prohibition in this discretionary way to correct only substantial, clear-cut, legal errors plainly in contravention of a clear statutory, constitutional, or common law mandate which may be resolved independently of any disputed facts and only in cases where there is a high probability that the trial will be completely reversed if the error is not corrected in advance.

Thus "prohibition may be substituted for a writ of error or appeal when the latter alternatives would provide an inadequate remedy." State ex rel. Chafin v. Halbritter, 191 W.Va. 741, 743-44, 448 S.E.2d 428, 430-31 (1994) (citations omitted).

III.
DISCUSSION

We are confronted with three issues in this case: (1) the State as a party in this proceeding, (2) the sufficiency of evidence, and (3) the disposition case plan. We will review each in its turn.

A.
The State Is Not A Proper Party In This Proceeding

During the litigation before the circuit court, all parties were represented by counsel. At the circuit court level, DHHR was represented by the Kanawha County Prosecutor (hereinafter "prosecutor"). DHHR did not request the prosecutor initiate proceedings in this Court. DHHR is not represented by the prosecutor before this Court. See footnote 15 The record indicates that DHHR agreed with the disposition order of the circuit court and DHHR recommended the disposition adopted by the court. The prosecutor disagreed with its client below, DHHR, and proceeded with the State See footnote 16 as its client in this proceeding. See footnote 17 The question for this Court is whether the State is a proper party to this matter. See footnote 18

It is set out in W.Va. Code § 49-6-10 (1996), See footnote 19 in relevant part, that:

> It shall be the duty of every prosecuting attorney to fully and promptly cooperate with persons seeking to apply for relief under the provisions of this article in all cases of suspected child abuse and neglect, to promptly prepare applications and petitions for relief requested by such persons[.] See footnote 20 (Emphasis added).

DHHR sought relief against Sherry P. pursuant to the civil abuse and neglect statutes. The clear language of W.Va. Code § 49-6-10 made it mandatory for the prosecutor to fully and promptly cooperate with DHHR. See footnote 21 See Syl. Pt. 7, Hodge v. Ginsberg, 172 W.Va. 17, 303 S.E.2d 245 (1983) ("'It is well established that the word 'shall,' in the absence of language in the statute showing a contrary intent on the part of the Legislature, should be afforded a mandatory connotation.' Syllabus Point 1, Nelson v. Public Employees Insurance Board, [171] W.Va. [445], 300 S.E.2d 86 (1982).").

In this proceeding the prosecutor attempts to justify his actions in this matter, without its client or its client's expressed approval, on several grounds. First, it is argued that W.Va. Code § 49-6-10 is unclear as to the role of the prosecutor in civil abuse and neglect proceedings. We discern no such ambiguity in the statute. """When a statute is clear and unambiguous and legislative intent is plain the statute should not be interpreted by the courts, and in such case it is the duty of the courts not to construe but to apply the statute." Syl. pt. 1, Cummins v. State Workmen's Compensation Comm'r., 152 W.Va. 781, 166 S.E.2d 562 (1969).' Syl. pt. 3, Kosegi v. Pugliese, 185 W.Va. 384, 407 S.E.2d 388 (1991)." Syl. Pt. 3, City of Kenova v. Bell Atlantic-West Virginia, Inc., 196 W.Va. 426, 473 S.E.2d 141 (1996). The statute provides that the prosecutor must cooperate with DHHR's efforts to pursue a civil action against Sherry P. pursuant to the civil abuse and neglect statutes. The record reveals that the prosecutor and the DHHR have disagreed regarding the civil action against Sherry P. The brief of the prosecutor states that: "The West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources and the office of the Prosecuting Attorney have, throughout this case, disagreed as to the resolution of this case."

In prosecutions under our criminal abuse and neglect statutes, the State is the client of the prosecutor. W.Va. Code § 7-4-1 (1971) provides, in relevant part, that "[i]t shall be the duty of the prosecuting attorney to attend to the criminal business of the State in the county in which he is elected[.]" We indicated in State ex rel. Skinner v. Dostert, 166 W.Va. 743, 752-753, 278 S.E.2d 624, 631 (1981), that "[a]s criminal offenses are offenses against the State which must be prosecuted in the name of the State, the prosecutor, as the officer charged with prosecuting such offenses, has a duty to vindicate the victim's and the public's constitutional right of redress for a criminal invasion of rights." (Citations omitted). Because the State is the client in criminal abuse and neglect cases, prosecutors have almost absolute discretion in determining the course of such prosecutions. We noted in Skinner, 166 W.Va. at 752, 278 S.E.2d at 631, "that the prosecuting attorney is vested with discretion in the control of criminal causes, which is committed to him for the public good and for the vindication of the public interest." However, we provided caution in syllabus point 2 of State ex rel. Preissler v. Dostert, 163 W.Va. 719, 260 S.E.2d 279 (1979), when we held that "[t]he prosecuting attorney is a constitutional officer who exercises the sovereign power of the State at the will of the people and he is at all times answerable to them. W.Va. Const., art. 2, Sec. 2; art. 3, Sec. 2; art. 9, Sec. 1."

In civil abuse and neglect cases, the legislature has made DHHR the state's representative. In litigations that are conducted under State civil abuse and neglect statutes, DHHR is the client of county prosecutors. The legislature has specifically indicated through W.Va. Code § 49-6-10 that prosecutors must cooperate with DHHR's efforts to pursue civil abuse and neglect actions. The relationship between DHHR and county prosecutors under the statute is a pure attorney-client relationship. The legislature has not given authority to county prosecutors to litigate civil abuse and neglect actions independent of DHHR. Such authority is granted to prosecutors only under State criminal abuse and neglect statutes. Therefore, all of the legal and ethical principles that govern the attorney-client relationship in general, are applicable to the relationship that exists between DHHR and county prosecutors in civil abuse and neglect proceedings.

In the instant proceeding, DHHR recommended a disposition of this case which the prosecutor opposed. The circuit court adopted the disposition recommended by DHHR. The prosecutor has now, independently of its client, challenged the adopted recommendation of its client. As an initial matter, the prosecutor's decision to seek a writ of prohibition in this case compromised many of the provisions of the Rules of Professional Conduct relating to the attorney-client relationship. E.g. Rule 1.2(a), See footnote 22 Rule 1.6(a) See footnote 23 and Rule 1.7(b). See footnote 24

Loyalty is one of the cornerstones of the attorney-client relationship. The Comment to R.P.C., Rule 1.7 admonishes that "[a]s a general proposition, loyalty to a client prohibits undertaking representation directly adverse to that client without that client's consent." Further, information that is exchanged between a client and attorney is clothed in the ancient common law attorney-client communication privilege. See also Lawyer Disciplinary Bd. v. McGraw, 194 W.Va. 788, 799-800, 461 S.E.2d 850, 861-862 (1995) ("[A] lawyer's ethical duty of confidentiality under Rule 1.6 of the Rules of Professional Conduct applies to all information relating to representation of a client, protecting more than just 'confidences' or 'secrets' of a client. The ethical duty of confidentiality is not nullified by the fact that the information is part of a public record or by the fact that someone else is privy to it." The course of conduct engaged in by the prosecutor in this case makes loyalty and the attorney-client communication privilege meaningless. See footnote 25

Additionally, the prosecutor has attempted to interject in the case, for the purpose of this petition, a new client. That is, the prosecutor in filing this appeal has named the State as its client. The prosecutor justifies introducing the State as its new client in this case by citing language in our decision in In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 32-33, 435 S.E.2d 162, 170-71 (1993), wherein we indicated "that the State, in its role of parens patriae, 'is the ultimate protector of the rights of minors[,]' and 'has a substantial interest in providing for their health, safety, and welfare, and may properly step in and do so when necessary." Quoting In re Betty J.W., 179 W.Va. 605, 608, 371 S.E.2d 326, 329 (1988). The language from Jeffrey R.L. does not aid the prosecutor.

In Jeffrey R.L., DHHR sought to terminate parental rights, but the lower court returned the child to the mother. The issue on appeal was whether the lower court committed error in not terminating the mother's parental rights. In addressing that issue we spoke about the State as the ultimate protector of children and DHHR's role in carrying out the State's interest in civil abuse and neglect proceedings. We did not indicate that prosecutors were statutorily entrusted with independent enforcement of civil abuse and neglect proceedings. To the contrary, we made clear that the State had reposed that responsibility upon DHHR. In the instant proceeding, the prosecutor had no authority to invoke the State as its client. We further find that, absent statutory authority, when county prosecutors represent the DHHR, they may not invoke this Court's appellate or original jurisdiction in a civil abuse and neglect proceeding, unless they have the express consent and approval of DHHR. We point out that this does not impair the right of a child's guardian ad litem to invoke the original or appellate jurisdiction of this Court, regardless of the position taken by DHHR. As a matter of fact, the guardian ad litem has an affirmative duty to take an assertive role in securing the child's rights, including prosecuting an appeal if the case so warrants. See Scottie D., 185 W.Va. at 198, 406 S.E.2d at 221 ("[T]he 'guardian ad litem representing an infant plaintiff has full power to act for the purpose of securing the infant's rights, and may do all things that are necessary to this end.' 42 Am.Jur.2d Infants Sec. 178, at 165 (1969). Securing the infant's rights includes taking an assertive role and, if in the judgment of the guardian ad litem, a case so warrants, prosecuting an appeal.").

B.
Did The Evidence Support An Abuse Finding And Termination Of Parental Rights

The circuit court found the evidence insufficient to support terminating Sherry P.'s parental rights to the child. The guardian ad litem contends that the evidence in this case sustained a finding that Sherry P.'s parental rights should be terminated. The position taken by the guardian ad litem presents two issues: (1) did the evidence support an abused child adjudication and (2) was termination of parental rights the proper disposition.

As an initial matter we note that in syllabus point 1 of In Re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973), this Court indicated that:

> In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody or his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions.

There is tremendous responsibility imposed upon the judiciary when it is confronted with termination of parental rights. No greater connection to a child's existence can be found than that which links a child to its natural parents. In syllabus point 10 of Matter of Brian D., 194 W.Va. 623, 461 S.E.2d 129 (1995) we said, in part, that "'[w]hen parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child....' Syl. Pt. 5, In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995)." In the single syllabus of State ex rel. Kiger v. Hancock,153 W.Va. 404,168 S.E.2d 798, (W.Va. 1969) we indicated, in part, that "[a] parent has the natural right to the custody of his or her infant child[.]"

Notwithstanding the natural link between parent and child, this Court articulated in syllabus point 1 of Willis that, "[t]hough constitutionally protected, the right of the natural parent to the custody of minor children is not absolute and it may be limited or terminated by the State, as parens patriae, if the parent is proved unfit to be entrusted with child care." In syllabus point 3 of Jeffrey R.L. we held:

> Parental rights may be terminated where there is clear and convincing evidence th at the infant child has suffered extensive physical abuse while in the custody of his or her parents, and there is no reasonable likelihood that th e conditi ons of a buse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of the a buse has not been identified and the parents, even in the f ace of knowledge of the abuse, have taken no action to identify the abuser.

Did the evidence support an abused child adjudication? The circuit court's amended order of November 15, 1996 concluded that the child was a neglected child within the meaning of W.Va. Code § 49-1-3(g)(1) (1994). The court deemed the evidence insufficient to find the child was an abused child within the meaning of W.Va. Code § 49-1-3(a) (1994). The guardian ad litem contends that the evidence supported a finding that the child was an abused child.

W.Va. Code § 49-1-3(a), in pertinent part, defines abused child to mean a child whose welfare or health is harmed or threatened by "[a] parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly or intentionally inflicts ... or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home[.]" In syllabus point 1, in part, of Brenda C. we pointed out that """"W.Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) [1996], requires the State Department of Welfare [now the Department of Health and Human Resources], in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove 'conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition ... by clear and convincing proof[.]'" Syllabus Point 1, In Interest of S.C., 168 W.Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981).' Syllabus Point 1, West Virginia Department of Human Services v. Peggy F., 184 W.Va. 60, 399 S.E.2d 460 (1990).' Syllabus Point 1, In re Beth, 192 W.Va. 656, 453 S.E.2d 639 (1994). Syl. Pt. 3, In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995)." (Emphasis added).

In determining whether the circuit court was clearly erroneous in finding that DHHR failed to meet its burden of proving by clear and convincing evidence that the child was an abused child, we must first place this case in its proper context. The initial petition filed against Sherry P. was dismissed, without prejudice, by an agreed order dated May 27, 1994. See footnote 26 The dismissal order stated that "the situation which lead to the filing of the initial petition is no longer present[.]" The order further indicated that Sherry P. "has fully complied with the services provided [by] the Department[.]" Therefore, the initial incident could only be considered in this proceeding as evidence of other allegations of child abuse and neglect. We pointed out in syllabus point 8 of In Interest of Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991) that:

> Prior acts of violence, physical abuse, or emotional abuse toward other children are relevant in a termination of parental rights proceeding, are not violative of W.Va.R.Evid. 404(b), and a decision regarding the admissibility thereof shall be within the sound discretion of the trial court.

The amended petition filed after the December 29, 1994 death of baby Destiny did not revive the averments contained in the initial petition filed on behalf of Diva. The guardian ad litem contends that the evidence concerning the July 17, 1993, injuries to Diva and the December 29, 1994, death of baby Destiny, established by clear and convincing evidence that Diva was an abused child. As to the July 17 incident it is argued that Sherry P. failed to provide an adequate explanation for the injuries to the child. See footnote 27 We disagree.

First, there is no evidence in the record to show that Sherry P. personally injured Diva. Nor was there any evidence to establish that Sherry P. was actually present when the child was injured. The record indicates that the child was briefly left in the care of Brandy, while Sherry P. and her mother went to a store. There was no evidence to suggest that Brandy was not a responsible babysitter. Brandy testified that Shelly threw the child against a wall after she was discovered holding the child. The guardian ad litem alleges that its witness, Dr. M.L. McJunkin, testified that the injuries to the child could not have occurred as indicated by Brandy. Our review of Dr. McJunkin's testimony reveals the opposite. During cross-examination Dr. McJunkin clearly stated that the injuries could have come as a result of being thrown against a wall.

Shelly was not allowed to hold the child unless some adult was present. Shelly was not allowed to remove the child from the crib. The restrictions placed on Shelly evidenced sensitivity to the fact that she was autistic or emotionally unstable. See footnote 28 Further, the record establishes that Shelly had not injured the child prior to July 17. There was no evidence that Shelly inflicted injuries on the child after the July 17 incident.

The record further reveals that Sherry P. immediately took the child to the hospital upon learning of the incident. Sherry P. returned to the hospital the very next morning upon observing that the child appeared lethargic.

As to the December 19, 1994, death of Destiny, the guardian ad litem contends that this incident constituted child abuse against Diva. See footnote 29 In syllabus point 2 of Christina L. we held that:

> Where there is clear and convinc ing evidence th at a child has suffered physical and/ or sexual a buse while in the custody of his or her parent(s), guardia n, or custodian, a nother child re siding in t he home w hen the abus e took plac e who is not a direct victim of the physical and/or sexual abuse but is at risk of bei ng a bused is an abused child under W.Va.Code, 49-1-3(a) (1994).

Under the authority of Christina L. clear and convincing proof that Sherry P. abused Destiny by bringing about her death supports a finding that the child, Diva, was an abused child.

The circumstances surrounding the death of Destiny troubles this Court. The most compelling and persuasive evidence regarding Destiny's death comes from the autopsy report and the testimony of Dr. Werthammer. The autopsy report reveals no foul play or wrong doing in bringing about the death. The autopsy report concluded the infant died of natural causes.

Dr. Werthammer testified that the heart monitor provided to Sherry P. was not merely defective--he testified that it was "worthless." Dr. Werthammer opined that if the heart monitor had been working correctly the infant might be alive today.

The guardian ad litem points out that during the few days prior to the infant's death, Sherry P. had disconnected Destiny's heart monitor. The evidence indicates that the heart monitor sent out 6,000 false alarms during the two month period that Sherry P. had the machine. In spite of each and every false alarm, Sherry P. faithfully kept the machine connected to Destiny. Dr. Werthammer testified that it was unprecedented for anyone to endure the sound of the alarm for such an extended period of time.

There was further evidence that, while Sherry P. was not aware that the heart monitor was defective, the hospital and supplier of the machine knew or reasonably should have known of the defect. Sherry P. took the infant to the hospital a month after getting the machine. The hospital retrieved data from the machine which indicated that it sounded 4,200 false alarms during the first thirty day period. The hospital took no action to correct the problem. The hospital failed to inform Sherry P. that the machine was defective. The evidence also indicates that Sherry P. reported to the supplier of the machine that it was constantly sounding an alarm. Again, no action was taken to inform Sherry P. that the machine was defective. In view of the facts presented the evidence did not establish by clear and convincing proof that Sherry P. abused Diva.

Was termination of parental rights the proper disposition? The guardian ad litem contends that the circuit court abused its discretion in granting Sherry P. a post-disposition improvement period. The guardian ad litem argued that the evidence supported terminating Sherry P.'s rights to baby Diva. As previously noted, W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(c) permits a post-disposition improvement period. In syllabus point 4 of Matter of Jonathan P.,182 W.Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537 (1989) we held that:

> Termination of parent al rights, the m ost drastic rem edy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W.Va.Code, 49-6- 5 [1977] m ay be employed without the use of intervening less restrictiv e alternatives when it is found that there is no reasona ble likelihood under W.Va .Code, 49-6- 5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abus e can be substantially corrected. Syllabus Point 2, In re R.J.M. , 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E. 2d 114 (1980).

See Syl. Pt. 2, State ex rel. West Virginia Dep't of Human Servs. v. Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987) ("W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), permits a parent to move the court for an improvement period which shall be allowed unless the court finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial.").

In our review of the record we find that the circuit court was not clearly erroneous, in determining that the guardian ad litem failed to establish that there was no reasonable likelihood the conditions of neglect could be substantially corrected. The record clearly establishes that a strong bond has developed between Sherry P. and Diva. Sherry P. complied with all the demands placed upon her by DHHR. The record does not reflect one instance where DHHR has requested something from Sherry P. and she failed to follow through on the matter. Every effort has been made by Sherry P. to do what DHHR has deemed necessary to reasonably assure the safety and well-being of Diva. See footnote 30

C.

Disposition Case-Plan

The guardian ad litem argues that the circuit court was obligated to provide a case-plan in view of the decision to grant Sherry P. a disposition improvement period. We noted in syllabus point 3 of Tiffany Marie S. that:

> Under W.Va. Code, 49- 6-2(b) (1984), when an im provement period is authorized, then the court by or der shall require the D epartment of Human Services to prepare a family case plan pursuant to W.Va. Code, 49-6D-3 (1984). Syl. pt. 3, State ex rel. W.Va. Department of Human Se rvices v. Cher yl M. , 177 W.Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987).

The record indicates a case-plan was prepared by DHHR. The case plan was not submitted to the circuit court for approval. We have reviewed the case-plan and instruct the parties to submit the same to the circuit court for appropriate inclusion in this case.

IV.
CONCLUSION

In view of the foregoing, we find that the petitioners are not entitled to relief and, therefore, we deny the requested writ.

Writ denied.

1. This case is being viewed exclusively as a petition for writ of prohibition.

---

2. We follow our past practice in domestic cases that involve sensitive facts, and do not use the last names of the parties. See State ex rel. West Virginia Dep't of Human Servs. v. Cherly M., 177 W.Va. 688, 689 n.1, 356 S.E.2d 181, 182 n.1 (1987).

---

3. Sherry P. is represented by counsel in this matter and has filed a response brief. Judge Kaufman submitted a letter to this Court requesting his ruling be upheld.

---

4. This Court has previously indicated that a guardian ad litem "must exercise reasonable diligence in carrying out the responsibility of protecting the rights of the children[,]" including "exercising the appellate rights of the children, if, in the reasonable judgment of the guardian ad litem, an appeal is necessary." Syl. Pt. 3, in part, In re Scottie D., 185 W.Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214 (1991) (emphasis in original).

---

5. It is not clear from the record but Brandy is a few years older than Sherry P. Shelly is a few years younger than Sherry P.

---

6. At a hearing in the case, medical evidence was introduced that the hairline right skull fracture was evident during the initial visit to the hospital on July 17. However, medical personnel did not diagnose the condition. There was also evidence that the hospital did not x-ray the child's arm during the first visit. The brief of respondent points out that medical records introduced into evidence revealed that critical entries were tampered with in this case. Erasures and re-entries were made that were not initialed. One incident identified in the brief refers to an ancillary note entry on July 19, 1993 which originally read: "On review of radiographics with radiologist today and with help of CT bone windows done [July] 18 it was evident that a small partial fracture was present at initial visit [July] 17." It was pointed out that material portions of the ancillary note had been erased and replaced with the following entry: "...it is possible that a questionable right partial fracture was present at initial visit [July] 17."

7. The order read in pertinent part:
"Based upon the fact [that] the situation which lead to the filing of the initial petition is no longer present, the parties moved that this action be dismissed." (Emphasis added).

---

8. Numerically speaking, the testimony indicated that Sherry P. utilized the heart monitor approximately 84% of the time.

---

9. Dr. Werthammer testified that Destiny was having an alarm about every 12 minutes, day and night.

---

10. Sherry P. took the infant for a routine check up after the first month of having her home. During that hospital visit the heart monitor's data base was retrieved by hospital personnel, which data base informed the hospital that the heart monitor was defective as a result of the 4200 false alarms that were recorded. Additionally, the evidence indicates that Sherry P. contacted the supplier of the heart monitor on several occasions to inform the supplier that the machine was sounding an alarm constantly. However, nothing was done or said to her about the machine being defective.

---

11. In addressing the role of the heart monitor, Dr. Werthammer testified as follows:
THE COURT: Would you say the alarm was just worthless?
A. I would say it was less than worthless. It was a noise hazard.
THE COURT: Is there any conclusion you could reach about the mother's relationship to the monitor or the mother's relationship to the baby based on the monitor?
A. I would say this mother went the full hundred yards in keeping this baby on this monitor as long as she did with the compliance that's demonstrated by this thing. You know, you sent me these things and then you sent me the report and told me a little bit about what this case was about.
I feel that there was negligence in this case--
MS. MCCLURE: Your honor, I'm going to object as to this isn't a civil action for negligence and I'm going to object if you're going to place any blame on somebody else or some deviation from the standard of care.
That's irrelevant as to whether she neglected or abused her child.
A. That's the question I was asked --- Did this mother comply with what she was instructed to do. And my judgment is she went the full distance with it.
I think there was a problem, however, in making this an effective piece of equipment that might have prevented this child's death.

12. The brief of the petitioners bring up the point that the court sua sponte issued an amended order of neglect. This issue is irrelevant in light of the fact that the ultimate conclusion by both orders was the same. A review of the original order which was drafted by the State supports the assertion in the respondent's brief that the original order mischaracterized material facts in the case.

13. W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(c) (1996) provides that "[t]he court may as an alternative disposition allow to the parents or custodians an improvement period not to exceed six months."

14. The indictment indicates that Sherry P. was charged under the criminal child neglect statute. See W.Va. Code § 61-8D-4 (1996).

15. Subsequent to oral arguments DHHR submitted a brief in this case through its in-house counsel, the Office of the Attorney General. The only issue addressed by DHHR is its position that the prosecutor did not have authority to initiate the instant proceeding before this Court.

16. Under normal circumstances it would be correct to refer to DHHR as the State. However, in this proceeding the prosecutor has manufactured a distinction by naming the State as it would in any criminal prosecution. Therefore, the designation of State in this proceeding does not encompass DHHR.

17. We believe it is necessary to commend the prosecutor's efforts for vigorously advocating for the rights of the child in this proceeding. However, as we have established in the body of this opinion, there are laws and principles which govern the relationship between the prosecutor and the DHHR.

18. In a recent decision, In re Jonathan G., ___ W.Va. ___, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996), we indicated that county prosecutors are required to act as attorneys for DHHR in civil abuse and neglect proceedings. The decision in Jonathan G. did not address the issue in a syllabus point. Consequently, the matter is again raised by the prosecutor. In the instant proceeding we make clear in the syllabus of this opinion what Jonathan G. declared regarding the relationship between county prosecutors and DHHR in civil abuse and neglect proceedings.

19. W.Va. Code § 49-6-10 is to be read in para materia with W.Va. Code § 49-6-1(a), which provides in relevant part:
(a) If [DHHR] or a reputable person believes that a child is neglected or abused, the department or the person may present a petition setting forth the facts to the circuit court[.]"

20. The requirement regarding civil matters in general is set out in W.Va. Code § 7-4-1, in relevant part, as follows:
It shall also be the duty of the prosecuting attorney to attend to civil suits in such county in which the State, or any department, commission or board thereof, is interested[.]"
This statute is not relevant or controlling because the legislature has enacted a specific statute setting out the role of prosecutors in civil abuse and neglect proceedings. "The rules of statutory construction require that a specific statute will control over a general statute[.]" Daily Gazette Co., Inc. v. Caryl, 181 W.Va. 42, 45, 380 S.E.2d 209, 212 (1989). Citing Syl. Pt. 1, UMWA by Trumka v. Kingdon, 174 W.Va. 330, 325 S.E.2d 120 (1984); State ex rel. Simpkins v. Harvey, 172 W.Va. 312, 305 S.E.2d 268 (1983).

21. Although the civil abuse and neglect statutes refer to DHHR and reputable persons, we are concerned here only with the authority granted DHHR. In the event anyone other than DHHR filed a petition, DHHR would ultimately be brought into the case in accordance with its statutory duty to so intervene.

22. The relevant part of Rule 1.2(a) provides: "(a) A lawyer shall abide by a client's decisions concerning the objectives of representation.... A lawyer shall abide by a client's decision whether to accept an offer of settlement of a matter."

23. The relevant part of Rule 1.6(a) provides: "(a) A lawyer shall not reveal information relating to representation of a client unless the client consents after consultation, except for disclosures that are impliedly authorized in order to carry out the representation[.]"

---

24. The relevant part of Rule 1.7(b) provides: "(b) A lawyer shall not represent a client if the representation of that client may be materially limited by the lawyer's responsibilities to another client or to a third person, or by the lawyer's own interests[.]"

25. See W.Va. Code § 49-6A-7 (1977) wherein it is provided that:

26. The dismissal occurred without adjudication and disposition hearings taking place.

---

27. The guardian ad litem contends that separate injuries occurred to the child on July 17 and July 18. The evidence to sustain this contention is weak at best. The medical documents indicate that hospital authorities should have discovered on July 17, the injuries that were diagnosed on July 18.

---

28. The guardian ad litem contends that there was insufficient evidence that Shelly was autistic. Brandy testified that Shelly was diagnosed as autistic at age three and that Shelly was placed in a special class in school for emotionally unstable children. No evidence was offered to refute this testimony.

---

29. The prosecutor was only able to get a grand jury to return an indictment against Sherry P. for criminal neglect child abuse.

---

30. The guardian ad litem contends that the circuit court's order returning the child to Sherry P. conflicts with the condition of bond set in the criminal proceeding against her. The record indicates that the circuit court in the case sub judice stayed return of the child pending the outcome of this proceeding. This matter is addressed by Rule 5 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect, wherein it is provided that "[u]nder no circumstances shall a civil protection proceeding be delayed pending the initiation, investigation, prosecution, or resolution of any other proceeding, including, but not limited to, criminal proceedings."

Workman, C. J., concurring:

Justice Davis has done a fine job of examining this very difficult case from both a legal and a human perspective---which is what should be done in every child abuse and neglect case. Baby Diva may definitely be in harm's way, not (it seems from the record before us) from any malevolent intent on the part of this mother, but because she appears to lack any real parenting skills and perhaps because she may have very limited intellect. Yet, there appears to be a strong emotional bond between mother and child, and the mother has attempted to sustain a relationship with this child during all of these proceedings. Thus, the lower court in his discretion decided to make one last effort at remedying the problems leading to these proceedings. During the course of this post-dispositional improvement period the department should monitor Diva very closely. At the final dispositional hearing, the court will have Diva's life---figuratively and perhaps literally---in its hands, just as we do now.

I write separately on the issue of the role of the prosecuting attorney in abuse and neglect cases. When I authored the Jonathan G. case last year, we were presented with a classic case of the Department of Health and Human Resources and the prosecuting attorney taking conflicting positions on a termination issue. See In Re Jonathan G., ___ W. Va. ___, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996). In the instant case, it is the same. From a very pragmatic view, this issue was particularly hard for me because over the course of almost sixteen years on the bench, I have seen the department fail to protect children and fail to advocate vociferously for them on many occasions. See footnote 1 In addition, although guardians ad litem are appointed to represent children, most of them until relatively recently, did not do much aggressive advocacy either, frequently not even appearing on appeal on behalf of the children. In Justice McHugh's case, In Re Jeffrey R. L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993), however, we clearly set forth the responsibilities of guardians ad litem in abuse and neglect cases. That opinion, together with an intensive effort to develop continuing legal education in this area, has created steady improvement in the quality of representation of children. See footnote 2

Furthermore, I believe strongly that the community at large (all of us in the corporate sense) have an interest and a responsibility in abuse and neglect proceedings which could and probably should be represented by prosecuting attorneys. Thank goodness, we as a society have stopped looking at child abuse as a "family problem" and now recognize that it's everyone's business. But as I have said in other contexts, it is up to courts to interpret the law, not create it. As much as I would like to make the policy decision that prosecuting attorneys have the right and responsibility to represent the public interest in protecting abused and neglected children when their position conflicts with the department's, I do not believe the law as currently constituted See footnote 3 permits them that role. Thus, it is my recommendation that the Prosecuting Attorneys Association and child advocacy organizations explore the possibility of bringing this issue to the attention of the Legislature and seeking legislative change in this area.

There cannot be too much advocacy for children. The public has a legitimate interest in protecting abused and neglected children, and the prosecutors are very logical representatives to carry out that mission if the Legislature chooses to modify the law to accord them that responsibility.

Footnote: 1 A September 1996 legislative audit of the Child Protective Services Division (CPS) for the 1995 fiscal year, involving a twelve-county survey, found that despite the requirement that it conduct a face-to-face interview with the child or children within 14 days of being notified of suspected abuse or neglect, CPS failed to conduct any such interview in 46% of the cases. In 29% of cases, CPS conducted the interview within 14 days, in 15% of the cases, CPS conducted the interview within 15 to 90 days, and in 10% of the cases, CPS took over 90 days to interview the alleged victims. Information from Office of Legislative Auditor, Performance Evaluation and Research Division, September 1996 Report.

Footnote: 2 The Jonathan G. case and the instant one, precluding prosecutors from an independent role in abuse and neglect, impel me to re-emphasize that, now more than ever, guardians ad litem more than ever must be strong advocates for the children they represent.

Nos. 23156, 23157
Submitted Jan. 23, 1996
Decided July 8, 1996

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. Implicit in the definition of an abused child under West Virginia Code § 49-1-3 (1995) is the child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by a parent or guardian who fails to cooperate in identifying the perpetrator of abuse, rather choosing to remain silent.

2. Because the purpose of an abuse and neglect proceeding is remedial, where the parent or guardian fails to respond to probative evidence offered against him/her during the course of an abuse and neglect proceeding, a lower court may properly consider that individual's silence as affirmative evidence of that individual's culpability.

3. "W.Va.Code, 49-1-3(a) (1984), in part, defines an abused child to include one whose parent knowingly allows another person to commit the abuse. Under this standard, termination of parental rights is usually upheld only where the parent takes no action in the face of knowledge of the abuse or actually aids or protects the abusing parent." Syl. Pt. 3, In re Betty J.W., 179 W.Va. 605, 371 S.E.2d 326 (1988).

4. Pursuant to the provisions of West Virginia Code § 49-1-3(a)(1) (1995), the definition of child abuse encompasses a parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly allows another person to inflict physical injury upon another child residing in the same home as the parent and his/her child(ren), even though that child is not the parent's natural or adopted child.

5. "Termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W.Va.Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such parent contends nonparticipation in the acts giving rise to the termination petition but there is clear and convincing evidence that such nonparticipating parent knowingly took no action to prevent or stop such acts to protect the child. Furthermore, termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W.Va.Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such nonparticipating parent supports the other parent's version as to how a child's injuries occurred, but there is clear and convincing evidence that such version is inconsistent with the medical evidence." Syl. Pt. 2, In re Scottie D., 185 W.Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214 (1991).

6. "Parental rights may be terminated where there is clear and convincing evidence that the infant child has suffered extensive physical abuse while in the custody of his or her parents, and there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified and the parents, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, have taken no action to identify the abuser." Syl. Pt. 3, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993).

7. The term "knowingly" as used in West Virginia Code § 49-1-3(a)(1) (1995) does not require that a parent actually be present at the time the abuse occurs, but rather that the parent was presented with sufficient facts from which he/she could have and should have recognized that abuse has occurred.

8. A parent's parental rights to his/her child(ren) may be terminated: 1) where there is clear and convincing evidence that the parent knowingly allowed another person to inflict extensive physical injury upon another child residing in the same home as the parent and his/her child(ren), even though the injured child is not the parent's natural or adopted child; and 2) where there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified and the parent, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, has taken no action to identify the abuser.

WORKMAN, Justice:

This case is before the Court upon the consolidated appeal See footnote 1 of Melissa C., Doris S. See footnote 2 and David E. See footnote 3 from the February 10, 1995, final order of the Circuit Court of Cabell County, which resulted in the termination of the following parental rights: Doris S.'s parental rights to her minor child, Rosalee S., five years old; Melissa C.'s parental rights to her minor children, Brian "Scott" C., seven years old, Larry "Mike" C., five years old, Joseph E., four years old, and John E, three years old; and, David E.'s parental rights to his minor children, Joseph E. and John E. The Appellant, David E., argues that the lower court erred in terminating his parental rights where the Appellee failed to present clear and convincing evidence that there was no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse could be substantially corrected and where the trial court denied him a meaningful improvement period. The Appellants, Doris S. and Melissa C., argue that the lower court erred and abused its discretion by denying them a meaningful improvement period without clear and convincing evidence of compelling circumstances that would justify such a denial and by terminating their parental rights where the State failed to satisfy its burden of clear and convincing evidence, especially with regard to Melissa C. Based on a review of the record, the parties' briefs and arguments, the guardian ad litem's brief, and all other matters submitted before the Court, we conclude that the circuit court committed no error and, accordingly, affirm.

I.

Detective Jim Scheidler of the Cabell County Sheriff's Department testified that on the morning of April 19, 1993, he responded to a call at 4105 Green Valley Road in Huntington, West Virginia, regarding the death of Allen Ray S., Appellant Doris S.'s twenty-two-month-old son. Detective Scheidler indicated that upon his arrival to the residence, he first noticed the infant's body in the back of an ambulance. The officer testified that the child's body felt cool when he touched it and that the child's clothing was wet or damp in spots. Appellant Melissa C. told the detective that she had discovered the child face down on the couch on which he slept. The officer stated that it was his opinion that the child had been dead for "five to ten hours or more[,]" at the time of his arrival upon the scene. See footnote 4 The detective learned that in addition to the children, Rosalee S., Scott C., Mike C., Joseph E. and John E., the following adults had been present through the evening preceding the child's death: David E., See footnote 5 Melissa C., Larry C., See footnote 6 Doris S, and James Nance, Doris S.'s boyfriend. See footnote 7 Detective Scheidler also testified that "[i]n talking to Melissa and all of those at the scene that day, they all indicated to me, to their recollection, that there was never any violent injury or anything of a violent nature that was done to Allen Ray." Moreover, the detective indicated that at no time after he left the scene did he receive any information about the child's death from any of the adults present in the home the night the child died. Finally, the detective testified that he made the decision to call the Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") concerning the other children after he entered the residence and observed "[v]ery unsanitary" living conditions, See footnote 8 including mice in the garbage. See footnote 9

Dr. Irvin Sopher, Chief Medical Examiner for the State of West Virginia performed an autopsy on the deceased child. The autopsy results revealed that there were "no external evidence of significant trauma, either old or recent." Further, x-rays did not reveal any old or new bone fractures. The doctor's examination, however, indicated that the child sustained a "severe injury to the spinal column ... which resulted in a severe hemorrhage surrounding the spinal cord[,]" the length of which was approximately fifteen inches long. Dr. Sopher testified that "[t]his is a finding which we rather clasically [sic] see in a condition called shaken baby syndrome[,]" and that "there was severe injury to ... [the child's] body in the form of vertebral column trauma as by shaking, violent shaking, which ... is the cause of death in this particular infant." The doctor further testified that the onset of blood coming from the child's nostril, as depicted in a photograph taken of the deceased, was "[p]robably immediate." The doctor also stated that "it's hard to imagine in any kind of an accidental setting in a household environment, in other words, where there aren't velocities of motor vehicles or aircraft involved, that you could have this extensive of an injury without an abusive situation." Finally, Dr. Sopher estimated the time of death at 10:00 p.m. on April 18, 1993, based on the child's stomach contents and the doctor's assumption that the child last ate at 7:00 p.m. prior to his death; however, he also indicated that while the child probably only lived minutes after the infliction of the injury, it was possible that there could have been a delay of several hours from the shaking until the time the child died.

Gary McMullen, a DHHR child protective service worker, testified that Phyllis Justice, the aunt with whom Rosalee was placed after her removal from her mother's custody, contacted him regarding nightmares that Rosalee was having. Mr. McMullen stated that he interviewed the child in order to ascertain what type of services would be available for her. Mr. McMullen indicated that when he spoke with five-year-old Rosalee about the events surrounding Allen Ray's death, she became very anxious and nervous. Mr. McMullen testified that through the use of drawing, Rosalee told him that > she was pl aying by t he creek, along with Scott y and Mi key, and t hat Melissa C [ ][.] was there and s ome ot hers, and she said that Allen went into the creek and got wet and that Jimmy Nance became very upset, and as a result, sh e went with Jimmy Nance and with Allen Ray into the hous e into one of the be drooms, and i t wa s at that time that ... Jimmy Nance started shaking Allen Ray and that his nos e started bleeding and that ... [s]he said, 'well, he quit moving [,]' ... [and] 'started turning blue.' She said ... that Jimmy told her not to say anything about it an d they left the room at that time, 'they ' being Jimmy Na nce and Allen Ray.... Through the conversation, I asked her if she had di scussed this with anyone else. And she said that ... her mother visited th e home and--had a visit with her and that she did disclose to her m other a bout the nightm ares, and she said that her m other told her not to say a nything a bout the nightm ares, and t hat was basically it. See footnote 10

According to Mr. McMullen's testimony, Rosalee also told him that she was afraid of Jimmy Nance. See footnote 11 Finally, in response to inquiry by David E.'s counsel, Mr. McMullen testified that Rosalee never indicated to him that David E. was present during these events.

None of the children who were removed from the home testified at the termination proceeding; however, the lower court, without the Appellants' objection, See footnote 12 admitted statements that Mike C. and Rosalee S. See footnote 13 made to their respective therapists. First, Elizabeth Brachna, a counselor at Family Services, Inc. and an expert in the area of child therapy for traumatized children, testified that through her sessions with Rosalee, the child relayed to her essentially the same statement See footnote 14 she previously made to Mr. McMullen. See footnote 15 Additionally, Rosalee indicated to Ms. Brachna that after Allen Ray turned blue, they returned to the creek again where Jimmy Nance placed the deceased child in the creek and again removed him from the creek. Ms. Brachna testified that Rosalee indicated to her through pictures that Jimmy Nance, Melissa C., Mike and Scott C., as well as Doris S. were present at the creek when Jimmy Nance placed the deceased child in the creek. See footnote 16 In response to questioning by David E.'s attorney, Ms. Brachna testified that Rosalee never mentioned the presence of David E. during the shaking incident or later on after that incident.

Next, Lucy Earl, a therapist with Family Service, Inc. and a qualified expert in the area of child abuse and child therapy, testified that Mrs. Miller, the grandmother with whom Mike and Scott C. were placed, called her office requesting services for five-year-old Mike because he was acting out sexually. Ms. Earl stated that during sessions with Mike, the child kept wanting to talk about the creek. In one of those sessions, Mike stated that "his mommy told him and Jimmy to take Allen Ray to the creek" and that " 'he [Allen Ray] was already dead....' " Mike also stated that "[t]hey put Allen in the creek." Additionally, regarding Mike's brother, seven-year-old Scott, Ms. Earl testified that the only thing that he discussed with her was "a hole that was dug that Mommy and Doris and Jimmy had to fill in before they left the house" the day Allen died. See footnote 17 Further, according to Ms. Earl, both children were fearful of talking about Allen Ray's death with her. Finally, Ms. Earl testified that neither child discussed David E. in any fashion.

All the Appellants declined to take the witness stand, upon advice of counsel. See footnote 18 Further, none of the Appellants presented any testimony through other witnesses or any evidence in their own defense.

Based on the above-mentioned testimony the lower court terminated the Appellants' parental rights for the following reasons: See footnote 19

> 1. the unexplained hom icide of the in fant child, Allen Ray S[ ][.], age 22 months, in April, 1993, while in the custody of the respondent adults, Doris S[ ][.], Melissa C[ ][.], and David E[ ][.];
> 2. the failure of respondents, Doris S[ ][.], Melissa C[ ][.] E[ ][.], and David E[ ][.] to cooperate with law enfor cement authorities to solving [sic] the homicide of Allen Ray S[ ][.]; and
> 3. the absence of any reasonable likelih ood that conditions of abus e can be substantially corrected because the respondent, Doris S[ ][.], Melissa C [ ][.] E[ ][.], and David E[ ][.] failed to cooperate in the id entification of the person responsible for the homicide of Allen Ray S[ ][.]....

II.
CLEAR AND CONVINCING EVIDENCE
DAVID E.

The first issue concerns whether the trial court was presented with the requisite clear and convincing evidence necessary for termination of the Appellant's parental rights. Appellant David E. maintains that the deceased child was not his. Further, he contends that none of the evidence presented before the trial court concerning the deceased child's cause of death implicated him in any way. Finally, he argues that he was asleep in a separate and distinct bedroom at the time the child's death occurred. It is important to note, however, that although David E. makes this last contention on appeal, he presented no evidence whatsoever to support it in the proceeding below. In contrast, the Appellee, as well as the guardian ad litem, contend that David E., as an adult present in the home at the time of Allen Ray's death, had a duty to protect his children and Allen Ray from the harm which occurred in the home or, if the opportunity to protect was not available, then the duty to cooperate in identifying the perpetrator. Finally, the Appellee argues that David E. resided with his children in a filthy house at the time his children were removed from his custody, which was indicative of the fact that the Appellant also was ignoring his duty to provide a clean house, plumbing facilities in working order and adequate furnishings for his children. See footnote 20

The thrust of David E.'s argument centers upon the lack of evidence that he was actually present at the time the child was killed and the fact that the deceased child was not his. Based on these factors, he contends that his parental rights were improperly terminated because he did not "knowingly or intentionally inflict[ ], attempt to inflict or knowingly allow[ ] another person to inflict, physical injury ... upon ... another child in the home...." W.Va.Code § 49-1-3(a)(1) (1995) (emphasis added). It is apparent from the statute, however, that the Appellant's contention that the statutory term "knowingly" connotes only actual presence at the time the fatal injury was inflicted is flawed.

Implicit in the definition of an abused child under West Virginia Code § 49-1-3 is the child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by a parent or guardian who fails to cooperate in identifying the perpetrator of abuse, See footnote 21 rather choosing to remain silent. There is no basis in law for requiring that a court be disallowed from considering a parent's or guardian's choice to remain silent as evidence of civil culpability. See footnote 22 Moreover, the invocation of silence by a parent or guardian in an abuse and neglect proceeding goes to the heart of the treatability question which is essential in these cases, as the nature of the proceedings is remedial and not punitive. See footnote 23 Thus, in order to remedy the abuse and/or neglect problem, the problem must first be acknowledged. Failure to acknowledge the existence of the problem, i.e., the truth of the basic allegation pertaining to the alleged abuse and neglect or the perpetrator of said abuse and neglect, results in making the problem untreatable and in making an improvement period an exercise in futility at the child's expense.

Furthermore, as the United States Supreme Court stated in Baxter v. Palmigiano, 425 U.S. 308, 96 S.Ct. 1551, 47 L.Ed.2d 810 (1976), "the prevailing rule [is] that the Fifth Amendment does not forbid adverse inferences against parties to civil actions when they refuse to testify in response to probative evidence offered against them: the Amendment 'does not preclude the inference where the privilege is claimed by a party to a civil cause.' " See footnote 24 Id. at 318, 96 S.Ct. at 1558 (quoting 8 J. Wigmore, Evidence 439 (McNaughton rev. 1961); see 1 Franklin D. Cleckley, Handbook on Evidence for West Virginia Lawyers § 5-2(B)(1) (3rd ed.1994). Moreover, "aside from the privilege against compelled self-incrimination, the Court has consistently recognized that in proper circumstances silence in the face of accusation is a relevant fact not barred by the Due Process Clause." 425 U.S. at 319, 96 S.Ct. at 1558. " 'Silence is often evidence of the most persuasive character.' " Id. (quoting United States ex rel. Bilokumsky v. Tod, 263 U.S. 149, 153-54, 44 S.Ct. 54, 56, 68 L.Ed. 221 (1923)). Accordingly, because the purpose of an abuse and neglect proceeding is remedial, where the parent or guardian fails to respond to probative evidence offered against him/her during the course of an abuse and neglect proceeding, a lower court may properly consider that individual's silence as affirmative evidence of that individual's culpability.

In the present case, we are hard-pressed to accept David E.'s circuitous reasoning that if one "hears no evil, sees no evil and speaks no evil," then no evil exists. The lower court was presented with clear and convincing, as well as unrefuted, evidence which established that David E. was present in the home where both the deceased child and his children resided at the time the deceased child suffered his fatal injuries. Further, Detective Scheidler, the investigating officer, testified that he did not receive any information from the adults present in the home the night the child died concerning the circumstances leading to the child's death, despite the medical examiner's report that the child's injuries were sustained as a result of "shaken baby syndrome" and were not consistent with accidental injury. Finally, even though Mike C. and Rosalee S. did not mention David E.'s presence at the time of Allen Ray's death in their respective statements, both statements indicated that Allen Ray's death was caused by his mother's boyfriend, in the home in which David E. was also present. See footnote 25 With all the commotion surrounding Allen Ray's death, as described by the children and as substantiated by other evidence submitted before the lower court, we cannot conclude that the lower court was clearly erroneous See footnote 26 in its factual determination that the death occurred while the child was in the custody of the Appellants, and that they failed to cooperate in identifying the perpetrator. See footnote 27 In the face of knowledge of abuse, David E. chose to remain silent and, thereby, clearly failed to take steps to identify the perpetrator. The failure to identify the abuser creates such a hostile and unsafe atmosphere that it effectively would have placed his children in jeopardy had they remained in his custody. See In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 35, 435 S.E.2d 162, 173 (1993).

DORIS S. AND MELISSA C.

Like David E., the Appellants, Melissa C. and Doris S., argue that the trial court was not presented with clear and convincing evidence which would justify a termination of their parental rights. As support for their argument, these Appellants assert there was no evidence of abuse and neglect other than "the probably tainted and unreliable proffered statements of the children." Further, the Appellants maintain that there was never a rationally-based allegation that the "living" children were in any kind of danger. Finally, the Appellants contend that they voluntarily did everything in their power to cooperate with law enforcement personnel in investigating Allen Ray's death, yet claim they were deemed uncooperative because they could not provide more information about the child's death and because they would not fabricate an acceptable explanation for the death. See footnote 28 In contrast, the Appellee asserts that the Appellants' parental rights were properly terminated on the grounds that there was no reasonable likelihood that conditions of abuse and neglect could be substantially corrected based on the evidence developed which included: 1) the child's death in the Appellants' home; 2) the information supplied by the Appellants was inconsistent with the police investigation and the Appellants failed to cooperate in solving the child's death; and 3) the evidence of the Appellants' gross neglect of these children.

First, with regard to Doris S., in syllabus point three of In re Betty J.W., 179 W.Va. 605, 371 S.E.2d 326 (1988), we held that

> W.Va.Code, 49-1-3(a) (1984), in part, defines an abused child to include one whose parent knowingly allows another person to commit the abuse. Under this standard, termination of parental rights is usually upheld only where the parent takes no action in the face of knowledge of the abuse or actually aids or protects the abusing parent.

Id. at 606, 371 S.E.2d at 327, Syl. Pt. 3; see Syl. Pt. 3, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. at 25-26, 435 S.E.2d at 163-64.

The evidence presented against Doris S. included not only the statements made by her daughter and Mike C., which placed her in the room when her son, Allen Ray, suffered his fatal injuries, but also Rosalee's statement to her aunt, that the child's mother had told her not to tell anyone about the events surrounding her brother's death. Moreover, the only explanations See footnote 29offered by Doris S. are inconsistent with the uncontroverted medical evidence admitted before the trial court which established that Allen Ray's death was not accidental in nature. Consequently, it is obvious that Doris S. not only refused to protect her child, but insists on protecting the suspected abuser of her child. See footnote 30

With regard to Melissa C.'s contention that clear and convincing evidence was not presented to justify termination of parental rights, West Virginia Code § 49-1-3 defines an abused child as "a child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by ... [a] parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home...." Id. § 49-1-3(a)(1). Thus, it is clear that pursuant to the provisions of West Virginia Code § 49-1-3(a)(1), the definition of child abuse encompasses a parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly allows another person to inflict physical injury upon another child residing in the same home as the parent and his/her child(ren), even though that child is not the parent's natural or adopted child.

Precedent in this area includes In re Darla B., 175 W.Va. 137, 331 S.E.2d 868 (1985), a case in which the appellant father asserted that his parental rights should not have been terminated because "he was not a direct participant in the acts giving rise to the petition." See footnote 31 Id. at 141, 331 S.E.2d 873. In upholding the termination, > [w]e note[d] that appellant ... supports the testimony of his wife entirely, even though the explanation is inconsistent with the medical evidence. See footnote 32 Further, he testified that he was in attendance when the first injury to Darla B. occurred, which involved the child's right frontal lobe. See footnote 33 Importantly, the explanation given for this injury by both appellants is inconsistent with the medical evidence. Aside from his direct support of his wife's version of the reasons for the infant's injuries, it is ludicrous for him to assert that he should be held blameless for his nonaction in protecting his child.

> Id. (footnotes added).

Next, in In re Scottie D., 185 W.Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214 (1991), the Department of Human Services appealed the circuit court's final order which concluded that the appellee father "did not neglect or abuse his children ... within the meaning of W.Va.Code, 49-1-3 [1984]" and further found that there was no evidence of abuse by the appellee. Id. at 193, 406 S.E.2d at 216. The evidence indicated that three-year-old Rebecca, the natural daughter of the appellee's wife, was admitted to the emergency room suffering from severe submersion burns to both her feet; a laceration on one foot; cigarette burns which were secondary to the submersion burns; a laceration on her lip; bruises on her back; and spots on her head where her hair had apparently been pulled out. Id. While Rebecca's mother's testimony indicated that all of the child's injuries were accidental in nature, both Rebecca and Scottie D., See footnote 34 the appellee's natural son, who was not adopted by the appellee's wife, testified that the injuries had been intentionally inflicted by the appellee and his wife. Id. at 193-94, 406 S.E.2d at 216-17. We found that the father's testimony was > consistent with ... [the mother's] to the extent that it [wa]s supportive of her testimony. In addition to denying the commission of any abusive acts toward the children, the appellee essentially testified that he believed that the injuries to the children occurred in the manner as expressed to him by his wife....

Id. at 195, 406 S.E.2d at 218. Finally, the appellee testified that he was not present at the time Rebecca suffered the burns to her feet. Id.

Upon review, "we fail[ed] to see how the circuit court reached the conclusion that the appellee's children [we]re not abused within the meaning of W.Va.Code, 49-1-3 ... insofar as their father is concerned." Id. at 197, 406 S.E.2d at 220. Accordingly, we held that > [t]ermination of parental rights of a pare nt of an abused child is aut horized under W.Va.Code, 49- 6-1 to 49- 6-10, as amended, where s uch parent contends nonparticipation in the acts giving rise to the termination petition but there is clear and convincing evid ence that such nonparticipating parent knowingly took no action to prevent or stop such acts to protect the child. Furthermore, termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W.V a.Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as am ended, w here such nonparticipating parent supports the other parent' s version as to how a child's injuries occurred, but there is clear and convincing e vidence that such version is inconsistent with the medical evidence.

> 185 W.Va. at 197, 406 S.E.2d at 220 and Syl. Pt. 2.

In a case analogous to the instant case, In re Jeffrey R.L., the infant child was diagnosed as suffering from battered child syndrome. Jeffrey R.L.'s mother denied knowing the cause of her child's injuries and suggested that the child had sustained the injuries "while rolling around in his crib." 190 W.Va. at 27, 435 S.E.2d at 165. A pediatrician testified that it would have been "impossible" for Jeffrey to sustain the injuries in the manner suggested by his mother, indicating rather that "great force would be necessary to cause fractures of the ribs, and that the other fractures ... [the child] sustained were 'consistent with a twisting, torsion, shaking of limbs[.]' " Id. at 27-28, 435 at 166 (some alterations in original). Both of the child's parents admitted that some trauma occurred, but neither parent admitted to inflicting the trauma upon the child or identified the perpetrator. Id. at 29, 435 S.E.2d at 167. Finally, a DHHR representative testified that while they had no evidence that either of Jeffrey's parents caused his injuries, "if the DHHR does not know who the perpetrator of the abuse is then they believe the child would be at risk to be placed back into the home." Id. at 30, 435 S.E.2d at 168.

In determining whether the trial court erred in failing to terminate the parental right of both parents, as well as whether the trial court abused its discretion in returning custody of Jeffrey to his mother, we expounded on the parents' duty to identify the perpetrator of child abuse before a circuit court should ever consider reuniting the child with the parents. Id. at 32- 35, 435 S.E.2d at 170-73. We adamantly stated that > [e]stablishing the identity of the person or pers ons who inflicted these injuries on Jeffrey R.L. is crucial to hi s health, safety and welfare.... Yet, despite the fact that the perpetrator ha s not been identified, the circuit court returned custody of Jeffrey R.L. to his mother. We find that the circuit court clearly erred in returning Jeffre y R.L. to his mo ther before the perpetrator who inflicted such extensive physical abuse on this helpless infant has been identified.

> There is no reasonable likelihood t hat the conditions of abus e can be substantially corrected because the pe rpetrator of Jeffrey R.L.' s p hysical > abuse has not been identified. Jeffrey R.L., due to his young age and physical condition, needs consistent close interaction with fully committed adults. Jeffrey R.L.'s health, safety and welfare would be seriously threatened if he were to be placed back into the environment where he suffered extensive physical injuries when his abuser has not been identified. Therefore, because it appears that Jeffrey R.L.'s abuser will never be identified, this Court will not place him back into the environment where he suffered his abuse.

>
> Id. at 35, 435 S.E.2d at 173.

We held in syllabus point three of Jeffrey R.L. that:

> Parental rights may be terminated where there is clear and convincing evidence that the infant child has suffered extensive physical abuse while in the custody of his or her parents, and there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified and the parents, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, have taken no action to identify the abuser.

Id. at 25-26, 435 S.E.2d at 164; see In re Danielle T., 195 W.Va. 530, 535, 466 S.E.2d 189, 194 (1995) (terminating parental rights and finding that trial court committed reversible error in granting improvement period where neither of child's parents acknowledged abuse or neglect of child and parents "sought to explain Danielle's burn and malnutrition conditions with testimony inconsistent with the medical evidence"); In re Brianna Elizabeth M., 192 W.Va. 363, 367, 452 S.E.2d 454, 458 (1994) (reversing lower court's decision granting father improvement period, where father "insisted that he did not know how such horrendous injuries had been inflicted, and he repeatedly refused to acknowledge that his wife could be the abuser even in the fac[e] of overwhelming medical evidence of extreme child abuse[,]" stating that "the rights of children to be free from abuse require that a parent's first loyalty be to the protection of his or her children"); State v. Jessica M., 191 W.Va. 302, 308, 445 S.E.2d 243, 249 (1994) (stating that "it is further troubling to this Court that ... [mother] has failed to acknowledge ... [husband's] abusive behavior towards her children and to identify him as the abuser").

Even though we have recognized "the constitutionally-protected right of the natural parent to the custody of his or her minor children, we have also emphasized that such right is not absolute." In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. at 32, 435 S.E.2d at 170. Furthermore, we explained that this right to custody "is limited and qualified by the fitness of the parent to honor the trust of the guardianship and custody of the child." In re: Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 238, 207 S.E.2d 129, 137 (1973). Thus, the above-mentioned case law clearly establishes that the term "knowingly" as used in West Virginia Code § 49-1-3(a)(1), does not require that a parent actually be present at the time the abuse occurs, but rather that the parent was presented with sufficient facts from which he/she could have and should have recognized that abuse occurred. This interpretation of the term "knowingly" arises from a parent's paramount duties of loyalty to his/her child(ren) and to provide such child(ren) with a safe environment free from abuse and neglect, both of which are crucial to ensuring a child's health, safety and welfare.

Extending our decision in In re Jeffrey R.L., we hold that a parent's parental rights to his/her child(ren) may be terminated: 1) where there is clear and convincing evidence that the parent knowingly allowed another person to inflict extensive physical injury upon another child residing in the same home as the parent and his/her child(ren), even though the injured child is not the parent's natural or adopted child; and 2) where there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified and the parent, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, has taken no action to identify the abuser. See Syl. Pt. 3, 190 W.Va. at 25-26, 435 S.E.2d at 163-64.

We find that even though the deceased child was not Melissa C.'s, she knowingly allowed another person to inflict extensive physical injury upon the child who resided in the same home as she and her children. Unlike the Appellant David E., the clear and convincing evidence established that Melissa C. was actually present at the time her nephew, Allen Ray, was shaken to death. Melissa C., like the other two Appellants, has never taken steps to identify the abuser and has only offered evidence which conflicts with the medical evidence. Thus, both Doris S. and Melissa C. simply have chosen to ignore the unrefuted evidence presented against them, choosing to continue to protect the abuser's identity. It is that choice which ultimately caused the trial court's proper termination of their parental rights. We therefore find no abuse of discretion.

IMPROVEMENT PERIOD

The next issue is whether the trial court denied the Appellants a meaningful improvement period. The Appellant David E., without any supporting authority, maintains that he was not given a meaningful improvement period and that only "[t]he guise of a six (6) month improvement period is reflected in a Court Order entered September 14, 1993[.]" The Appellants, Melissa C. and Doris S., maintain that they were never granted an actual improvement period, See footnote 35 that the circuit court never made any findings of fact that compelling circumstances existed which justified a denial of an improvement period and that a family case plan was never developed and submitted in accordance with West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(b). See footnote 36 The Appellee, however, argues that the record indicates that the Appellant was granted an improvement period.

At the outset we note that the record is clear that all of the Appellants were granted an improvement period. By two separate orders each dated July 8, 1993, each of the Appellants were granted a six-month improvement period, wherein the DHHR was given physical and legal custody of the children, with the Appellants receiving visitation rights. The circuit court, however, placed the following restriction on the improvement period: "A condition of the improvement period shall be that the respondent ... fully cooperate, within Constitutional limits, into the investigation of the death of Alan Ray S [.]...." Thus, the crux of the Appellants' argument is whether the imposition of this condition denies them a "meaningful" improvement period.

West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(b) provides:

> In any proceeding under this artic le, any parent or custodian may, prior to final hearing, move to be allowed an improvement period of three to twelve months in order to remedy the circumstances or alleged circumstances upon which the proceeding is based. The court shall allow one suc h improvement period unless it finds co mpelling circumstances to justify a denial thereof, but may require tem porary custody with a responsible relative, which may include any parent, guardian, or other custodian, or the state department or other agency during the improvement period. An order granting such im provement period sha ll require the department to prepare and submit to the court a family case plan in accordance with the provisions of section three [§ 49-6D-3], article six-d of this chapter.

W.Va.Code § 49-6-2(b). It is clear from the statute that a circuit court may deny an improvement period where "compelling circumstances" exist. Id. Further, we have previously determined that the compelling circumstances necessary to deny a request for an improvement period exist where a parent, who knows that abuse has occurred, refuses to identify a perpetrator of abuse and neglect. In re Jeffrey R. L., 190 W.Va. at 35, 435 S.E.2d at 173; In re Darla B., 175 W.Va. at 141, 331 S.E.2d at 872.

Where, however, a circuit court does not deny an improvement period on the grounds of compelling circumstances, we have recently stated the "importance of circuit courts crafting improvement periods in a manner designed to remedy the problem that led to the abuse and neglect action." In re Renae Ebony W., 192 W.Va. 421, 426-27, 452 S.E.2d 737, 742-43 (1994). In Renae Ebony W., we reiterated the principles previously established in In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991):

> 'The goal [of im provement periods and fam ily case plans] shoul d be t he development of a program designed t o assist the parent(s) in dea ling with any problems which interfere with his ability to be an effective parent and to foster an im proved relations hip between parent a nd c hild with an eventual r estoration of full parent al rights a hoped-for result. The improvement period and family case plans must establish specific measures for the achievement of these goals, as an improvement period must be more than a mere passage of time. It is a period in w hich the D.H. S. and t he > court should attempt to facilitate the parent's success, but wherein the parent must understand t hat he be ars a responsi bility to demonstrate sufficient progress and improvement to justify return to him of the child.'

192 W.Va. at 427, 452 S.E.2d at 743 (quoting, in part, Carlita B., 185 W.Va. at 625, 408 S.E.2d at 377) (alteration not in original).

It is apparent in this case that the circuit court decided to give the Appellants another opportunity to determine whether their priorities lay in protecting the safety of their children or in protecting the abuser, rather than to deny outright their request for an improvement period. The circuit court's opinion reflects its attempt to design an improvement period which would help the Appellants remedy the abuse and neglect. In order to achieve that goal, the circuit court determined that it was vitally important for the Appellants to cooperate with law enforcement and that such abuse and neglect could not be remedied without that necessary cooperation. Consequently, the imposition of such a condition comports with this Court's recent decisions in which we have found that circuit courts have erroneously granted improvement periods where the parents have either failed to acknowledge that any abuse and neglect have occurred and/or refused to identify the abuser, where there was knowledge of abuse. See In re Danielle T., 195 W.Va. at 535, 466 S.E.2d at 194 (finding that circuit court improperly granted improvement period where parents failed to identify abuser and failed to acknowledge that abuse and neglect of child had occurred); In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. at 35, 435 S.E.2d at 173 (stating that "reunification between Jeffrey R.L. and his parents is not in his best interests because his parents have not identified his abuser"); see also Syllabus, In re Renae Ebony W., 192 W.Va. at 422, 452 S.E.2d at 738 (holding that in-home improvement periods should not be granted where child removed from home on emergency basis because of finding of imminent danger until circumstances constituting imminent danger cease to exist or alleged abusing person has been precluded from residing in or visiting home). Therefore, the Appellants were not denied a meaningful improvement period simply because they were required to cooperate with law enforcement.

Based on the foregoing opinion, we find that the Circuit Court of Cabell County committed no error and, accordingly, affirm.

Footnote: 1 A joint appeal was filed by Melissa C. and Doris S., while David E. filed a separate appeal. We consolidated the appeals because the termination of parental rights arose out of the same facts.

Footnote: 2 Melissa C. and Doris S. are sisters who are represented by the same counsel and raise the same errors on appeal.

Footnote: 3 David E. is married to Appellant Melissa C.

Footnote: 4 David E.'s attorney elicited this opinion during his cross- examination of the officer. There were no objections raised as to the officer's expertise in rendering such an opinion.

Footnote: 5 The information given to the detective revealed that David E. and his children stayed in a separate bedroom in the dwelling. Moreover, the detective testified that he observed no physical injuries with regard to David E.'s children.

Footnote: 6 According to Detective Scheidler's testimony, Larry C. (also referred to in the transcript as Larry D. and Larry S.) is Melissa's and Doris's brother. The guardian ad litem indicated in her brief that according to Detective Scheidler's notes, which are not a part of the record on appeal, Larry C. slept on the couch with Allen Ray, the deceased child. Further, the guardian ad litem stated that "[t]he adults in the home first reported that Larry C. must have rolled over on the infant during the night causing the child to suffocate." No evidence concerning Larry C.'s involvement in the child's death was presented before the trial court, other than the fact that he gave Detective Scheidler a signed statement. As we recently noted in Powderidge Unit Owners Association v. Highland Properties, Ltd., 196 W.Va. 692, 474 S.E.2d 872 (1996), evidence not submitted before the trial court may not be considered by this Court on appeal. Id. at 703, 474 S.E.2d at 883 n. 16; accord O'Neal v. Peake Operating Co., 185 W.Va. 28, 32, 404 S.E.2d 420, 424 (1991) (stating that "[t]his court may only properly consider those issues which appear in the record before us"). Accordingly, it is the parties' duty to make sure that evidence relevant to a judicial determination be placed in the record before the lower court so that we may properly consider it on appeal. Unfortunately, as an aside, in cases involving abuse and neglect, we are with increasing frequency seeing records wherein the court and attorneys involved failed to observe sufficient formality in building a record. It would behoove the attorneys who undertake representation in abuse and neglect proceedings to be meticulous in presenting evidence and building an adequate record before the lower court documenting their respective cases.

Footnote: 7 James Nance was arrested and charged with Allen Ray's murder; however, he was released from custody after a no probable cause determination was made at the preliminary hearing. Mr. Nance was not the father of any of the subject children; however, the Appellant, Doris S., did give birth to Mr. Nance's child subsequent to the lower court's termination of her parental rights. According to Doris S.'s brief, the Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") has instructed her not to let Mr. Nance have any contact with the infant or they will seek custody of the child.

Footnote: 8 All of the Appellants entered into stipulations reflected in two separate court orders dated May 27, 1993, that the "house in which the said infant children were residing at the time of the filing of this petition was filthy, and inadequate in plumbing and furnishings to provide for young children." The court-appointed special advocate report dated July 7, 1993, described this filth further as "feces, garbage and maggots."

Finally the petition filed in 93-J-267 stated that there are "no bathroom facilities ... and there are maggets (sic) and rats in one room." Furthermore, Detective Scheidler testified that [a]s you enter the front door, immediately straight ahead is a sofa.... To the left of that was a bedroom with a single bed in it, and to the left of that as you enter is an extra ... bedroom, but it was filled with garbage and trash that was three, four foot in depth. Again, as you enter the front door, to the right is the kitchen. Then through the kitchen is another bedroom on the extreme end of the house.

Footnote: 9 An emergency hearing was held on April 20, 1993, with Melissa C. and David E. present. The court, based on a finding of imminent danger to the children, placed legal and physical custody of the children with the DHHR. Likewise, by order entered April 23, 1993, Doris S. stipulated that there was imminent danger to the children and allowed temporary legal and physical custody of her child to be placed with the DHHR.

Footnote: 10 Phyllis Justice, Rosalee's aunt, also testified that Rosalee told her that "Mommy had told her [Rosalee] not to say anything."

Footnote: 11 Ms. Justice's testimony was also offered to corroborate that "[t]he only one ... [Rosalee] is really afraid of is Jimmy. And the only other thing that Rosalee tells us is, '[a]s long as Mommy is with Jimmy,' she don't want to see Mommy either, because she is afraid of Jimmy."

Footnote: 12 The Appellants, Melissa C. and Doris S., now claim that these statements were "probably tainted and unreliable" since they were "made after many months of counseling and contact with law enforcement and human services support personnel almost exclusively." The record, however, reflects that these statements were admitted in evidence without any objection by any of the Appellants. Moreover, these two children were in separate placements at the time they came forward with their respective statements.

Footnote: 13 The lower court found Rosalee S. psychologically unavailable for testimony. This finding was based on Rosalee's counselor's, Elizabeth Brachna's, testimony that her "concern for ... [Rosalee's] emotional health would be that this child would become extremely agitated, possible very withdrawn and depressed afterwards, as a long-term effect [of testifying]." Moreover, the counselor did not "believe that ... [Rosalee] could verbalize to the Court what she ha[d] told ... [the counselor] in therapeutic sessions[.]" Ms. Brachna also stated that the child is terrified and "feels that she will be killed if she talks about any of these things that she has been told not to say." While the court made no concomitant finding with respect to Mike C., the Appellee did lay a foundation regarding why this child could not testify. Specifically, when Ms. Lucy Earl, Mike and Scott C.'s therapist, was asked whether Mike or Scott could testify regarding Allen Ray's death, she responded that "[n]either of the boys are able to talk about the death of the baby. They become extremely anxious, very upset.... It would be extremely traumatizing for the children to try to testify." Furthermore, the Appellants did not object to the admissibility of Mike C.'s statements. Since none of the Appellants either objected below, or made this issue the subject of an assignment of error, we need not address it further.

Footnote: 14 Ms. Brachna testified that Rosalee told her the same story at least four times and each account of the events was consistent with the prior versions.

Footnote: 15 Ms. Brachna used clay and art work in her therapy with Rosalee.

Footnote: 16 Corporal Tom McComas of the Cabell County Sheriff's Department offered testimony that he was a hunter and that the placement of the child in the creek postmortem was similar to what some hunters do when they kill a large animal ... and they're going to be unable to skin the animal or get it to a meat processing plant for a period of time, there's a chance of spoilage of the meat[.] [I]t's common practice if you're near a creek or a mountain stream to ... put the animal in the stream. That keeps the tissues from spoiling, the blood from really setting in, coagulating in the meat tissues....
The trial court struck the above-mentioned testimony based upon the Appellant's, David E.'s, objection that it was purely speculation.

Footnote: 17 Ms. Brachna testified that Rosalee also showed her a hole when she and the child visited the scene during the course of Rosalee's therapy. Rosalee indicated that it was an area where they played. The Appellee also offered the testimony of Corporal Tom McComas of the Cabell County Sheriff's Department who went to the property and found the hole, thereby corroborating Scott's testimony concerning the existence of a hole.

Footnote: 18 The Appellants, Melissa C. and Doris S., assert that the reason they did not testify was somehow connected with a request to have their counsel replaced. A review of the record, however, reflects no correlation between the Appellants' refusal to testify and their request to have new counsel appointed. We, therefore, find no merit regarding the Appellants' assertion.

Footnote: 19 The lower court "expressly decline[d] to rule on the parental rights of Brian C[ ][.], father of Brian "Scott" C[ ][.] and Larry "Mike" C [ ][.], and Mark S[ ][.], father of Rosalee S[ ][.], on the grounds that both fathers have represented, through counsel, their willingness to fully and completely relinquish their parental rights to assure permanent placement of their children." At oral argument, we directed the guardian ad litem to obtain from the circuit court the necessary order terminating Brian C.'s and Mark S.'s parental rights in this matter.

Footnote: 20 The DHHR averred in its April 23, 1993, petition seeking the temporary custody of David E.'s children that "the house were [sic] the children reside is filthy, there is inadequate furniture, no bathroom facilities, kitchen is unclean, and there are maggots and rats in one room." The Appellee presented evidence before the trial court which substantiated this allegation, but the lower court made no finding with respect to the condition of the house.

Footnote: 21 We have previously held in syllabus point three of In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993) that [p]arental rights may be terminated where there is clear and convincing evidence that the infant child has suffered extensive physical abuse while in the custody of his or her parents, and there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified and the parents, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, have taken no action to identify the abuser.
Id. at 25-26, 435 S.E.2d at 164.

Footnote: 22 Such a parent or guardian may be invoking his/her right to remain silent pursuant to the Fifth Amendment because that individual also may be facing criminal charges arising out of the abuse and neglect of the child. The rights of the criminally accused are sufficiently protected, however, by the following statutory provisions: 1) West Virginia Code § 49-6-4(a) (1995) which allows medical and mental examinations of the child or other parties involved in an abuse and neglect proceeding provides that "[n]o evidence acquired as a result of any such examination of the parent or any other person having custody of the child may be used against such person in any subsequent criminal proceedings against such person; 2) West Virginia Code § 49-7-1 (1995) provides that "[a]ll records of the state department, the court and its officials, law-enforcement agencies and other agencies or facilities concerning a child as defined in this chapter shall be kept confidential and shall not be released ...[;]" and 3) West Virginia Code § 57-2-3 (1966) provides that "[i]n a criminal prosecution other than for perjury or false swearing, evidence shall not be given against the accused of any statement made by him as a witness upon a legal examination."

Footnote: 23 This concept is clearly established by West Virginia Code § 49-1-1(a) (1995) which provides:
(a) The purpose of this chapter is to provide a comprehensive system of child welfare throughout the State which will assure to each child such care and guidance, preferably in his or her home, and will serve the spiritual, emotional, mental and physical welfare of the child; preserve and strengthen the child's family ties whenever possible with recognition of the fundamental rights of parenthood and with recognition of the State's responsibility to assist the family in providing necessary education and training.... In pursuit of these goals it is the intention of the legislature to provide for removing the child from the custody of parents only when the child's welfare ... cannot be adequately safeguarded without removal.... Id.

Footnote: 24 See Allen v. Illinois, 478 U.S. 364, 106 S.Ct. 2988, 92 L.Ed.2d 296 (1986) (holding that purpose behind Illinois' Sexually Dangerous Persons Act was treatment of sexually dangerous persons; therefore, proceedings conducted pursuant to Act were not considered criminal and privilege was not available).

Footnote: 25 Even without the statements made by the children Mike C. and Rosalee S., there was still unrefuted evidence that a death, that was determined to be not accidental, occurred in the home occupied by the parents, who are the subject of the present appeal. Additionally, the unrefuted evidence established that not one of those parents came forward with any information or knowledge concerning the death, even though the deceased child presumably laid on the sofa in living room as an inanimate object for a period of time.

Footnote: 26 See In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996) (holding that trial court's findings of fact in abuse and neglect proceedings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous).

Footnote: 27 David E. argues that the Appellee failed to present the trial court with clear and convincing evidence that there was no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse could be substantially corrected. West Virginia Code § 49-6-5 (1995) defines "no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected" as meaning "that, based upon the evidence before the court, the abusing adult or adults have demonstrated an inadequate capacity to solve the problems of abuse or neglect, on their own or with help." See id. § 49-6-5(b). We interpreted the meaning of this phrase in Jeffrey R.L., wherein we held that where a parent has knowledge of abuse and, in the face of such knowledge, fails to take action to identify the abuser, then no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected exists. See 190 W.Va. at 25-26, 435 S.E.2d at 163-64, Syl. Pt. 3. The record in the instant case demonstrates that the Appellee met its burden concerning this issue and, therefore, the circuit court committed no error with regard to its ruling on this matter.

Footnote: 28 We are unpersuaded by the Appellants' attorney's characterization of the events which led to the termination of their parental rights as a witch hunt, arising out of the "unexplained death [ ]" of a child. To advance such an argument requires one to ignore the uncontroverted evidence in this case that this child's death has a very concrete explanation--an adult shook him to death!

Footnote: 29 Both Doris S. and Melissa C. now assert the following: 1) that "the adults could have easily been in their own areas of the house apart from the child" at the time the injuries were sustained; 2) that "[o]ne of the larger children bouncing up and down upon the baby lying on the couch could have easily caused the hemorrhage that resulted in his death[;]" and 3) that there is simply no explanation for the child's death. We are mindful that none of this evidence was presented before the trial court for its consideration in rendering its decision. Moreover, we are not a fact-finding court and, therefore, it is improper for us to consider facts which were not admitted before the trial court.

Footnote: 30 The record reflects that Doris S. continues to associate with the suspected abuser, James Nance, in that she has had a child by him since this termination proceeding originated.

Footnote: 31 The approximately five-week-old infant child was hospitalized after sustaining a skull fracture, a brain contusion, fractures of the leg, arm and collarbone, and swellings over the mouth and eye. Id. at 138, 331 S.E.2d at 870.

Footnote: 32 The child's mother testified that the child may have been accidentally injured during an episode in which she determined that her child was not breathing. The mother testified that she shook the child and struck her on the back in an attempt to get the child to start breathing again. Id. at 139, 331 S.E.2d at 871 n. 1.

Footnote: 33 The parents claimed that the child was accidentally struck on the left side of her head when the child was being carried by her mother and her head came into contact with a gun rack. See id.

Footnote: 34 There was also evidence of child abuse with regard to Scottie D. Id. at 193-94, 406 S.E.2d at 216-17.

Footnote: 35 The Appellants also contend, within the same paragraph of their brief, that "[t]hough neither the appellants or their trial counsel knew it, an order granting an improvement period (with the contingency clause regarding their cooperation with law enforcement) was entered[,]" and that they were "denied an improvement period contrary to law."

Footnote: 36 The record suggests that the Appellee did develop, prepare and submit a family case plan. An order dated July 8, 1993, provides that "[w]hereupon, respondent, Doris S[.] ..., acknowledged receipt of the Family Service Plan and that she had had time to review the Plan with her counsel." The identical language is also found in a July 8, 1993, order regarding Melissa C.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "It is well established that the word 'shall,' in the absence of language in the statute showing a contrary intent on the part of the Legislature, should be afforded a mandatory connotation." Syllabus Point 1, Nelson v. West Virginia Public Employees Insurance Board, 171 W.Va. 445, 300 S.E.2d 86 (1982).

2. Multidisciplinary treatment teams must assess, plan, and implement service plans pursuant to W.Va. Code § 49-5D-3.

3. The language of W.Va. Code § 49-5D-3 is mandatory and requires the Department of Health and Human Resources to convene and direct treatment teams not only for juveniles involved in delinquency proceedings, but also for victims of abuse and neglect.

4. "While a circuit court should give preference to in-state facilities for the placement of juveniles, if it determines that no in-state facility can provide the services and/or security necessary to deal with the juvenile's specific problems, then it may place the child in an out-of-state facility. In making an out-of-state placement, the circuit court shall make findings of fact with regard to the necessity for such placement." Syllabus Point 6, State v. Frazier, 198 W.Va. 678, 482 S.E.2d 663 (1996).

5. Circuit courts may specify direct placements of juveniles in out-of- state facilities only: (1) if in accord with the plan(s) of the juvenile's multidisciplinary team, or if not in accord with that plan(s), then (2) after the circuit court has made specific findings of fact, following an evidentiary hearing, that the plan(s) of the juvenile's multidisciplinary treatment team is inadequate to meet the child's needs.

Maynard, Justice:
In this case we are presented with two certified questions from the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, West Virginia, regarding the utilization of multidisciplinary treatment teams when children are involved in delinquency proceedings.

The questions certified to this Court and the circuit court's answers are:

> 1.Whether multidisciplinary team assessments, plans, and service plan implementation must be developed pursuant to W.Va. Code § 49-5D-3.
> Circuit court's answer: YES
>
> 2. Whether courts may specify direct placements of juveniles in out-of-state/area facilities only: (1) if in accord with the plan(s) of the juvenile's multidisciplinary team, or if not in accord with that plan(s), then (2) after the circuit court has made specific fact-based findings following an evidentiary hearing that the plan(s) of the juvenile's multidisciplinary treatment team is inadequate to meet the child's needs.
> Circuit court's answer: YES

The facts are not in dispute and were stipulated by the parties below. R.A.R. See footnote 1is a sixteen year old minor resident of Marion County, West Virginia. He is currently in the custody of the Department of Health and Human Resources (DHHR) and has been placed by the circuit court in an out-of-state facility.

Psychological evaluations have arrived at varying diagnoses. One evaluation determined R.A.R. suffered from attention deficit hyperactivity disorder. R.A.R. has also been diagnosed as suffering from conduct disorder/oppositional defiant disorder, learning disability, substance abuse and dependence, and possible emotional problems.

R.A.R.'s mother sought treatment for R.A.R. at the Olympic Center in Preston County, West Virginia. While at the center, a psychological assessment recommended psychiatric consultation to determine if psychopharmacological treatment was needed for the attention deficit hyperactivity disorder. Also recommended were weekly counseling sessions with a drug and alcohol specialist and participation in Alcoholics Anonymous. R.A.R. did not receive this recommended treatment.

R.A.R. got into trouble for stealing money from his mother by using her ATM card and for fighting with his brother. In December 1995, R.A.R. was placed in Chestnut Ridge Hospital for thirty days and sentenced to two years probation for petit larceny and battery.

While attending day school at Chestnut Ridge Hospital, R.A.R. screened positive for marijuana. As a result, the circuit court sent R.A.R. to the Northern Regional Juvenile Detention Facility in Ohio County, West Virginia, for sixty days. That detention was to be followed by twenty-four hour detention except to attend school. While detained at Northern Regional Juvenile Detention Facility, R.A.R. collapsed during a recreation period due to a rapid heartbeat. R.A.R. was diagnosed with tachardyia arrhythmia at the Ohio State University Heart Center in Columbus, Ohio.

While on probation, R.A.R. had an argument with his mother and ran away from home. One week later, he was taken from a friend's house and sent by the court to the Kanawha County Children's Home for one month. Upon release, R.A.R. was ordered to live with his grandparents outside Pittsburgh. While there, R.A.R. skipped school to visit with friends and returned to Pittsburgh by the end of the school day. As a result of this incident, the court sentenced R.A.R. to serve from fifteen months to two years confinement at High Plains Youth Center, a facility located in Brush, Colorado which is operated by the Rebound Corporation (Rebound).See footnote 2

A petition for writ of habeas corpus and mandamus was filed with this Court on behalf of R.A.R. The circuit court then granted a motion to review R.A.R.'s disposition to Rebound. During that hearing, the court changed R.A.R.'s placement to George Junior Republic juvenile facility in Grove City, Pennsylvania.

R.A.R. did not receive a multidisciplinary treatment team assessment plan during the 1995 and 1996 placements. The record seems to indicate that a multidisciplinary treatment team was established for R.A.R. when he was placed at George Junior Republic; however, the court did not receive or consider information from the team once it was created. Rather, R.A.R.'s dispositions were based solely on the judgment of the circuit court and R.A.R.'s probation officer.

The Circuit Court of Kanawha County, in its order entered on February 10, 1997, considered the questions presented here and found the issue was not moot, even though R.A.R.'s placement had been changed from Rebound to George Junior Republic. The court reasoned that the possibility exists for the issue presented here to be repeated with a different juvenile. The court found "[t]his issue of first impression affects a large number of children in West Virginia and merits authoritative interpretation of this legislation by the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals." The two questions previously noted were thereby certified to this Court.

The circuit court's first certified question to this Court is framed as follows:

> Whether multidisciplinary team assessments, plans, and service plan implementation must be developed pursuant to W.Va. Code § 49-5D- 3 (1996).

The language of W.Va. Code § 49-5D-3See footnote 3is mandatory and requires the DHHR to convene and direct treatment teams not only for juveniles involved in delinquency proceedings, but also for victims of abuse and neglect. This Court previously said, "It is well established that the word 'shall,' in the absence of language in the statute showing a contrary intent on the part of the Legislature, should be afforded a mandatory connotation." Syllabus Point 1, Nelson v. West Virginia Public Employees Insurance Board, 171 W.Va. 445, 300 S.E.2d 86 (1982). The Legislature used the word "shall" in W.Va. Code § 49-5D-3; therefore, West Virginia's fifty-five counties are not granted the discretion as to whether they will establish treatment teams. W.Va. Code § 49-5D-3 is patently clear that this is a mandatory duty.

The original obligation to coordinate treatment teams was first set forth by this Court in the case of In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991). At that time this Court said:

> The formulation of the improvement period and family case plans should therefore be a consolidated, multidisciplinary effort among the court system, the parents, attorneys, social service agencies, and any other helping personnel involved in assisting the family. The > goal should be the development of a program designed to assist the parent(s) in dealing with any problems which interfere with his ability to be an effective parent and to foster an improved relationship between parent and child with an eventual restoration of full parental rights a hoped-for result.

Id. at 625, 408 S.E.2d at 377 (footnote omitted). The multidisciplinary treatment planning process was later mandated by statute and the process is now set forth in W.Va. Code § 49-5D-3.

The purpose of multidisciplinary treatment teams is stated in the statute itself. W.Va. Code § 49-5D-1(a) (1996) provides in pertinent part:

> The purpose of this article is . . . to establish, as a complement to other programs of the department of health and human resources, a multidisciplinary screening, advisory and planning system to assist courts in facilitating permanency planning, following the initiation of judicial proceedings, to recommend alternatives and to coordinate evaluations and in-community services.

The treatment planning process was statutorily mandated to be established in each county by January 1, 1995. Once the process is in place, the treatment teams are directed to "assess, plan and implement" comprehensive, individualized service plans for the children they serve. See footnote 4The comprehensive plan includes child case plans and family plans.

> The makeup of the team is also mandated by statute. The child's or family's case manager convenes and directs the team. Other members include > * the child's custodial parent(s) or guardian(s) > * other immediate family members > * attorney(s) representing the parent(s) of the child if assigned by a judge of the circuit court > * the child
>   (a) if child is over the age of 12 and if child's participation is otherwise appropriate >   (b) if child is under 12, when team determines child's participation is appropriate > * the guardian ad litem > * prosecuting attorney or prosecuting attorney's designee > * any other agency, person or professional who may > contribute to the team's efforts to assist the child and family.

W.Va. Code § 49-5D-3(b) (1996).

The treatment team is mandated to coordinate their activities with local family resource networks as well as with regional child and family service planning committees. This is "to assure the efficient planning and delivery of child and family services on a local and regional level." W.Va. Code § 49-5D-3(c) (1996). There is no statutory requirement that mandates how often a treatment team must meet, but the team must justify the basis for not reviewing a given child's case if the case is not reviewed every six months. W.Va. Code § 49-5D-4 (1994).See footnote 5

Notwithstanding the clear statutory mandates, R.A.R. did not receive an assessment or a service plan prior to the petition in this case being filed in this Court. By failing to follow the statutes, the DHHR has failed to fulfill its statutorily mandated role in R.A.R.'s disposition. The statutes indicate the multidisciplinary team plays a fundamental role in juvenile placements. We therefore hold that multidisciplinary treatment team assessments and individualized service plans must be developed and implemented pursuant to W.Va. Code § 49-5D-3. Accordingly, we answer the first certified question affirmatively.

The second certified question, as set forth above, is as follows:

> Whether courts may specify direct placements of juveniles in out-of-state/area facilities only: (1) if in accord with the plan(s) of the juvenile's multidisciplinary team, or if not in accord with that plan(s), then (2) after the circuit court has made specific findings of fact, following an evidentiary hearing that the plan(s) of the juvenile's multidisciplinary treatment team is inadequate to meet the child's needs.

The parties do not question the authority of circuit courts to place juveniles who are adjudicated delinquent. In fact, the parties acknowledge that this Court has specifically stated, "West Virginia Code § 49-5-13(b) (Supp.1996) expressly grants authority to the circuit courts to make facility-specific decisions concerning juvenile placements." Syllabus Point 1, State v. Frazier, 198 W.Va. 678, 482 S.E.2d 663 (1996). However, the Legislature has also said it is the duty of multidisciplinary treatment teams to provide courts with the information that is necessary to make an informed decision as to which facility can best meet a juvenile's needs. The DHHR must "assist the court in making its placement determination by providing the court with full information on placements and services available both in and out of the community. It is the court's responsibility to determine the placement." Syllabus Point 3, in part, State v. Frazier, 198 W.Va. 678, 482 S.E.2d 663 (1996).

We pause here to note that juvenile out-of-state placements cost West Virginia huge sums of money every year. See footnote 6Also, this Court has previously stated that out- of-state placements are not favored. We realize that it is very difficult, if not impossible, to provide needed family counseling when a child is placed hundreds or thousands of miles away from home and family. These long-distance placements have detrimental emotional effects on children. Therefore, we reiterate this Court's previous holding in syllabus point 6 of State v. Frazier, 198 W.Va. 678, 482 S.E.2d 663 (1996):

> While a circuit court should give preference to in-state facilities for the placement of juveniles, if it determines that no in- state facility can provide the services and/or security necessary to deal with the juvenile's specific problems, then it may place the child in an out-of-state facility. In making an out-of-state placement, the circuit court shall make findings of fact with regard to the necessity for such placement.

That directive remains intact, we are not altering it. Rather, we are expanding it to include the requirement of individualized service plans. If the lower court is going to depart from the recommendations of the multidisciplinary treatment team and thereby place juveniles in out-of-state facilities, then the court must hold a full evidentiary hearing on the adequacy of the individual service plan and the report of the multidisciplinary team. Following the hearing, and before any out-of-state placement can occur, the court must make specific written findings of fact in the dispositional order which set forth with particularity which provisions of the service plan should not be followed and why.

Sending children to an out-of-state facility is strongly disfavored for many reasons. Aside from the cost, which is after all, a legitimate consideration, other important factors weigh heavily against long-distance placements. These include separation from parents and siblings, the loss of emotional support from the extended family, the inability to have meaningful family counseling, and simply the loss of visitation and regular family contact. Accordingly, we believe an out-of-state placement should usually be the disposition of last resort for a child.

In the case of R.A.R., the record indicates that no realistic goals were developed and no service plan was instituted. Here is a juvenile with possible substance abuse problems, a learning disability, and emotional problems who was accused in the court system of nothing more than stealing from his mother and fighting with his brother. Nonetheless, the child was ordered by the court to be placed in a highly secure correctional institution over fifteen hundred miles from his home. If a multidisciplinary treatment team had been convened and had provided the court with information regarding the needs and capabilities of R.A.R., perhaps R.A.R. would have initially been placed at George Junior Republic.

For the foregoing reasons, we find that the institution of multidisciplinary treatment teams is statutorily mandated when a juvenile is adjudicated delinquent or is found to be a victim of abuse and neglect. We agree with the Circuit Court of Kanawha County that once a treatment plan is in place for a juvenile, if the court chooses not to follow the plan and places a child in an out-of-state facility, then the court must hold an evidentiary hearing and make specific findings of fact which explain why the plan was not followed.

Footnote: 2 Rebound is a highly secure facility that serves a correctional, as opposed to rehabilitative, population. Rebound targets males, ages twelve to twenty who are violent offenders, sex offenders and/or arsonists.

Footnote: 3 W.Va. Code § 49-5D-3 (1996) states in pertinent part:

(a) On or before the first day of January, one thousand nine hundred ninety-five, a multidisciplinary treatment planning process shall be established within each county of the state, either separately or in conjunction with a contiguous county by the secretary of the department with advice and assistance from the prosecutor's advisory council as set forth in section four [§ 7-4-4], article four, chapter seven of this code.

Treatment teams shall assess, plan and implement a comprehensive, individualized service plan for children who are victims of abuse or neglect and their families when a judicial proceeding has been initiated involving the child or children and for children and their families involved in delinquency proceedings.

(b) Each treatment team shall be convened and directed by the child's or family's case manager. The treatment team shall consist of the child's custodial parent(s) or guardian(s), other immediate family members, the attorney(s) representing the parent(s) of the child, if assigned by a judge of the circuit court, the child, if the child is over the age of twelve, and if the child's participation is otherwise appropriate, the child, if under the age of twelve when the team determines that the child's participation is appropriate, the guardian ad litem, the prosecuting attorney or his or her designee, and any other agency, person or professional who may contribute to the team's efforts to assist the child and family.

Footnote: 4 See supra note 4 for the relevant language of W.Va. Code § 49-5D-3.

Footnote: 5 W.Va. Code 49-5D-4 (1994) states in pertinent part:

All persons directing any team created pursuant to this article shall maintain records of each meeting indicating the name and position of persons attending each meeting and the number of cases discussed at the meeting, including a designation of whether or not that case was previously discussed by any multidisciplinary team. . . . All treatment teams shall maintain a log of all cases to indicate the basis for failure to review a case for a period in excess of six months.

JUSTICE ALBRIGHT delivered the Opinion of the Court.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syl. Pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

2. "In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions." Syl. Pt. 1, In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973).

3. "The purpose of the family case plan as set out in W.Va. Code, 49-6D-3(a) (1984), is to clearly set forth an organized, realistic method of identifying family problems and the logical steps to be used in resolving or lessening these problems." Syl. Pt. 5, State ex rel. W.Va. Dep't of Human Servs. v. Cheryl M., 177 W. Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987).

4. Where a trial court order terminating parental rights merely declares that there is no reasonable likelihood that a parent can eliminate the conditions of neglect, without explicitly stating factual findings in the order or on the record supporting such conclusion, and fails to state statutory findings required by West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) (1998) (Repl. Vol. 2001) on the record or in the order, the order is inadequate. Likewise, where a trial court removes a child from the custody of an allegedly neglectful parent and places exclusive custody in another individual, the court must adhere to the mandates of West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(5), and failure to include statutorily required findings in the order or on the record renders the order inadequate.

5. Where it appears from the record that the process established by the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and related statutes for the disposition of cases involving children adjudicated to be abused or neglected has been substantially disregarded or frustrated, the resulting order of disposition will be vacated and the case remanded for compliance with that process and entry of an appropriate dispositional order.

6. "In formulating the improvement period and family case plans, courts and social service workers should cooperate to provide a workable approach for the resolution of family problems which have prevented the child or children from receiving appropriate care from their parents. The formulation of the improvement period and family case plans should therefore be a consolidated, multi-disciplinary effort among the court system, the parents, attorneys, social service agencies, and any other helping personnel involved in assisting the family." Syl. Pt. 4, In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

Albright, Justice:

This is an appeal by Patricia J.[1] (hereinafter "Appellant" or "mother") from an order of the Circuit Court of McDowell County terminating the Appellant's parental rights to her son Benny J., transferring exclusive legal and physical custody of three other children to their father, and transferring legal and physical custody of a fifth child to the Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR"). The Appellant contends, inter alia, that the lower court erred by failing to make specific findings of fact required by West Virginia Code §§ 49-6-5(a)(5) and 49-6-5(a)(6) (1998) (Repl. Vol. 2001) when transferring custody or terminating parental rights as a result of a finding of abuse or neglect.[2] Based upon our

---

[1]We follow our traditional practice in child abuse and neglect matters, as well as other cases involving sensitive facts, and do not use the last names of the parties. See, e.g., In re Scottie D., 185 W.Va. 191, 192 n.1, 406 S.E.2d 214, 215 n.1 (1991); State ex rel. Div. of Human Servs. by Mary C.M. v. Benjamin P.B., 183 W.Va. 220, 222 n.1, 395 S.E.2d 220, 222 n.1 (1990).

[2]The Appellant raised certain assignments of error in her September 12, 2000, petition for appeal that were not raised in her brief after this Court granted the petition for appeal. The petition for appeal raised five assignments of error, as follows: lack of clear and convincing evidence of neglect; hearsay testimony of child protective services worker John Propst; improper denial of improvement period; refusal to comply with recommendations of DHHR reunification plan; and failure to comply with West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) by stating facts supporting the court's finding that there was no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect could be substantially corrected in the near future. After the petition was granted on November 30, 2000, and substitute counsel for the Appellant had been appointed, the assignments of error were consolidated, restated, or abandoned, leaving only two issues remaining, as follows: failure of the lower court to grant a post-adjudicatory improvement period and insufficient evidence to warrant termination of parental rights.

Because the errors, as assigned in the Appellant's petition for appeal, were neither review of the record and the arguments of counsel, we reverse the decision of the lower court and remand this matter for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

I. Facts

A. Activities Pre-Dating the Neglect Petition

Although the record regarding DHHR action prior to the filing of the neglect petition is scant, it appears that DHHR began working with the Appellant in 1997, attempting to assist her with allegedly inadequate housing conditions at her mobile home near Panther, West Virginia.[3] The DHHR represented to the court below that it had attempted to coordinate transportation to medical appointments for the Appellant and her children and arranged family counseling, individual counseling, and homemaking, infant care and parenting skills training through the Children's Home Society and Tug River Health. The record contains nothing assigned nor argued in the Appellant's brief, they are hereby waived. See Britner v. Medical Sec. Card, Inc., 200 W. Va. 352, 354 n.5, 489 S.E.2d 734, 736 n.5 (1997) ("The defendants' petition for appeal cited as error the circuit court's application of the five year statute of limitations to this case. However, the defendants did not address that issue in their brief and therefore have abandoned that assignment of error"); State v. LaRock, 196 W. Va. 294, 302, 470 S.E.2d 613, 621 (1996) ("Although we liberally construe briefs in determining issues presented for review, issues which are not raised . . . are not considered on appeal"); Syl. Pt. 6, Addair v. Bryant, 168 W. Va. 306, 284 S.E.2d 374 (1981) ("Assignments of error that are not argued in the briefs on appeal may be deemed by this Court to be waived").

[3]During portions of the period in which DHHR provided assistance, a boyfriend and five of the Appellant's children resided with her in the mobile home. The children involved in this appeal include Edward Floyd B., Jr. (born 5-30-86), John David F. (born 3-15-91), David Dewane F. (born 9-23-93), George Franklin F. (born 4-16-96), and Benny Jay J. (born 12-27-99). A sixth child, Allison J. F. (born 5-1-89), resided with her father and was not the subject of the underlying matter.

beyond the bare representations of the child protective services worker regarding these third-party efforts and does not contain the testimony of representatives of these agencies. Consequently, this Court is unaware of the frequency and content of such services or the degree of success attained by these outside agencies.

On February 29, 2000, child protective services worker John Propst[4] visited the home for approximately twenty minutes and concluded that the Appellant's eight-year-old son John required medical attention for a cut on his face, incurred in a fall on a railroad tie. The Appellant had treated the child's injury, but had not sought medical attention for the injury.[5] Mr. Propst also noticed that the home was dirty and that furniture and bags of clothing cluttered the rooms of the mobile home. As had been the case during the time Mr. Propst had been working with the family, there was no running water coming into the home. There was, however, a water line to the front door of the mobile home where the mother obtained water for flushing the toilet and other purposes. A neighbor had assisted the Appellant in obtaining a water line to the front door of the home.

B. The Petition, Amended Petition and Preliminary Proceedings

[4]Mr. Propst had been employed by child protective services for approximately one and one-half years and had been dealing with the Appellant's case for approximately one year.

[5]Mr. Propst took John to the emergency room the day after the home visit. John's face was treated conservatively and he was released. An x-ray revealed no broken bones. As the Appellant emphasizes in her brief to this Court, "[t]he treatment provided by the hospital was not much different than the treatment provided by . . . [the Appellant]."

The day after that visit, March 1, 2000, Mr. Propst, acting for the DHHR, filed a petition against the Appellant, alleging that she had neglected her children. The petition alleged that the mobile home was dirty and had no running water. In the petition, Mr. Propst explained that the Appellant had cursed him and "the DHHR for not being there when needed and sticking our noses up her ass when we didn't need to." Mr. Propst further alleged in the petition that the Appellant had failed to keep medical appointments and that a truancy warrant was pending for her failure to send the children to school. No allegations of abuse were filed, and the petition stated that the DHHR did not believe that there existed any imminent danger to the children.

Incident to filing the petition, an order was entered granting emergency powers to the DHHR, and the children were taken to physicians for examinations under the authority of that order. All children were healthy, except two-month old Benny, who had low weight and was diagnosed with failure to thrive. He was admitted for hospitalization on March 1, 2000, and discharged to foster care on March 4, 2000.[6]

[6]Benny had suffered health problems since his December 27, 1999, date of birth. He was taken to the emergency room on January 12, 2000, after his mother called 911 regarding irregular respiration and short apnea episodes. He was admitted for observation from January 12, 2000, to January 14, 2000, while he was still less than one month old. There is no indication in the record concerning what special services, if any, the DHHR provided for Benny's particular health needs prior to the emergency order.

The lower court conducted a hearing for further temporary relief on March 9, 2000, and placed the children in the legal custody of the DHHR. Edward, John, David, and George were placed in the physical custody of Mr. David F., the biological father of John, David, and George. The infant, Benny, was placed with the State due to his special medical needs. The Appellant was granted visitation with the children.[7] An amended petition was filed on April 7, 2000, alleging that Benny suffered from failure to thrive and further alleging that the infant suffered a rash where the Appellant had taped a diaper to his skin.

C. The Adjudication of Neglect

An adjudicatory hearing was held on May 24, 2000, and testimony was taken. Mr. Propst testified concerning the children's medical conditions, school attendance, and missed medical appointments. The lower court asked Mr. Propst why the petition had been filed at this time "[i]f this has been going on in some way, shape or form involving this whole family for about a year or so. . . ." In response, Mr. Propst raised the issue of lice and nits, an issue which does not appear in the petition or amended petition, and explained as follows: "Mainly, the absences of the children from school and the fact that they were coming to school every day with lice, the teachers were sending them home."[8] The lower court then suggested as follows:

[7]The record does not reveal the extent to which the Appellant attempted to exercise visitation with the children subsequent to their removal.

[8]The Appellant testified in response that she used her neighbor's washer and dryer to clean the bed linens and applied lice medication on the children.

> Well, you've been in and out of the home, as well as the others, for, you know, at least twenty times and so forth for a year, did anyone give her any direction or supervision or any help in, you know, getting rid of the mites. . . . [D]id the Department or anyone else involved do something to find her a better place or a cleaner place or to bring someone in if she was unable to do it. . . .

Mr. Propst responded: "No, sir, we didn't bring anybody in to do that. I was informed that they had a vacuum cleaner, and they could've vacuumed."

During that adjudicatory hearing, the Appellant testified that she had extended running water from the outside into the home. She explained that when Mr. Propst told her to get the water fixed, she was able to obtain running water in the home by paying a neighbor $146.00 to repair the mobile home's broken water pipes after the landlord, residing in Virginia, failed to respond to the Appellant's request for running water and some type of heat other than the coal furnace in the home.

She also testified about her bond with the children, as follows:

> Just that I love my children. They are my life. Nobody can live without air, and I can't live without them. They're the reason I go on. They're the reason I struggle. Sure, I had to pack that water, and it was hard on me, but I didn't make it harder for them. I still kept them clean and stuff. I tried.

When the lower court asked why she had not demanded further assistance with running water from the DHHR, the Appellant responded: "It would be kind of hard to demand that the Department . . . do something for me when - - I mean, they say I - - I miss appointments and things. . . .”

When questioned regarding the family income, the Appellant explained that she received $460.00 per month on behalf of David, based upon his seizure disability, and that she received $312.00 per month in benefits and $148.00 per month in food stamps. Mr. F. also allegedly paid the Appellant $50.00 in support monthly. The record does not disclose how much, if any, of that income ended upon the entry of the temporary relief order on March 9, 2000, transferring custody to persons other than the Appellant.

Having conducted this adjudicatory hearing on May 24, 2000, the lower court entered the resulting order on June 26, 2000,[9] finding that the Appellant had neglected the children. Specifically, the lower court found as follows:

> [The Appellant] failed to provide a safe home for the children, who lived with her in two rooms of a mobile home with dangerous electrical wiring and without hot or cold running water inside the home. She further failed to send the children to school on a regular basis, resulting in her prosecution for truancy, and she failed to seek readily available medical treatment for one of the children even though he had suffered a serious injury to his face that should have received immediate, emergency medical care.

[9]As will appear, the adjudicatory order was entered after the dispositional hearing, some 33 days after the adjudicatory hearing and in plain contravention of the requirements of Rule 27 of the Rules of Procedure For Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings.

With specific regard to the infant Benny, the court found as follows:

> The Court additionally finds that . . . [the Appellant] seriously neglected the basic needs of infant respondent Benny . . . [J.] by failing to provide adequate nourishment and emotional support, resulting in the infant being diagnosed by a pediatrician with "failure to thrive" and anemia. Said child had gained only a few ounces in the two months since his birth on December 27, 1999. . . .

The lower court ordered "that the parents continue to have reasonable visitation, contact and communication with the infants under the Department's supervision, but there shall be no forced visitation." The record is silent regarding the degree to which the visitation privileges granted by the lower court were exercised by the Appellant after the adjudicatory hearing.

D. Activities Prior to Dispositional Hearing

On June 9, 2000, the Appellant filed a written motion for a post-adjudicatory improvement period. The Appellant asserted that she would fully participate in an improvement period and requested a family case plan, in accordance with West Virginia Code 49-6D-3 (1998) (Repl. Vol. 2001).

On June 14, 2000, Mr. Propst provided a child youth and family case plan recommending reunification of the family as the permanency plan,[10] with an estimated achievement date of December 12, 2000. There is no indication in the plan, as filed, regarding whether it was preceded by the convening of a multi-disciplinary treatment team, as required by Rule 51 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure For Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, nor does the record contain any order of the court convening such a team. The plan identified desired outcomes for the Appellant as follows: problem solving, self-sufficiency, parenting knowledge/skill, and learning the importance of scheduling and being in charge of every day life. Weekly visits by the Paul Miller Home-Based Services were recommended.[11]

[10]The permanency plan is required by West Virginia Code 49-6-5(a) and Rule 28 of the Rules of Procedure For Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings.

E. Dispositional Hearing

On June 19, 2000, the lower court conducted a dispositional hearing for which it entered its order dated July 10, 2000, despite the requirement of Rule 36 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings that such an order be entered within ten days of the conclusion of the hearing. At the dispositional hearing, neither the State nor the DHHR objected to the Appellant's request for an improvement period, and counsel for the Appellant informed the lower court that the Appellant was undergoing counseling. The lower court was advised that Dr. Heather Hagerman, a psychologist consulted by the Appellant, had requested a four-week period in which to assess the Appellant's response to counseling and medication, incident to an effort to improve the Appellant's parenting abilities.

The lower court refused to delay its disposition for the requested four-week period, denied the Appellant's request for an improvement period without express findings of [11]There is no explanation in the plan as to what services Paul Miller Home-Based Services might provide.

fact or conclusions of law, and proceeded to the following dispositions. The court placed exclusive physical and legal custody of John, David, and George with their father, David F. The custody of Edward, whose location was unknown due to the fact that he ran away from Mr. F.'s home, was placed in the DHHR until his eighteenth birthday. With regard to these children, the dispositional order recites that liberal visitation is to be allowed the mother.[12]

With regard to the infant Benny, the lower court found, in the July 10, 2000, dispositional order, that "there is no reasonable likelihood that . . . [the Appellant] can eliminate the conditions which led to the neglect of the child." Consequently, the lower court terminated the Appellant's parental rights to Benny and ordered that he be placed for adoption. The lower court further found that Benny's biological father, Charles C., had abandoned his rights to Benny. The court provided that, upon application of the Appellant at some later date, the Appellant might secure visitation rights with Benny to be exercised under the supervision of the DHHR.

The lower court, through its dispositional order, implicitly rejected the case and permanency plan submitted by the DHHR. Despite the clear requirements of West Virginia Code §§ 49-6-5 and -5a, as well as Rules 36 and 39 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, the dispositional order did not require the DHHR to submit a revised plan, a permanency plan, or to conduct a permanent placement review conference.

[12]Again, the record before this Court is silent regarding the degree to which visitation has occurred.

II. Standard of Review

In syllabus point one of In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), this Court explained as follows:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

See also Syl. Pt. 1, In re Travis W., 206 W. Va. 478, 525 S.E.2d 669 (1999); Syl. Pt. 1, In re George Glen B., 205 W. Va. 435, 518 S.E.2d 863 (1999).

III. Discussion

A. Inadequate Findings and Determinations

As previously noted,[13] the Appellant relies on two alleged errors below: (1) insufficiency of the evidence to warrant the relief awarded against the interests of the Appellant below, and (2) the failure of the lower court to allow a post-adjudicatory improvement period.[14] The Appellant's primary contention on appeal is that the lower court erred by failing to include sufficient findings of fact in its dispositional order to support the termination decision with regard to the infant Benny and the transfer of custody with regard to the other four children. We find this issue of inadequate findings controlling in light of the limited discussion in the record of the factors leading to the lower court's decision and the court's apparent lack of attention to the various requirements of the applicable statutes and rules.[15]

West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) enumerates the standards to which courts must adhere in deciding whether parental rights may be terminated. The statute provides that the court must include specific findings within the dispositional order, as follows:

> Upon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future, and when necessary for the welfare of the child, terminate the parental, custodial or guardianship rights and/or responsibilities of the abusing parent and commit the child to the permanent sole custody of the nonabusing parent, if there be one, or, if not, to either the permanent guardianship of the department or a licensed child welfare agency. If the court shall so find, then in fixing its dispositional order, the court shall [14]This Court finds that the Appellant has abandoned any allegations of error in the adjudicatory order finding the children neglected, and we therefore treat that order as final.

[15]We emphasize that the rules apply only to the extent that they do not conflict with the statutory mandates. Rule 1 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings provides in pertinent part as follows: "These rules apply only to the extent that they are not in conflict with the Rules of Evidence and other court rules or statutes applicable to such proceedings." W. Va. R. P. Child Abuse & Neglect Proc. 1, in part (emphasis provided).

> consider the following factors: (1) The child's need for continuity of care and caretakers; (2) the amount of time required for the child to be integrated into a stable and permanent home environment; and (3) other factors as the court considers necessary and proper. Notwithstanding any other provision of this article, the court shall give consideration to the wishes of a child fourteen years of age or older or otherwise of an age of discretion as determined by the court, regarding the permanent termination of parental rights. No adoption of a child shall take place until all proceedings for termination of parental rights under this article and appeals thereof are final. In determining whether or not parental rights should be terminated, the court shall consider the efforts made by the department to provide remedial and reunification services to the parent. The court order shall state: (1) That continuation in the home is not in the best interest of the child and why; (2) why reunification is not in the best interests of the child; (3) whether or not the department made reasonable efforts, with the child's health and safety being the paramount concern, to preserve the family and to prevent the placement or to eliminate the need for removing the child from the child's home and to make it possible for the child to safely return home, or that the emergency situation made such efforts unreasonable or impossible; and (4) whether or not the department made reasonable efforts to preserve and reunify the family including a description of what efforts were made or that such efforts were unreasonable due to specific circumstances.

W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) (emphasis supplied).[16]

[16]In In re Jamie Nicole H., 205 W. Va. 176, 517 S.E.2d 41 (1999), this Court, in dictum, permitted a termination of parental rights to be upheld where the transcript of the dispositional hearing, rather than the order, disclosed, to the satisfaction of this Court, that the lower court found no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse could be substantially corrected in the near future, as well as the other findings required by West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(6). 205 W. Va. at 184, 517 S.E.2d at 49. We do not find the transcript in the instant case helpful in filling the voids in the dispositional order or procedures.

Under West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(5), a trial court may commit the child or children to "a suitable person who may be appointed guardian by the court" where the court finds "that the abusing parent or parents are presently unwilling or unable to provide adequately for the child's needs." Id. When this manner of disposition is utilized, as it was for Edward, John, David, and George in this case, the statute provides the following guidance for the court:

> The court order shall state: (1) That continuation in the home is contrary to the best interests of the child and why; (2) whether or not the department has made reasonable efforts, with the child's health and safety being the paramount concern, to preserve the family and to prevent or eliminate the need for; removing the child from the child's home and to make it possible for the child to safely return home; what efforts were made or that the emergency situation made such efforts unreasonable or impossible; and (3) the specific circumstances of the situation which made such efforts unreasonable if services were not offered by the department.

W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(5) (emphasis supplied).

Rule 36 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings has supplemented these statutory requirements by specifying that there shall be findings of fact and conclusions of law set forth in writing or on the record and that the dispositional order shall fix the date and time of the first permanent placement review conference and may include the following information, all of which was omitted from the lower court's order in this case:

> (1) Terms of visitation;
> (2) Services to be provided to the child and family;
> (3) Restraining orders controlling the conduct of any party who is likely to frustrate the disposition order;

> (4) Actions to be taken by the parent(s) to correct the identified problems;
>
> (5) Conditions regarding the child's placement, including steps to meet the child's special needs while in placement;
> (6) If the child is separated from siblings, steps to unite them and/or to maintain regular contact during the separation if it is in the best interest of each child; and > (7) Terms and conditions of the family case plan or the child's case plan.

W. Va. R. P. Child Abuse & Neglect Proc. 36(c).

The lower court's findings regarding the basis for the termination of parental rights with regard to Benny consisted of the following: "It is further ORDERED that the parental rights of . . . [the Appellant] with respect to infant Benny . . . [J.] be permanently terminated due to this Court's finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that . . . [the Appellant] can eliminate the conditions which led to the neglect of the child."

Similarly, the lower court failed to make specific findings in its order with regard to the disposition of Edward, John, David, and George. The court's findings with regard to those four children consisted of the following:

> Upon due consideration of the Department's recommendations, it is ORDERED that the full and exclusive legal and physical custody of infants John . . . [F.], David . . . [F.], and George . . . [F.] be transferred and awarded to their biological parent, David . . . [F.]. [The Appellant] is granted reasonable and liberal contact, communication and visitation with those children.
>
> It is ORDERED that the full and exclusive legal and physical custody of infant Edward . . . [B.] be awarded to the West > Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources until he becomes 18 years of age.

As it pertains to Benny, the dispositional order fails to state, as required by statute in termination of parental rights cases, why reunification is not in the best interests of Benny, whether the DHHR made reasonable efforts to "preserve the family and to prevent the placement or to eliminate the need for removing the child from the child's home," and whether the DHHR "made reasonable efforts to preserve and reunify the family including a description of what efforts were made or that such efforts were unreasonable due to specific circumstances." W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6). With regard to the other four children, the order fails to state why reunification with their mother is contrary to their best interests and whether the DHHR has made reasonable efforts to preserve the family and to prevent the need for removal. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(5).

B. Pertinent Requirements of Abuse and Neglect Litigation

Abuse and neglect cases are undoubtedly among the most difficult cases with which our court structure must grapple. The lives of the parties are irretrievably altered by the court rulings, and the people most fundamentally affected are blameless young children. Moreover, as the Supreme Court of the United States recently underlined in Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57 (2000), the state's involvement with children's and parental rights and privileges implicates substantial liberty interests that enjoy constitutional guarantees of due process of law which must be respected by the state, its legislature, and the courts. Similarly, this Court long ago recognized the constitutional dimensions of abuse and neglect proceedings under both the federal and state constitutions. In syllabus point one of In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973), this Court explained:

> In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions.

Id. at 225, 207 S.E.2d at 130-31; s*ee also* Syl. Pt. 1, State ex rel. W. Va. Dep't of Human Servs. v. Cheryl M., 177 W. Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987).

In clear recognition of these critical interests, and by steadfastly adhering to the polar star test of looking to the best interests of our children and their right to healthy, happy productive lives, this Court, over a substantial period of time, has expressed an unwavering interest in providing comprehensive and fair procedures for the consideration of abuse and neglect cases. As this most important area of the law has expanded, this Court has insisted that the directives of applicable rules and legislative enactments must be carefully identified, respected, and incorporated within our court system. The Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and the related statutes detailing fair, prompt, and thorough procedures for child abuse and neglect cases are not mere general guidance; rather, they are stated in mandatory terms and vest carefully described and circumscribed discretion in our courts, intended to protect the due process rights of the parents as well as the rights of the innocent children.

Procedurally, these various directives also provide the necessary framework for appellate review of a circuit court's action. Where a lower court has not shown compliance with these requirements in a final order, and such cannot be readily gleaned by this Court from the record, the laudable and indispensable goal of proper appellate review is thwarted. As the Supreme Court of Wisconsin emphasized in In re T.R.M., 303 N.W.2d 581 (Wis. 1981), "[a]dequate findings must be made in order to protect the rights of litigants and to facilitate review of the record by an appellate court." Id. at 583. The Wisconsin court also emphasized that the trial court's "findings are also deficient with respect to a lack of a specific and formal determination regarding the best interests of . . . [the child]" and noted that the trial court was "under an obligation to make findings with regard to the best interests of the child in relation to the evidence adduced." Id; s*ee also In re Welfare of M.M.*, 452 N.W.2d 236 (Minn. 1990) (holding trial court's findings of fact inadequate to facilitate effective appellate review and reversing decision after independent review of record).

In In re Adoption/Guardianship No. 87A262, 590 A.2d 165 (Md. 1991), the Maryland court explained as follows:

> [The] legislative requirement of consideration of the factors itemized in [the statute] demonstrates the intent that the utmost caution should be exercised in any decision to terminate parental > rights. In cases where parental rights are terminated, it is important that each factor be addressed specifically not only to demonstrate that all factors were considered but also to provide a record for review of this drastic measure.

Id. at 168. "Clear and complete findings by the trial judge are essential to enable us properly to exercise and not exceed our powers of review." Nicpon v. Nicpon, 157 N.W.2d 464, 467 (Mich. Ct. App. 1968); s*ee In re Denzel A.*, 733 A.2d 298 (Conn. App. Ct. 1999) (holding that trial court mandated to consider and make written findings of fact regarding statutory factors in dispositional phase of termination of parental rights hearing).

C. The Process for Disposition of Abuse and Neglect Cases

This State has developed a thorough process for the disposition of cases involving children adjudicated to be abused or neglected. Pursuant to Rule 51 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, a multidisciplinary treatment team, as defined in West Virginia Code §§ 49-5D-1 to -7 (1998) (Repl. Vol. 2001), is to be convened for each abuse and neglect case within thirty days of its filing, consisting of the parties and representatives of agencies who may be able to help in the particular situation. Rule 28 contemplates that a child's case plan is to be prepared, with the specific and detailed contents to be determined by the recommendations included therein and the applicable provisions of West Virginia Code § 49-6D-3, and timely filed with the court. See W. Va. R. P. Child Abuse and Neglect Proc. 28.

Furthermore, Rules 29 to 31, 34, and 36 to 42 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and the related statutes provide an orderly but prompt process for bringing about a full consideration of the best interests of children adjudicated to be neglected or abused and the proper disposition of such cases. The Rules provide a full opportunity for hearing, judicial consideration of the case plan and its possible revision, and timely disposition of the case under the provisions of West Virginia Code § 49-6-5, with adequate findings in the order or on the record. The Rules further provide stringent guidelines and time limitations for any improvement period granted and timely follow-up regarding the efficacy of any plan for the permanent placement of the child or children outside the parental home.

D. Deficiencies in the Management of the Instant Matter

In the case sub judice, these procedures simply were not followed. Specifically, nothing in the record suggests the convening of the required multidisciplinary team or its consideration of or input into the child's case plan submitted by the child protective services worker, Mr. Probst. A review of that case plan demonstrates beyond question that it fails to satisfy the requirements of West Virginia Code § 49-6D-3, as also identified by this Court in syllabus point five of Cheryl M., as follows: "The purpose of the family case plan as set out in W.Va. Code, 49-6D-3(a) (1984), is to clearly set forth an organized, realistic method of identifying family problems and the logical steps to be used in resolving or lessening these problems." 177 W. Va. at 689, 356 S.E.2d at 182, syl. pt. 5. The case plan in the instant matter neither "clearly set[s] forth an organized realistic method of identifying family problems and the logical steps to be used in resolving or lessening those problems" nor does it address satisfactorily, if at all, the specific matters required by West Virginia Code § 49-6D-3. Id.

Although the family case plan was formulated and submitted to the lower court prior to the dispositional hearing, the strategies recommended in the plan were never employed to address the family's problems. Similar strategies may have been utilized in previous contact between the DHHR and the Appellant, but the forms of outreach referenced in the plan were not attempted. Additionally, the family case plan does not appear to adequately address one of the predominant obstacles facing the Appellant, her alleged lack of financial resources. It does suggest the use of Paul Miller Home-Based Services for weekly monitoring and guidance in instructing the Appellant in scheduling her normal routines. Yet it does not otherwise appear to identify precise methods by which the Appellant might improve her parenting skills, and many desired outcomes are stated in abstract terms, such as "problem solving," "self-sufficiency," and "parenting knowledge/skill."

Moreover, it appears that the court below rejected the case plan during the dispositional hearing after the father of three of the children objected and asked the court to proceed to terminate the Appellant's parental rights, contrary to the child case plan filed by the DHHR, and the court proceeded to terminate Appellant's parental rights. In contrast to this procedure, Rule 34 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings requires the court to rule by order on the case plan and, if the court rejects the plan, order the DHHR to submit a revised plan within thirty days and schedule a new dispositional hearing within forty-five days. In violation of Rule 36, the lower court failed to set the date and time for the first permanency review conference.

E. Conclusions

This Court concludes that where a trial court order terminating parental rights merely declares that there is no reasonable likelihood that a parent can eliminate the conditions of neglect, without explicitly stating factual findings in the order or on the record supporting such conclusion, and fails to state statutory findings required by West Virginia Code 49-6-5(a)(6) on the record or in the order, the order is inadequate. Likewise, where a trial court removes a child from the custody of an allegedly neglectful parent and places exclusive custody in another individual, the court must adhere to the mandates of West Virginia Code 49-6-5(a)(5), and failure to include statutorily required findings in the order or on the record renders the order inadequate. Accordingly, where it appears from the record that the process established by the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and related statutes for the disposition of cases involving children adjudicated to be abused or neglected has been substantially disregarded or frustrated, the resulting order of disposition will be vacated and the case remanded for compliance with that process and entry of an appropriate dispositional order.

Based upon the lower court's numerous failures to comply with the statutory requirements and the procedures required by the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, this matter must be reversed and remanded. As promptly as may appear feasible to the trial court, this matter shall be brought on for the development of an appropriate family and child case plan, including the utilization of a multidisciplinary team;[17] a determination of the propriety of an improvement period; subsequent improvement period hearings, if an improvement period is granted; a full dispositional hearing and decision; and such permanency conferences, plans, hearings, foster care reviews, and status conferences as the lower court concludes will bring this matter to prompt closure, with due regard to the Rules of Procedure For Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings.

IV. Issues for Evaluation on Remand

[17]In the special circumstances of this case, to avoid further interminable delays, we see no impediment to the lower court requiring, if it wishes to do so, the inclusion of alternative plans in the case plan such as (1) granting; or (2) denying an improvement period; (3) the continuation of the custody of the children other than Benny with Mr. David F.; (4) any appropriate alternative to that placement; (5) the placement of Benny for adoption; (6) the eventual reunification of Benny with the Appellant; (7) visitation plans for the siblings, the Appellant, and/or other parties entitled thereto, if desirable; and (8) such other matters as the lower court shall require, so long as the parties have ample notice and opportunity to be heard on all alternatives. Finally, when a plan is prepared, with plans for alternative dispositions, it is imperative that the directives of Rule 28 of the Rules of Procedure For Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and West Virginia Code § 49-6D-3 be carefully followed in order to provide the trial court and all interested parties an opportunity for thorough reflection on the realistic alternatives available to serve the best interests of the children involved and fairly afford Appellant and other concerned parties an opportunity to resolve the serious problems evidenced by this case and its course to date.

A. Entitlement to an Improvement Period

The Appellant contends that the lower court erred in the dispositional phase by denying her an improvement period.[18] The Appellant made a written motion for an improvement period prior to the dispositional hearing, and her counsel explained that her psychologist had requested a four-week period in which to assess the Appellant's progress. The motion for an improvement period was not opposed by the DHHR or the guardian ad litem.[19] In fact, the position of the DHHR, as evidenced by its family case plan, appears to have supported the motion by providing a permanency plan calling for reunification by December 2000.

In State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W. Va. 251, 470 S.E.2d 205 (1996), this Court explained its position of improvements periods, as follows: "The goal of an improvement period is to facilitate the reunification of families whenever that reunification is in the best interests of the children involved." Id. at 258, 470 S.E.2d at 212. We recognized that "[b]oth the statute and our case law grant trial courts considerable flexibility in developing meaningful improvement periods designed to address the myriad possible problems causing [18]This Court recognizes the more stringent requirements of West Virginia Code 49-6-12 (1996) (Repl. Vol. 2001), with regard to post-adjudicatory improvement periods, as requested by the Appellant in the case sub judice.

[19]The motion was opposed by Mr. David F., the biological father of four of the six children. Counsel for Mr. F. explained that Mr. F. was "of the opinion that no good will result from an improvement period because his ex-wife has had time and time again the opportunity to do better by the children. . . ."

abuse and neglect." Id. at 258, 470 S.E.2d at 212; s*ee also In re Emily*, 208 W. Va. 325, 540 S.E.2d 542 (2000). Additional guidance is found in syllabus point four of In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991):

> In formulating the improvement period and family case plans, courts and social service workers should cooperate to provide a workable approach for the resolution of family problems which have prevented the child or children from receiving appropriate care from their parents. The formulation of the improvement period and family case plans should therefore be a consolidated, multi-disciplinary effort among the court system, the parents, attorneys, social service agencies, and any other helping personnel involved in assisting the family.

We are puzzled by the lower court's refusal of the four-week delay in the dispositional hearing to determine if the children might profit from such an improvement period when the lower court itself delayed the entry of the dispositional order nearly that long, from June 19, 2000, to July 10, 2000. We cannot ascertain from the record before us, however, the basis for the lower court's decision not to grant the requested improvement period. Accordingly, the lower court should reexamine its determination regarding the propriety of an improvement period. The determination of whether to grant an improvement period is discretionary with the trial court and our discussion here should not be read either as favoring or disfavoring the grant of such a period in this case. We leave that to the lower court.

B. Other Considerations

This Court is confident that the lower court, on remand, will also consider such supplementary issues as the following: (1) the effect of the passage of time upon the children;[20] (2) the Appellant's financial constraints;[21] (3) a gradual, but reasonably prompt, transition period for the children where alteration in custody is necessary;[22] (4) the children's [20]This Court has consistently recognized child abuse and neglect cases as high priority. See Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. at 615, 408 S.E.2d at 367 ("Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security"). We are troubled by the long period of time it has taken this case to move from the entry of the dispositional order below to its consideration and decision by this Court, particularly in view of our oft-stated interest in prompt disposition of these cases However, in the particular case presently before this Court, the delay cannot be said to be the fault of any of the parties. Original counsel for the Appellant was compelled to withdraw, and substitute counsel twice requested, and this Court granted, enlargements of time within which to file a brief with this Court.

[21]The Appellant suggests that poverty prevented her from maintaining a suitable home and emphasizes that West Virginia Code § 49-1-3(h)(1) (1999) (Repl. Vol. 2001) specifies that the conditions allegedly constituting neglect cannot arise from a lack of financial means. While the issue of neglect has been determined, the lower court should endeavor on remand to distinguish derelictions of the mother attributable to her personal lack of ability and/or desire to parent the child from omissions primarily occasioned by a lack of financial means. Any child and family case plan proposing reunification should clearly address measures designed to assist with financial obstacles.

[22]We emphasize that we are not recommending any particular disposition in this case. However, if reunification is determined to be appropriate for any of the children upon remand, such children's custody arrangements should be altered gradually, within a fixed time frame, to minimize disruption to their young lives. See Syl. Pt. 3, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991).

rights to continued association;[23] and (5) evaluation of propriety of the termination of Charles C.'s parental rights.[24]

[23]In syllabus point four of James M. v. Maynard, 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991), this Court explained:

> In cases where there is a termination of parental rights, the circuit court should consider whether continued association with siblings in other placements is in the child's best interests, and if such continued association is in such child's best interests, the court should enter an appropriate order to preserve the rights of siblings to continued contact.

Through syllabus point five of In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995), this Court expanded that concept, as follows.

> When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest.

As we explained in In re Brian D., 194 W. Va. 623, 461 S.E.2d 129 (1995), a court should "inquire into the relationship . . . [the child] has formed with his foster parents and, if it is in his best interests, fashion a plan for continued association between the foster parents and the child." Id. at 638, 461 S.E.2d at 144.

[24]If the lower court determines that Benny should be reunified with the Appellant, the court should also reevaluate the decision to terminate the rights of Benny alleged natural father, Mr. Charles C. According to the record before this Court, it does not appear that a paternity action has been brought against Mr. C., nor has any child support been paid. Similarly, it appears that no paternity action has been brought against Edward's natural father. Although the termination decision regarding the father has not been appealed, it appears that the termination decision was presumably made to facilitate Benny's adoption. If the

Based on the foregoing, we hereby reverse the July 10, 2000, decision of the Circuit Court of McDowell County and remand this matter for further proceedings and evaluation consistent with this opinion. Based upon the time problems discussed earlier, the mandate herein shall issue forthwith. While this Court is cognizant that thorough evaluation on remand may consume significant time for the honorable judge to whom this matter will be assigned, this Court respectfully recommends that the lower court make all reasonable efforts to promptly conclude these proceedings, to the end that these children may enjoy a stable and certain future as early as is practicable. The urgency of the lower court's further consideration is underscored by the seriousness of these matters, as well as the fact that considerable delays, over which no party had control, were encountered in the proceedings.

Appellant's rights are not terminated after consideration on remand, adoption is no longer an issue, and the Appellant's rights to receive support from the natural father would be negated by termination of the father's parental rights. See Swinney v. Mosher, 830 S.W.2d 187 (Tex. Ct. App. 1992) (holding that termination of father's parental rights should be reversed since it was done to facilitate child's adoption and would prejudice rights of child and mother to receive support from father).

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia

v.

EDWARD CHARLES L., Sr.

No. 19004

July 27, 1990

Dissenting Opinion Sept. 21, 1990

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show that he acted in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident. W.Va.R.Evid. 404(b).

2. Collateral acts or crimes may be introduced in cases involving child sexual assault or sexual abuse victims to show the perpetrator had a lustful disposition towards the victim, a lustful disposition towards children generally, or a lustful disposition to specific other children provided such evidence relates to incidents reasonably close in time to the incident(s) giving rise to the indictment. To the extent that this conflicts with our decision in State v. Dolin, 176 W.Va. 688, 347 S.E.2d 208 (1986), it is overruled.

3. " 'Where improper evidence of a nonconstitutional nature is introduced by the State in a criminal trial, the test to determine if the error is harmless is: (1) the inadmissible evidence must be removed from the State's case and a determination made as to whether the remaining evidence is sufficient to convince impartial minds of the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt; (2) if the remaining evidence is found to be insufficient, the error is not harmless; (3) if the remaining evidence is sufficient to support the conviction, an analysis must then be made to determine whether the error had any prejudicial effect on the jury.' Syllabus Point 2, State v. Atkins, 163 W.Va. 502, 261 S.E.2d 55 (1979), cert denied, 445 U.S. 904, 100 S.Ct. 1081, 63 L.E.2d 320 (1980)"; Syl. Pt. 3, State v. Maynard, 183 W.Va. 1, 393 S.E.2d 221 (1990) (quoting Syl. Pt. 6, State v. Smith, 178 W.Va. 104, 358 S.E.2d 188 (1987)).

4. The following [is] ... not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness: ... (4) Statements for Purposes of Medical Diagnosis or Treatment. Statements made for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment and describing medical history, or past or present symptoms, pain, or sensations, or the inception or general character of the cause or external source thereof insofar as reasonably pertinent to diagnosis or treatment. W.Va.R.Evid. 803(4).

5. The two-part test set for admitting hearsay statements pursuant to W.Va.R.Evid. 803(4) is (1) the declarant's motive in making the statements must be consistent with the purposes of promoting treatment, and (2) the content of the statement must be such as is reasonably relied upon by a physician in treatment or diagnosis.

6. "The language of Rule 804(b)(5) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence and its counterpart Rule 803(24) requires that five general factors must be met in order for hearsay evidence to be admissible under the rules. First and most important is the trustworthiness of the statement, which must be equivalent to the trustworthiness underlying the specific exceptions to the hearsay rule. Second, the statements must be offered to prove the material fact. Third, the statement must be shown to be more probative in the issue for which it is offered than any other evidence that the proponent can reasonably procure. Fourth, admission of the statement must comport with the general purposes of the rules of evidence and the interest of justice. Fifth, adequate notice of the statement must be afforded the other party to provide that party a fair opportunity to meet the evidence." Syl. Pt. 5, State v. Smith, W.Va. , 358 S.E.2d 188 (1987).

7. Expert psychological testimony is permissible in cases involving incidents of child sexual abuse and an expert may state an opinion as to whether the child comports with the psychological and behavioral profile of a child sexual abuse victim, and may offer an opinion based on objective findings that the child has been sexually abused. Such an expert may not give an opinion as to whether he personally believes the child, nor an opinion as to whether the sexual assault was committed by the defendant, as these would improperly and prejudicially invade the province of the jury.

8. "In the determination of a claim that an accused was prejudiced by ineffective assistance of counsel violative of Article III, Section 14 of the West Virginia Constitution and the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution, courts should measure and compare the questioned counsel's performance by whether he exhibited the normal and customary degree of skill possessed by attorneys who are reasonably knowledgeable of criminal law, except that proved counsel error which does not affect the outcome of the case, will be regarded as harmless error." Syl. Pt. 19, State v. Thomas, 157 W.Va. 640, 203 S.E.2d 445 (1974).

9. "Where a counsel's performance, attacked as ineffective, arises from occurrences involving strategy, tactics and arguable courses of action, his conduct will be deemed effectively assistive of his client's interests, unless no reasonably qualified defense attorney would have so acted in the defense of an accused." Syl. Pt. 21, State v. Thomas, 157 W.Va. 640, 203 S.E.2d 445 (1974).

Roger W. Tompkins, Atty. Gen., John E. Shank, Deputy Atty. Gen., Attorney General's Office, Charleston, for State of W.Va.

WORKMAN, Justice.

This case is before the Court upon an appeal of the conviction of Edward Charles L. See footnote 1 on May 28, 1987, in Mineral County, West Virginia, of two counts of first-degree sexual assault and two counts of first-degree sexual abuse. See footnote 2 The appellant raises four assignments of error based on the proceedings which occurred before the lower court: 1) the trial court committed plain error in permitting the state to make references to unrelated sexual acts and tendencies of the appellant; 2) the trial court committed plain error in allowing the state to elicit secondhand accounts of the sexual offenses which constituted hearsay evidence; 3) the uncorroborated testimony of the child victims was inherently incredible and does not sustain the guilty verdicts; and 4) the appellant was denied effective assistance of counsel. We find that the lower court committed no reversible error in the proceedings and affirm the appellant's convictions.

The appellant was married to Sharon L. from October 1977 until July 1984. The couple had three children, twins, a boy and girl named C.L. and S.L. respectively, born on August 7, 1979, and another son D.L., born on September 4, 1983. When the events surrounding this case occurred in the fall of 1983, the family was living together in Mineral County, West Virginia. Mrs. L. would attend meetings of the Fountain Volunteer Firemen's Auxiliary or visit a neighbor while leaving the children in the care of her husband, the appellant. The twins were four-years-old when the alleged crimes against them occurred.

On occasions when Mrs. L. was not at home, C.L.'s testimony revealed that the appellant took him into a bedroom, took his clothes off, made the child lie on his stomach and then inserted his penis (identified at the trial by the child as his "georgie") into the boy's rectum. S.L. testified that she heard her brother cry out but that she was afraid to go to him because she was watching her younger brother, D.L., on the couch and he could have fallen off the couch had she left. C.L. further testified that his father had stuck his finger up the child's rectum and had placed his mouth on the boy's "georgie".

The appellant was accused of abuse against his daughter as well. The girl's testimony indicated that on a night in which her mother was away, she was abused by her father in the bathroom. She testified that while she and her father were in the bathroom, he stuck his finger up her vagina (identified at trial by the child as her "tweetie"). When the child screamed that this hurt her, the appellant desisted in his action. The appellant also attempted to force his penis into the girl's vagina but ceased in his attempt because it was not possible.

According to the children's testimony at trial, the appellant was able to silence the children regarding the incidents by threatening to cut off the little boy's "georgie" and by threatening to cut open the girl's "tweetie" so that his penis would fit there if they told anyone.

The appellant and Mrs. L. were separated on December 26, 1983, and divorced in July 1984. The appellant maintained visitation with his children subsequent to the divorce.

According to Mrs. L.'s testimony, it was not until October 1984 that she observed strange behavior See footnote 3 being exhibited by her son. When she asked the child about his behavior, he said his daddy told him to do it, because it would feel good. When the mother questioned the boy further, he began crying and said his father told him not to tell her. Mrs. L. then asked a close friend, to question her son about his behavior. The child told the friend about sexual acts performed on him by his father, and later told his mother as well. The friend was not called to testify at trial. See footnote 4

Subsequently, the child began to display more behavior problems at home, including flushing his mother's keys down the toilet. The child, according to his mother's testimony, told her that the reason he did it was because "my daddy had keys to get in our house, and daddy told me if I ever told you what he did to me, he would cut my 'georgie' off." In September 1985, C.L.'s first grade teacher reported to Mrs. L. that C.L. was inattentive in class to the point that the teacher would have to yell his name or smack a book on his desk to gain his attention. A school counselor referred the matter to a licensed psychologist, Greg Trainor. Trainor treated C.L. and S.L. for several months. From his treatment, he concluded that both children had been sexually abused by their father. Trainor conveyed his opinion about the children to Mrs. L. and urged her to contact the authorities. At Trainor's insistence, Mrs. L. contacted the prosecuting attorney's office.

The appellant was indicted in January 1987 and tried in May of that year. The prosecution's case rested on testimony of the two child victims, C.L. and S.L.; Trainor, the psychologist; an evidentiary deposition See footnote 5 of Dr. Ryland, a gynecologist, and the children's mother, Sharon L. The appellant's defense consisted of his own testimony, denying all the charges but stating he may have accidentally touched his son and daughter while bathing them; and the testimony of his fiance, which centered around the appellant's good relationship with his children. No expert witnesses were called on the appellant's behalf. At the close of all the evidence, the jury convicted the appellant of two counts of first-degree sexual assault and one count of first- degree abuse against his son and one count of first-degree sexual abuse against his daughter.

I.

The appellant's first assignment of error concerns the trial court permitting the state to make reference to unrelated sexual acts and sexual tendencies of the appellant. Specifically, the appellant contends that the trial court permitted the state to introduce the following evidence over objections raised by appellant's trial counsel:

> 1. The appellant fondled his infant baby boy through a diaper;
> 2. The appellant made long distance telephone calls to sex clubs between 1980 and 1983 which he at times made the children listen to under the pretense that Mickey Mouse was on the phone;
> 3. The appellant's wife found a bag of her daughter's underwear in the basement of their home which the wife claimed had been ejaculated on, presumably by the appellant;
> 4. The appellant would frequently pat the front of his pants;
> 5. The appellant would masturbate following sex with his wife;
> 6. The appellant would lean against the washing machine during the spin cycle for sexual gratification;
> 7. The appellant would masturbate in front of his son, while looking at what were described at trial as pornographic See footnote 6 magazines and stimulating himself rectally, and that the appellant also showed the magazines to the children.

Further, the defense counsel elicited evidence from Mrs. L. that the appellant had been accused by the child of having intercourse with the family dog in front of his son and pulling his vasectomy stitches out during masturbation. Both of these specific instances were brought out during the defense attorney's cross-examination of the appellant's ex-wife in an attempt to impeach her credibility, and will be examined more fully in our discussion of the fourth assignment of error relating to ineffective assistance of counsel.

The appellant contends that the above-mentioned evidence was not only highly prejudicial but that none of the alleged acts or tendencies were remotely relevant to the offenses charged. The state, however, argued that several of the alleged evidentiary "errors" were elicited or used by the appellant himself.

West Virginia Rule of Evidence 404(b) provides that in addressing the issue of the admissibility of collateral crime evidence > opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident.

Further, in State v. Jackson, 181 W.Va. 447, 450, 383 S.E.2d 79, 82 (1989), this Court recognized that:

> [W]here the state attempt[s] to introduce evidence of other crimes or wrongful acts on the part of a defendant to prove system, motive, intent or opportunity, as outlined in Rule [404(b)], known as the collateral crime rule, 'we have emphasized that [to be admissible, evidence of] the collateral crimes must [relate to crimes that] have occurred reasonably close in point of time to the present offense.' State v. Dolin, 176 W.Va. 688, 347 S.E.2d 208, 214 (1986). See, e.g., State v. Messer, 166 W.Va. 806, 277 S.E.2d 634 (1981) (per curiam); Syllabus Point 7, State v. Withrow, 142 W.Va. 522, 96 S.E.2d 913 (1957); Syllabus Point 3, State v. Gargiliana, 138 W.Va. 376, 76 S.E.2d 265 (1953); Syllabus Point 2, State v. Evans, 136 W.Va. 1, 66 S.E.2d 545 (1951); Syllabus Point 4, State v. Lewis, 133 W.Va. 584, 57 S.E.2d 513 (1949).

The significance of Rule 404(b) See footnote 7was further explained by the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals in United States v. Masters, 622 F.2d 83, 86 (4th Cir.1980). In that case, the court stated that "[t]he circumstances under which such evidence may be found relevant and admissible under the Rule have been described as 'infinite.' Some of such circumstances are set forth in the Rule itself, but the cataloguing therein is merely illustrative and not exclusionary." Consequently, W.Va.R.Evid. 404(b) is an "inclusive rule" in which all relevant evidence involving other crimes or acts is admitted at trial unless the sole purpose for the admission is to show criminal disposition. Masters, 622 F.2d at 86.

In our analysis of the collateral acts involved in the present case, we begin by first examining just those acts that occurred in the presence of the children close in time to the offenses charged. From a review of the record, it is evident that the phone calls to sex clubs to which the appellant would make the children listen under the pretense that Mickey Mouse was on the phone, the masturbation in front of the appellant's son and the viewing of graphic sexual magazines with the children, all occurred not only in the presence of one or more of the victims, but close in time to the alleged offenses charged.

In dealing with the admissibility of other sexual acts under Rule 404(b), courts have allowed such evidence to be introduced under a number of different circumstances. For instance, in United States v. Beahm, 664 F.2d 414 (4th Cir.1981), a case in which the defendant was charged with two counts of taking indecent liberties with children involving the fondling of the boys' genitals on a United States military installation, the court upheld the admissibility of the testimony of two male juvenile witnesses, neither of whom were the victims in the case, that the defendant had approached and made sexual advances toward them some three years prior to the current offenses. Id. at 415-16. The witnesses' testimony revealed that there was similarity between the sexual advances made toward them and the acts constituting the offense charged, along with temporal proximity to the offense charged. Id. at 417. The court, in its decision, found that since the defendant was contesting whether the government sufficiently proved the lascivious intent as required by the Virginia statute, the admission of these other wrongs or acts was not in error since "the burden was on the government to show that the defendant's acts were performed with lascivious intent and did not occur by accident." Id.

The Fourth Circuit has also allowed other specific crimes, acts or wrongs to be introduced because they are so closely connected with the offense charged that they are found to be part of the res gestae of the offense. See Masters, 622 F.2d at 86. In Masters, while not a sexual offense case, the defendant was charged with dealing in firearms or ammunition without a valid license. The court permitted the introduction of taped conversations between the defendant and undercover agents which tended to show that the defendant had sold guns of all types, including sawed-off shotguns and grenades, to other customers on occasions other than those charged and was willing to supply them to the agents. Id. at 84-85.

Specifically, the court reasoned that

> [o]ne of the accepted bases for the admissibility of evidence of other crimes arises when such evidence, 'furnishes part of the context of the crime' or is necessary to a 'full presentation' of the case, or is so intimately connected with and explanatory of the crime charged against the defendant and is so much a part of the setting of the case and its 'environment' that its proof is appropriate in order 'to complete the story of the crime on trial by proving its immediate context or the 'res gestae' or the 'uncharged offense is so linked together in point of time and circumstances with the crime charged that one cannot be fully shown without proving the other ... [and is thus] part of the res gestae of the crime charged.' And where evidence is admissible to provide this 'full presentation' of the offense, '[t]here is no reason to fragmentize the event under inquiry' by suppressing parts of the 'res gestae.'

Masters, 622 F.2d at 86 (citing United States v. Smith, 446 F.2d 200, 204 (4th Cir.1971); United States v. Weems, 398 F.2d 274, 275 (4th Cir.1968), cert. denied, 393 U.S. 1099, 89 S.Ct. 894, 21 L.Ed.2d 790 (1969); State v. Spears, 58 Ohio App.2d 11, 387 N.E.2d 648, 651 (1978); United States v. Howard, 504 F.2d 1281, 1284 (8th Cir.1974); United States v. Beechum; 582 F.2d 898, 912 n. 15 (5th Cir.1978), cert. denied, 440 U.S. 920, 99 S.Ct. 1244, 59 L.Ed.2d 472 (1979); United States v. Copeland, 295 F.2d 635, 637 (4th Cir.1961), cert. denied, 368 U.S. 955, 82 S.Ct. 398, 7 L.Ed.2d 388 (1962); United States v. Gano, 560 F.2d 990, 993- 94 (10th Cir.1977)).

This reasoning seems particularly applicable to the transactions involved in a child sexual abuse or assault case. Certainly involving children in the process of viewing or listening to explicit sexual material or graphic sexual behavior is highly probative in presenting a full presentation of the circumstances surrounding the alleged offenses.

Finally, the issue of other sexual acts and their admissibility arose in Morgan v. Foretich, 846 F.2d 941 (4th Cir.1988). In that case, a four- year-old female child and her mother brought civil action against the child's father and his parents for damages arising out of alleged child sexual abuse. Specifically at issue was the admissibility of evidence which tended to prove that plaintiff child's sister had also been sexually abused while visiting with defendants. Id. at 944. This evidence was offered not only to identify the defendants as the perpetrators but also to disprove several defenses raised by the defendants including fabrication of the injuries and self-infliction. Id.

The court in upholding the admissibility articulated that as long as the prior acts were being admitted to disprove disputed issues involved in the case such as the defendant's identity, the absence of mistake or accident, or the intent of the defendant to commit the crimes with which he is charged, then there was no violation of the other crimes evidence rule. Id. (citing Comment, Other Crimes Evidence to Prove the 'Corpus Delicti' of a Child Sexual Offense, 40 U.Miami L.Rev. 217, 220 (1985)).

We therefore find that the acts which occurred in the presence of either one or both children or as part of the transactions with the children which constituted the basis for the indictment were admissible under W.Va.R.Evid. 404(b). These acts not only showed lascivious intent See footnote 8 or sexual gratification See footnote 9 on the part of this appellant towards his children to commit the crimes charged, but also that the acts did not occur accidentally as the appellant attempted to establish as part of his defense through his own testimony. Furthermore, the acts were so intrinsically related to the alleged offenses that they may be considered as part of the transactions with the children and so interwoven with his pattern of conduct toward the children that they are part of the res gestae of the crimes charged. Lastly, they were highly probative on the issue of whether this defendant committed sexual abuse against these children. See footnote 10

We now turn to a consideration of those acts directly involving the victims together with those acts in which the appellant allegedly fondled this infant boy and ejaculated on his daughter's underwear. We originally addressed the issue of collateral crimes evidence being admitted to show lustful disposition in State v. Dolin, 176 W.Va. 688, 347 S.E.2d 208 (1986).

In Dolin, the defendant was accused of first degree sexual assault of his daughter who was under the age of eleven at the time the crime was committed. The crimes occurred within three years prior to the indictment. 176 W.Va. at 690, 347 S.E.2d at 211. At trial, the only evidence presented against the defendant was the uncorroborated testimony of his then sixteen-year-old daughter who was the victim of the crime charged. In her testimony, she was unable to recall specific details regarding the places and times of the incidents involved in the indictment. See footnote 11 The daughter, in her testimony however, was able to recall specific activity involving six collateral acts which included:

> 1. When she was seven years old, the defendant drove her in a van to a quarry, where he forced her to perform oral sex on him;
> 2. When she was eight or nine years old, after shopping for a new bicycle, the defendant took her to a motel in St. Albans and rubbed his sex organ on her stomach until he ejaculated;
> 3. In August of 1977, when she was ten years old, the defendant drove her to a remote location in South Charleston and rubbed his sex organ on her;
> 4. When she was twelve years old, the defendant took her on a shopping trip to Parkersburg, where they spent the night in a motel. During that night, the defendant rubbed his sex organ on her;
> 5. When she was twelve or thirteen years old, the defendant drove her to a hollow in South Charleston and forced her to perform oral sex on him; and > 6. When she was twelve years old, the defendant drove her to Tennessee, where they stayed in a motel and he rubbed his sex organ on her.

Although this Court noted that other jurisdictions did recognize a sexual propensity exception, we opined that > [t]o recognize a sexual propensity exception in addition to the numerous exceptions to the collateral crime rule would provide a convenient path to damage a defendant's character and would sweep additional sexual offenses into evidence which would obviously prejudice and confuse a jury in its consideration of the crime charged in the indictment. What renders the reasoning of those courts which have adopted a sexual propensity exception so anomalous is their failure to acknowledge that sexual crime cases are by their very nature likely to be highly offensive to the average jury. Thus, the ability to further prejudice the jury by admitting additional collateral sexual offenses is even more apparent.

Id. 176 W.Va. at 695, 347 S.E.2d at215. This Court further reasoned that since the uncorroborated testimony of the victim is sufficient evidence for a conviction in sexual
